"This morning we found that in consequence of the negotiation being broken off, the Yun Chi ordered the English either to enter Whampoa at once, or to quit the Chinese waters, with the threat of burning their ships if they refused compliance. On the receipt of this order, Capt. Elliott sent two vessels, the Hyacinth and Volga, to ascertain if the Commissioner was in earnest. When these vessels arrived at the Bogue, they received a request from the commander of the forts not to approach nearer than two or three miles, which they complied with; lying to, and waiting for the answer to Captain Elliott's message. Whilst in that situation, about thirty junks got under way from under the forts, and stood down towards them. A message from the ships was sent to the commander of the junks, desiring him not to approach any nearer, which request was disregarded. The action then commenced on the part of the English with round and grape shot, which did terrible execution. For some time the Chinese fought well, their admiral showing great courage and presence of mind, but they were finally obliged to retreat, as I have before mentioned. The English suffered no loss.

"This evening the Chinese report has been received. One mandarin with a chrystal button has been killed—the admiral dangerously wounded—three junks sunk, one blown up, and many more disabled. Over three hundred men have also been killed. The Commissioner is reported to be very much frightened, and at a great loss what to do.

"Thus all hope of an accommodation is broken off, and war virtually declared between the two nations. Whether the port of Canton will be closed to vessels of all nations, is a question which yet remains to be decided. I should not be at all surprised, if the Chinese themselves should sink junks at the Bogue, and thus prevent both ingress and egress."

The Chinese Difficulties.—We find in the papers received by the Western, a more circumstantial account of the Chinese difficulty than had been before received. It appears that on the 20th of October a convention was agreed upon, between the English Superintendent and the Chinese High Commissioner, by which the trade with British vessels was to be carried on outside the Bocca Tigris, without coming in to the required bond—that two British vessels, regardless of the national honor, having gone up to Whampoa, and signed the obnoxious bond, the Chinese High Commissioner seized the crews as hostages, and cancelled the convention, commanding all British vessels to follow their example, or in three days to expect total destruction. This led on the 3d November, to a demand of explanation on the part of Superintendent Elliott at the Bogue, when the Hyacinth and the Volga sloops of war were surrounded by twenty-nine war junks, with the manifest intention of making [illegible] prisoners. Each junk contained from one hundred and forty to two hundred Chinese; but after an engagement of half an hour, six of them were sunk, and the rest sheered off as fast as they could. Had it not been for Superintendent Elliott, who would not suffer Captain Smith, of the Volga, to continue firing, more than half of them would have gone to the bottom. It was calculated that they lost at least nine hundred men.

The Chinese Admiral is admitted on all hands to have behaved with great gallantry. The reason of the advance of the war junks is said to have been a demand for a man—the old story—in atonement for the death of a Chinese. The British have been obliged to leave Macao in consequence of these difficulties.—A great game of speculation in the price of teas was going on in England, in consequence of these events.—Bro. Jonathan.

ENGLAND.

MARRIAGE OF THE QUEEN.—At half past 11 o'clock the Arch-bishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishop of London took their places within the altar.

A few minutes before 12 the Queen Dowager entered the Chapel Royal thro' the Dean's vestry door, and took her seat near the altar. The Arch-bishops of Canterbury and York immediately rose on the entrance of her Majesty. Her Majesty, after performing her private devotions, perceiving the most Reverend prelates still standing, sent Lord Howe, who was in waiting, to desire that they might take their seats.

A flourish of trumpets and drums at twenty-five minutes after 12 o'clock, gave intimation that the procession of the royal bridegroom had commenced its movement, and shortly after, having passed through various rooms, entered the Colonade.

As the Prince moved along he was greeted with loud clapping of hands from the gentlemen, and enthusiastic waving of handkerchiefs from the assembled ladies. He wore the uniform of a Field Marshall in the British Army.

Having reached the haut pas, his Royal Highness affectionately kissed the hand of the Queen Dowager, and then bowed to the Arch-bishops and Dean. Immediately on his entrance a voluntary was performed by Sir George Smart on the organ. The master of the ceremonies and the officers of the bridegroom stood near the person of his Royal Highness. The Lord Chamberlain and Vice Chamberlain, preceded by drums and trumpets, then returned to wait upon her Majesty.

Meanwhile his Royal Highness entered into close conversation with the Queen Dowager, until the trumpets and drums announced the moving of the Queen's procession.

After having conducted the Royal Prince to the altar, the Lord Steward and the Lord Chamberlain, quitted the royal bridegroom for the purpose of conducting the Queen to the altar. The Queen's procession was announced by a flourish of trumpets and drums. She looked excited, and was paler than usual. Her dress was a rich white satin trimed with orange flower blossoms. On her head was a wreath of the same blossoms, over which, but not to cover her face, a lace veil was thrown. She wore the collar of the Garter, but no other diamonds or jewels.

As her Majesty approached the chapel the national anthem was performed by the instrumental band. Her Majesty walked up the aisle followed by her train bearers and attendants, without noticing or bowing to any of the peers. On reaching the haut pas her Majesty knelt down on the footstool, and having performed her private devotions, sat down on her chair of state. The different officers of state having now taken their seats in the body of the chapel, the coup d'œil was splendid beyond description. After the lapse of a few seconds, her Majesty rose and advanced with his Royal Highness Prince Albert to the communion table, where the Arch-bishop of Canterbury commenced reading the service.

The rubrie was rigidly adhered to throughout.

The service having concluded, the members of the royal family returned from the altar to take their positions in the procession. On passing her Majesty they all paid their congratulations, and the Duke of Sussex shook her hand and affectionately kissed her cheek. After all had passed but the bridegroom, her Majesty stepped hastily across to the other side of the altar where the Queen Dowager was standing and kissed her.

The royal pair then left the capital, all the spectators standing.

In the evening a very splendid banquet was given in the banqueting hall built by George IV. The theatres and metropolis were illuminated.

The Great Western brought out twelve thousand letters, the postage on which, to the owners of the ship, is $3,000.

The British Queen was to leave Portsmouth for New York on the 2d inst.

The bank of England had reduced the rate of interest to 5 per cent. Money was plenty both in London and Paris.

AGRICULTURAL.

DICTIONARY OF TERMS.

USED IN AGRICULTURE AND ITS KINDRED SCIENCES.

Air. In a state of purity, air consists of nitrogen, and oxygen, in the proportion of 76 of the former and 23 of the latter; but as it exists in the atmosphere, it contains a portion of carbonic gas, and also aqueous vapor in the form of an elastic fluid, the proportion varying from the merest trifle, to 11 grains in a cubic foot. Air acts a most important part in the process of germination, and subsequent vegetation, not only furnishing the oxygen required to decompose the carbonic gas consumed by the plants, but the most of the gas itself. The water held in the air is also easily parted with, and hence the great advantage of aration or frequently stirring the earth, to bring its particles in contact with the atmosphere. A square foot of earth in a solid form exposes but a small surface to the action of the air, and hence absorbs from the atmosphere but little; pulverize this mass, and the surface exposed to the action of the air is increased a million fold, and its powers of absorbtion from the atmosphere in the same proportion. This shows the absurdity of those who refuse in hot or dry weather to stir the earth around plants under the apprehension that it will render them more dry. Multiplying the absorbing surface by stirring the earth, is the only way of obtaining the moisture which in greater or less quantities always exists in the atmosphere.

Albumen. A colorless insipid fluid, coagulating at a heat of 120°, existing in the leaves, juice, and fruits of most plants, but most abundant in animal products. The white of eggs is nothing but pure albumen, and the blood contains large quantities of the substance. Its principal use in domestic economy, is in clarifying or clensing fluids, such as sugars, &c., for which purpose it is unrivalled. Milk contains albumen, and hence is sometimes used for cleansing syrup, but it is inferior to the whites of eggs. These, carefully incorporated with a fluid when cold, and then submitted to a coagulating heat, will lift all impurities to the surface where they can be easily taken off by skimming. Albumen is more abundant in the bark of the red or slippery elm, than in any other vegetable product, hence its value for medicinal purposes. Albumen is composed of carbon 52, oxygen 23, hydrogen 7, and nitrogen 15.

Alburnum. Wood of trees is usually composed of three distinct parts; the pith or central part, having a loose spongy texture; the heart-wood the most durable and valuable part of the tree; and the sap wood or alburnam. This last is usually whiter than the heart-wood, is more porous, and through it the circulation of the sap is principally performed. It is the soonest attacked by the borer or powder post, in exposed situations is always first to decay.

Alcohol. The purely spiritous part of all liquids. It is the product of vinous fermentation, and can be derived from all substances capable of such fermentation. It is the intoxicating principle of liquors, and few nations have been found so rude as not to have found some means of producing it. Alcohol is produced principally by the distillation of wine, molasses and grain. The product of the first is brandy, the second rum, and the third whiskey or gin. Alcohol is of much use in the arts, but it has, by its general use, produced a most unhappy effect on our happiness and morals. Perhaps greater quantities of distilled spirits are used by the nations that border on the Baltic than in any other part of the world, and here they are principally produced from the distillation of porters. Pure alcohol consists of hydrogen 13. 70, carbon 51. 98, and oxygen 34. 32.

Algæ. One of the families of plants into which Linnæus divided the vegetable kingdom. They are defined to be plants of which the roots, leaves and stem, are all one. The remains of algæ are found in a fossoil state in the shale of many parts of New York, and their decomposition may have contributed to the fertility of the strata in which they exist.

Alkali. A substance usually extracted from plants; and distinguished by the following properties: It has an acid and corrosive taste and power, it changes vegetable blue to green, red to purple, yellow to a red brown, and purple reduced by an acid to its original color. It is most used in the arts for neutralizing arts. It is best known in the shape of potash and soda. These unite with oils and animal fat, and form soap. Lime is possessed of alkaline properties, which give it its principal value in many cases. Alkaline substances have been divided into volatile and fixed; the volatile being known as ammonia, the fixed as potash & soda. Modern chemists have divided them into three classes: First, those with a metalic base combined with oxygen, potash, soda and lithia: Second, those which contain no oxygen, hydrogen and carbon, as aconita, circuta, morpha, &c. 3. Alluvion. Land deposited by the action of rivers; either at the mouths of lakes or the sea, or on the banks in their passages to these receptacles. Constituted as it usually must be of the richer and lighter parts of the regions drained by the river that deposits it, it is the most fertile of soils, and the most valuable, when it can be drained, and secured from floods. Nearly the whole of Holland is alluvial. In this country the vast tract on both sides of the Mississippi, for a great distance from its mouth, is of this character, but owing to its annual submersion is of comparatively little value. Perhaps there is no river in the United States, in proportion to its length and volume, that has so much valuable alluvion on its borders as the Genesee.

NEW PROCESS OF TANNING.—Mr. F. Chaplain has patented the following new process. The hide is made into a bag by sewing the edges together, and then filled with liquor, so that the pressure of the fluid, its own effort to escape, forces it through the pores of the hide; as it passes, the tannin is seized on by the gelatine, and the liquor comes out on the other side, having left the tannin behind it. In this way the thickest hide will be perfectly tanned in about fourteen days while it would require as many months on the old system. There have been many previous attempts to tan by pressure, but they have all proceeded on the supposition that very great and powerful pressure was required. Every one of these plans has failed, because, although the tanning was accomplished, the hides were rendered useless from the straining and distortion occasioned by the immense pressure.—Besides, the apparatus required for each hide has been found too costly for practical purposes.

Another improvement has been submitted to the British Association by Mr. W. Ferapath, and consists of pressure by rollers; the author having assumed, that the great cause of obstruction to rapid tanning is, that the weakened ooze is returned by the capillary attraction of the fibres and blood vessels so long, that when it shall have passed out by exosmosis it will have produced the same effect upon the soluble gelatine as is produced by maceration. The hides are formed into an endless band, which is passed between a pair of rollers fixed to each pit, so that, in succession, each hide may be raised from the bottom of the pit, squeezed by the rollers, and returned to the pit for a fresh supply of tanning liquor. Eight pairs of rollers require one horse power to work them, and two boys at 2s. 6d. a week each, to superintend them, when two bands or one hundred hides, will be taken off weekly.—New Era.

THE RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE.

WEDNESDAY, ... MARCH 25, 1840.

Lyford's Baltimore Price Current is continued. The terms will be found in another column.—We have already commended this work as highly worthy the consideration of the western trader.

Professor BRONSON, of Mt. Vernon, Ohio, has been, for some time past, greatly interesting the people of New York, with his recitations and powers of eloquence.

SMALL POX.—The New Lisbon (Ohio) Aurora, states that Richard Atkinson, of Wellsville, died on the first instant, of Small Pox. His physician, Dr. J. F. Patterson, supposes him to have taken it from a letter written by his brother of Lancaster, Pa., who had the disease, but was convalescent when he wrote. Several other cases have occurred in Wellsville.

OHIO LEGISLATURE.—March 13.—The Bill to incorporate the "Methodist Protestant Academy" in Brighton, in Cuyahoga county, was read the third time and passed.

This Bill having passed the Senate is now a law.

On motion of Mr. Brady, of the Senate, on the 21st instant, the Bill for the further protection of religious societies was postponed until December next. The Bill had passed the House, but was thus rejected by the Senate.

So we are left to be trampled on another year, at least with those worthless vagabonds they call "victuallers" at camp and grove meetings.

The Legislature has passed a law for the re-valuation of property in this State.

The Senate, by a vote of 18 to 16, passed the Bill of the House, to repeal the law of 1838 for the erection of a new State House.

THE RAIN MAKER.—We give on our first page an article from professor Espy, on his theory of clouds and rain. We have noticed a great deal of punning in the public prints on this subject, but we have never before seen a statement of his theory. There appears to us, as far as we understand them, much plausibility in his sentiments.

To his statement of facts, with regard to great fires producing rain, he might add what occurs in this country, more or less frequently every year. In clearing up our forests there is immense quantities of old timber every season falling upon the fields, which have to be burned every autumn and spring,—also the new clearings present an immense amount of logs and brush which have to be consumed in the same way,—add to these the frequent firing of the woods. When the atmosphere is light and calm, the smoke from these fires descends to the earth with such density as often to render it extremely afflictive to the inhabitants. But when this state of things exist we never fail to have rain to put out the fires and clear up the atmosphere, so as to relieve the people from the smoke, who, without the operation of this law of nature, would often be tortured with its disagreeable effects. These rains have been called, from time immemorial, SMOKE SHOWERS, by the citizens, from the universal conviction they were produced from that cause. But, according to the theory under notice, these rains are caused by the fires rarefying the atmosphere at the surface of the earth, which crowds the volumes immediately over them, upwards, until by diminished pressure, they cool and condense into water, &c.

The only instance we now recollect, when a calm atmosphere and thick smoke was not immediately followed by rain, was in the fall of '18 or '19. A dense cloud of smoke then hung over the whole western country for weeks. It was supposed to be caused by the usual amount of fires consuming the wood from the clearings, to which was added extensive burnings in the immense grass prairies of Indiana and Illinois. The sun was entirely concealed, nor could you distinguish a man more than forty or fifty yards. We resided in Steubenville, Ohio, at the time, and remember that the ferrymen could not find their way over the Ohio, without causing a horn to be blown on the shore to direct them across. This smoke was very painful to the eyes, and caused difficulty in breathing. And from it there was no escape, for if you retired to your room it found you in your retreat.

But should this theory of clouds and rain be correct, we cannot see that it would be of much practical utility, as it would take such immense combustion it would soon exhaust the fuel of the country.

Professor Espy has recently been delivering lectures in Charleston, South Carolina. He is highly spoken of by the Mercury of that place, as a man of science. It is said he intends to visit Europe shortly, to submit his theory to the consideration of the scientific of that country.

WESLEYAN OBSERVER.—We repeat again that we were correct in our conjectures of the character and design of this paper. We have received the 6th number, in which its objects are fully and fairly developed, as the following extracts from its pages will show:

"The Observer has kept nothing back, with respect to its objects. It is open and frank, and has been so from the beginning. It is pledged to all the moral enterprises of the day— and against all oppression. It will contend boldly for the rights of both the white & colored man, for the rights both of the ministry and laity. It will candidly examine and fearlessly oppose the administration of 'church officers,' and 'prime ministers,' whenever such administration is believed to be destructive, either of constitutional laws, or the rights of conscience. It will also advocate, in imitation of the example of some of the oldest, wisest and best men in the Methodist Episcopal Church, some important modifications of Episcopacy."

It has several forms of Petitions for presentation to the next General Conference, two of which we here give, as fully showing the relation it sustains to the episcopal hierarchy:

"☞MEMORIAL,

To the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, next to be holden in the city of Baltimore, May 1, 1840.

"FATHERS AND BRETHREN—Your memorialists, members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, beg leave to present, That whereas, they believe it would be more in accordance with the principles of christianity and our free institutions that our Presiding Elders should be elected by the conferences, respectively; and that in the more populous parts of our work, they should, like the Chairmen of districts in the Wesleyan connexion, fill circuits or stations; and whereas they think this can be done without interfering in the least with our itineracy, or general superintendency; therefore, your memorialists pray your reverend body to adopt such regulations as shall effectually secure these important changes.

"And as in duty bound will ever pray."

"☞MEMORIAL,

To the General Conferenee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, next to be holden in the city of Baltimore, May 1, 1840.

"FATHERS AND BRETHREN—Your memorialists, members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in ———, beg leave to present, That whereas it is believed to be more in accordance with the usage of primitive christians, as well as all protestant churches, that lay-members should have a voice in the law-making-body of the church; therefore your memorialists pray your reverend body to adopt, and propose to the several annual conferences for their adoption, a regulation which shall require, that the general conference be composed of an equal number of clergymen and laymen, the former to be appointed by the annual conferences, and the latter by the societies.

"And as in duty bound will ever pray."

The editor in remarking upon these petitions, says:

"Some of the forms which we this day present, may be thought very fanatical, particularly the last. It would probably strike some of our anti-abolition brethren with as much terror to see a layman in the general conference, as a colored clergyman from the Liberia Annual Conference. But we have become fully convinced that laymen were members of the highest ecclesiastical councils of the church in the early ages of christianity. And we believe they are now in all the leading protestant churches, except the Methodist Episcopal Church. Even in the episcopal church in this country, this is the fact. And is it not reasonable that laymen should be represented in the law-making-body? Ought they not to have a voice in the adoption of regulations by which they are to be governed? At any rate, it is proper and constitutional that they should petition for this right, if they desire it. This we believe has often been done. And we know some lay brethren, who, in our judgment, are as well qualified for a seat in the General Conference, as any clergyman in the connexion.—☞Let it not, however, be represented, that because we have complied with the request of our friend 'V. D. M.' in publishing this memorial, and have thus expressed ourselves, that therefore the Observer is going over to the Protestant, or Reformed Methodists. The Observer has no idea of any such thing."

The editor here calls attention by raising his index, to the following sentence: "Let it not, however, be represented" that "the Observer is going over to the Prot. Methodists." Now, my brother, this makes us laugh. Why, you are as fully over to the Protestant Methodists as you can possibly come; at least, so far as principle is concerned. There is not now a nut shell between us.

Permit us, dear brother, in kindness, to say to you that we understand the reason of this note of attention. The ministers of the M. E. Church have so uniformly and so extensively represented the members of the M. P. Church as a set of wicked, bad men, that their people must either believe they are guilty of falsehood, or that we are what they represent us to be. But, of course, they have given credence to these reports of our character, and entertaining such opinions of our depravity, it would be fatal to the Observer, if it were believed that it had in any way identified itself with these bad men. It is, we presume, to guard against this difficulty, that this note of attention is thrown in.

When Zion's Watchman found itself pressed with this prejudice it deemed it expedient to get rid of it by abusing and misrepresenting the M. P. Church. But we hope better things of the OBSERVER. Indeed, we cannot but compliment the Observer for having taken a consistent, fair start. There is something like a manly and christian tone pervading its pages. But, brethren, you will find that the cry of "mad dog!" will be raised against you, if you "go ahead," so that others, in turn, may be inclined to shun you. But don't mind that.

THE MARKETS.

ZANESVILLE, MARCH 24.—Wheat 40 cents per bushel. Flour 2 50 a 2 75 per bbl.

LOUISVILLE, MARCH 11.—Business has shown some improvement this week, though there continues to be much complaint about the scarcity of money. Some kinds of western produce have been seriously depressed at New Orleans and in the western markets by the rise in freights from New Orleans coastwise and to Europe, and from the Ohio to New Orleans.

Bacon—Several lots of hog-round have been taken to go up the river at 5¾, which caused the rate from wagons to advance to 5¼. Hams in stores are worth 7¼. The article does not appear to come in rapidly and the stock on hand is limited.

Coffee—We notice sales in lot at 12 a 12½ cts. for Rio and Havana. Small sales at 12½ a 13. Arrived this week 1,088 bags.

Flour—May be quoted in large lots at $3 50, retail, 3 75 a 4 dollars.

Grain—One of the city mills has commenced grinding and gives for wheat, 75 cts. Corn at the river, 43 cts; Oats, 37½.

Hay—At the river 62½ a 75 cts.

Seeds—Cloverseed has advanced to 14 dolls. Timothy, 3 dollars. Blue grass, declined to one dollar.—[Prentice's Price Current.

PITTSBURGH, MARCH 13.—We have taken our usual walk, and made our calls at all our wholesale Grocery and Commission warehouses, and our wholesale Dry Good, Hardware, Queensware and Shoe establishments and find the stocks generally very good for the season, and several are now getting on or expecting new and additional supplies within a few days, and every reasonable preparation is making to accommodate customers with a fresh spring supply. The retail stocks are also improving very much, and the trade is daily opening new goods, which appear very low. Produce is plenty, and our merchants are doing the best they possibly can to meet the wishes of their customers by its sale, but money being very scarce, and demand limited, makes it impossible to realize good prices.

Bacon is selling at from 6½ to 7½ cents per lb, hog round. One sale of prime at 6 7-8 cents per lb. for 4000 lbs.

Lard is dull and plenty. Sales 7 a 7½ from stores.

Butter—Fresh Roll is low and few sales. It can be bought at 7 to 9 cents in bbls., and in kegs 6 to 8 cents per lb.

Cheese is plenty and dull, ranging from 6 to 7½ cents per lb.

Flour is dull except very choice lots. It has sold during the week, at the river $2 50, out of wagons 2 62½, from stores 2 88½, and a choice lot warranted to bear inspection in Philadelphia, at three dollars.

Grain—Wheat 50; Rye 37; Corn 33, on the ear, double bushel; Barley 40; Oats 12½ to 16 cents per bushel.

Salt—Plenty and dull. Sale 1 37½ a 1 50 per bbl.

Sugar—Choice N. O., per hhd 6 cents. and in bbls. 6½ to 7 cents per lb.

Molasses—Sales by the quantity 31 a 31½ cts. and in smaller lots 32 a 33 cents per gallon.

Scorchings—Rather scarce, sales in demand, at 4½ a 4½ cents per lb.

Seeds—Clover from wagons 8 25 a 8 50, and from stores 9 50 a 10 dolls. Timothy—Sales at 1 50 to 2 dollars per bushel. We had a few sales out of stores at 2 dollars per bushel.

Feathers—Rather dull, and ranging from 43 to 45 cents per lb.

Iron Blooms—Juniatta dull at 55 a 56 dollars. Pig Metal—20 a 22 dollars.—Harris.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 16.—Flour—The advice brought by the Great Western being unfavorable for the shipments of Flour to England, at the present high freights, the export demand has become moderate, and prices have not varied since our last report. Sales on Broad street, at 4 87½ to 4 94, and on the Delaware at 5 dollars per bbl. Stock very light and holders firm with limited receipts.

Molasses—Prices are steady and the stocks now very light. The week's sales embrace a cargo of Matanzas at 24 cents; one of Trinidad at 27; one of Porto Rico at 29, and near 100 hhds. of Fernandina at 28 a 29 cents per gallon.

Provisions—There has been no change in Mess Pork. Sales of Jersey at 16 00; western new Mess is held at 16 00 a 16 25. Bacon—no new western has arrived, and the stock of old is nearly exhausted. A sale of upwards of 150,000 lbs Pork in bulk, has been made at a price not made public. Sales of 600 kegs of western Lard, price unknown. In Butter there is no change, and the sales have been limited.

Sugars—Stocks light and prices fully supported. Sales of 175 hhds. Fernandina, at 6 a 7 cents per lb; 100 hhds. Porto Rico and New Orleans, at 8 cents for the former and 6 a 6¼ for the latter; about 890 boxes, comprising brown Matanzas, at 7 a 8, and white Cuba at 9½ a 10 cents. Further sales of white Brazil in lots at 9 a 9¼ cents, all on time.

Cattle—About 400 head of Beeves were offered and chiefly sold at 5 to 7 50 per 100 pounds, which is 25 cents decline.—Bicknell.

BALTIMORE, MARCH 16.—COFFEE.—We note sales of 6 a 700 bags Rio Coffee at 9¼ a 11¼ cts. for inferior to fair; 4 a 500 do. of Laguara at 11¾ a 12; 4 a 500 do. Angostura at 11½; 400 do. old Government Java at 15; and small parcels St. Domingo at 9½ cts. all on the usual credit.

FLOUR.—There has a fair business been done in flour this week, and the inspections have again been large. The prevailing prices for Howard street from stores, for the last two or three days, have been 4 75 a $4 87½ per bbl., the latter for a choice brand, or on short time with interest added; and the car and wagon price, 4 62½.—Sales of 1000 bbls. were made at the first named price yesterday morning; but towards the close the market became firmer, and holders declined selling at that rate. This falling off from last week's prices, was induced by the advices from across the water per the Great Western, by which unexecuted orders, held here, for the purchase of 20,000 bbls. were countermanded; and although other orders were substituted, the scarcity of vessels and high freights preclude the practicability of filling them. The sales of the week, of all descriptions, including City Mills and Susquehanna, amount to 10 a 12,000 bbls., taken chiefly for export and coastwise shipment. The sales of City Mills have been at 4 75 cash, to $5, on time, without interest; and of Susquehanna, 4 75 a 4 87½, cash and time, without interest.

MOLASSES.—The transactions have been principally by auction, and include Matanzas in hhds. at 24; trcs. 24¾; and bbls. 28. A parcel of 88 hhds. very prime Porto Rico sold at 30¼ a 31¾ cents.

PROVISIONS.—The only transaction in barrel descriptions, that we have learnt, is that of 50 barrels No. 1 Beef, at $13. Other qualities, and Pork, are held firmly at quotations. Sales have been made of 20 a 25,000 lbs. assorted Western and Frederick county cured Bacon, at 9 a 9¼ cts. full; and prime Middlings are selling at about the same rates. Other parts, Hams and Shoulders, sell as wanted, at qouted prices. Lard has improved a shade, and sales have been made at 8¼ a 8¾ cents, cash and time. We note a sale of 75 kegs No. 3 Butter, at 10 cents, 4 months. The stock of this latter article continues large.

SEED.—The price of clover seed continues at 9 50 a $10 50, for prime descriptions, in large parcels.

SUGAR.—There continues an apathy generally in this market, and prices of common Muscovadoes are still drooping. Our quotations include the rates at which moderate sales have been made from stores as well as auction prices.—Porto Rico, common to good, 5 55 a $8; and Brazil $9 50 per 100 pounds. There is no Havana Box in market.

THE HOME MARKET.—The number of Beef Cattle in market this week did not exceed 200, a part only sold, at $7 for inferior, to 7,50 a $8 for good to prime. Hogs are selling at 6 a 6 50 per 100 lbs.—Lyford.

NEW YORK, MARCH, 13.—Flour.—By the Great Western, we are advised of a further increase of duties on Bread Stuffs in England.—American Flour, in bond was dull at 30 shillings per barrel.

The receipt of these advices on the date of our last publication, had a tendency to check operations for export to any considerable extent, it being understood that some orders from England were countermanded, and others received at very low rates. Our market has continued excessively inactive, and in some instances sales of Southern have been made at some reduction. Western Canal may be quoted $5 50 a 5 75 for common to fancy brands, some of the former having been offered yesterday at the lowest of these rates. In Southern, we notice sales of 400 a 500 bbls. Howard street, supposed 5 25; 4 a 500 do. Richmond country, about 5 12½, 300 do. Georgetown, 5 37½; New Orleans, in small lots, 5 37½; and 1 a 200 bbls. Philadelphia, 5 25; the latter on time. Our quotations, it will be seen, are revised throughout.

PROVISIONS.—The sales of Mess and Prime Pork continue limited at former rates, with considerable receipts. Beef is in good demand, and 1000 bbls. have been disposed of at 13 dolls. for Mess, and 9 dollars for Prime, being an advance of 25 cents per bbl. for the former and 50 cents for the latter. Northern Lard continues to arrive freely, with small sales at 10, which is a reduction of ½ cent per lb.; Western is steady at 9 cents. Hams, Smoked Beef, &c. are in good demand at former rates. Prime Butter continues scarce, and we advance our quotation to 17 a 19 cents; ordinary to good is plenty, and dull at 10 a 12½ cents.—[Brother Jonathan.

BUFFALO.—On the 10th instant there was a a full supply of Flour on sale, and prices were firm, and ruled at 4 50. Wheat, sales at 75c. Ohio Corn, sales at 50c. Oats 31c. Corn Meal 1 25 per cwt. Trade, generally, was at a stand, but the future bids fair to be better than was anticipated sometime since, forwarding and produce merchants were in active preparation for the opening of trade.

CINCINNATI, MARCH 20.—The times are as dull as when I wrote you last week, and with as little prospect for a favorable change.

Our river is still falling, and freights keep up so high on steamboats, that many of our shippers have commenced sending off flat boats, and as several have been fitted out the past week, there has consequently been a fair demand for produce.

Flour $3 to 3 06; Wheat dull 45 cents; and Corn 25 cents.

There is a good stock of Groceries in market, but little doing, as our merchants are selling mostly for cash, having found so much difficulty in collecting their old debts, they are not disposed to make many new ones.

The difficulty of obtaining good bankable money is very great, and our best houses are hard run. Several new kinds of bank notes have made their appearance lately: "The Whitewater Canal," "The Western Banking Company of New York," and some others, and they seem to go pretty well. It appears they evade the law, and consequently those who have confidence in the persons who issue them, as money is scarce, take them.—Cor. Middletown Mail.

FLOUR AT LIMA, two months since, was scarce, and selling on board at 13 per bbl. [Reported by Lieut. Kennon, of the Navy, arrived last Sunday from Kingston, Jam. having crossed the isthmus.]—Lyford.

FIRE AT UTICA.—A correspondent writes us that a fire broke out on Sunday evening in the grocery establishment of J.C.Stephens & Co., Genesee street, which was consumed, together with the dry goods store of J. D. Pierce, adjoining.—The buildings on either side of the above stores were much damaged, and the occupants obliged to remove their goods.

It is stated in the Philadelphia papers that letters have been received from Mr. Hosea J. Levis, the runaway cashier of the Schuylkill Bank, in which he expresses his wish to return and assist in winding up the affairs of the bank. He promises some "awful disclosures," provided he is permitted to return a guarantee against any criminal prosecution. The letters were dated "St. Jago"—but might as well have been dated where they were written. Salt water need not be crossed by Mr. L. to come home.

FIRES IN NEW JERSEY.—On Saturday forenoon the bridges over the Hackensack, about three miles from Jersey City, were consumed by fire. There were two bridges side by side, one belonging to the railroad, the other to the turnpike company. The loss is estimated at $70,000.

On Friday evening, the large carriage manufactory, and several other like buildings in Mechanic st., were destroyed by fire. The row of tenements opposite, occupied by persons employed in the works, was also destroyed, in number some ten to fifteen houses. The calamity falls heavy on Newark.

THE MAINE DIFFICULTIES.—The St. John, N. B. Courier states that Colonel Goldie has been ordered to the disputed territory to take charge of the troops now there, and that 250 men have been sent there, in addition to the old force. The British have barracks on the St. John river, capable of accommodating 100 men, but now under charge of one man, and also on the Madawasca, similar works under charge of a corporal and five privates. On the western shore of the Temiscouta Lake they have barracks, where 175 men are stationed. It is probable that the 250 men above mentioned, are intended to put the barracks at present unoccupied, in the same state of defence as those on the Temiscouta.

After all is considered, however, these steps amount to an infraction of the letter of the agreement only; for the force sent by the British amounts only to a mere handful. We are anxious to see the documents in relation to the subject, which have been transmitted to Congress by the President. It is time this open question were settled.

CONGRESSIONAL.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

REMARKS OF MR. NISBET, OF GEORGIA.

Friday, December 27, 1839.

The question being on a motion to reconsider the vote of the House concurring in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a Chaplain—

Mr. NISBET, of Georgia, rose and addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Speaker—convinced that the motion before the House involves matter of serious moment to Christianity and the country, I beg leave to offer a few reflections. I confess, although informed of the opinions of my colleague, (Mr. Cooper,) I have been taken by surprise by the debate now in progress. I certainly did not expect it this morning. I must say that I differ with my honorable colleague in the views he has exhibited. And although his searching and accurate mind, in its investigations after, and elucidations of truth, rarely errs, yet I believe that he is now wrong. I know full well, and justly appreciate his motives. No one is to Christianity a greater friend than himself, and no one illustrates its precepts in practice more fully than he does. He, by sustaining the motion, intends to maintain both Christianity and the Constitution. We differ in the mode of accomplishing the same ends.

It certainly would be to my mind a melancholy result should the House of Representatives of this great nation resolve certainly that it would not elect a Chaplain—a minister of the Gospel, called to throw around the legislation of the country the hallowed influences of piety—a result which would strike with alarm and apprehension the whole people of the Union; apprehension, not so much for Religion or the Constitution as for that conservative influence which it exerts upon the principles of free government.

What, sir, does not liberty owe to Christianity? The history of the Colonies proves that we are indebted, in a great degree, for those noble principles of free government engrafted upon our Constitution and in our laws, to that freedom of thought and action which brought our Pilgrim and Huguenot ancestry to our shores. They fled from the religious bigotry and political intolerance of the old world for conscience sake. They came hither to worship God in freedom. And upon the shores of a new world they planted the standard of Religious, and with it, of Civil Liberty. That independence of mind which they asserted in matters of conscience made them alike independent as to all rights. Freedom of service to Heaven, by a very necessity of our nature, constrains men to think and act freely in matters of less consequence. The free spirit of the Pilgrim impressed itself upon Colonial Governments, and some of the best features of our most admirable system are traced to colonial parentage. I make these remarks to show, sir, that Civil Liberty is too largely indebted to Christianity to permit us to endanger the former by abandoning even the forms of the latter. Its influences ought to pervade, and do now pervade, all the departments of Government, more or less. In our courts of justice, our executive offices, and our halls of legislation, it ought to send, and does send, its sanative power. It gives a healthful tone to public sentiment, and purifies the fountains of legislation. In this country it is necessary, it seems to me, to maintain, in the forms of legislation, the external ceremonials of religion. What though it is sometimes desecrated, and its ministers false? What though it seem to some to be but part of Congressional pageantry, empty, vain, and a lie? Yet still the very form of service maintains the ascendency of morality. Those forms are the emblems of its essential purity. Blended, as they are, with the procedure of Congress, they themselves become vital. Destroy, sir, the external manifestations of Christianity and you weaken its influence and endanger its vitality. You should observe even here, sir, the form of prayer. The voice of praise should hush for a brief moment, at regular intervals, the noise of party war, and say to the troubled waters, "Peace—be still."

The appointment of a Chaplain to this House is a declaration, by the nation itself, that the Bible is true. It is the practical recognition of its obligations. Is this no advantage? Is this not bearing evidence to Christianity? Is it not the voice of the Confederacy? Does not this act proclaim, through the length and breadth of the land, that, according to the belief of the American Congress, God reigns in Heaven and upon earth? The statesman, therefore, should not withhold this evidence. In all we do, it seems to me, we should recognize the sanctions of Christianity, and should maintain the purity both of the Church and the State, by a decent regard, in our public acts, even to the forms of piety.

The manifestations of regard to Religion, in the election of a Chaplain to this House, is due to the conviction and moral sensibilities of the constituency of this body. It is a just response to the requirement of that moral feeling which pervades the States. No less than this, I will venture to assert it, is required by the people, whether professors or not. It is a tribute of respect to that religion which makes sweet the homes of thousands who dwell beneath the fostering care of American legislators, and in the peace of an unobtrusive yet sustaining faith. Let it not be said that the 26th Congress has declared of record that it will dispense with the services of the ministry. Conceding for the argument's sake, that the power to appoint a Chaplain, under the Constitution, is doubtful, yet I know it will not be denied that a failure to appoint would shock the country. It will do violence to that fervid piety which lives and breathes and burns in the great heart of the nation.

The service with which it is now proposed to dispense has been maintained here for years. The wise and virtuous and patriotic of other days exercised the power, and believed in its expediency.—It is hoary with accumulated years. The first Congress that assembled under the Constitution elected a Chaplain. We are scarcely wiser than that august body of men. They mingled worship with politics. Most of the State Legislatures, I believe, sir, do the same.

It has been objected that the worship conducted here is insincere—a form and a mockery. Admitting this to be true—and I lament that, in part, it must be conceded to be true—yet, still, the general evils is averted, to which I have before referred. And these general ends are paramount; they outweigh particular objections. In all assemblies there are insincere worshippers: men will bring the cares and thoughts and feelings of the world into the sanctuary. I do not know that this body, being professedly political, is, on that account, the less devout. That distraction of mind awaits him who mingles in the stormy strife of this House, is true; and on that account it is well to bring hither the soothing, softening influences of charity and love. But I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is in this House not only a sacred regard for Christianity, but also a strong feeling of piety. Beneath the surface of ordinary emotion lie embedded the fountains of moral sensibility. There flows through this assemblage of men an under current of piety, invisible, it is true, under ordinary circumstances, but which occasionally flashes and sparkles in the light of day. This is obvious, in the eloquent words and thoughts of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise.) He gave utterance to the irresponsible feeling of respect for moral things, which, doubtless, he imbibed in his earliest formation of character. Nor can I permit myself to doubt that there are many here who meet these services with all that solemnity of manner and feeling which becomes the occasion. My colleague, and also the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. Garland,) find a reason against electing a Chaplain, in this, that they are paid—that they pray and preach by contract, and that they make this temple a place of merchandise, selling alike their consciences and their services. I find myself nothing wrong in religious or political principle in rewarding the minister. It is a voluntary contribution by the House to the necessities of those whom they invite to officiate for them. It is not a pension for the clergy, by law or from constitutional necessity, but a donation to the man. Reward, to my mind, does not necessarily demoralize and secularize the preacher, else there was no ministry—no temple—no worship. Shall not the priest live by the altar? And is not the laborer worthy of his hire? That some who wear the priestly robe have come hither, trading upon the stock of their ministerial character, and vending for a consideration the sacred ministrations of our holy religion, is perhaps true—but not all have so come. It may be conceded at once, without weakening the obligation to elect a Chaplain, that there are false professors of that religion. In its purest and earliest state, among the twelve who listened to the words, and saw the works of God himself, there was one traitor.

I cannot concur, Mr. Speaker, in the apprehension expressed by my honorable friend and colleague, that the act to which he objects may ultimately lead to a union of Church and State. I think that our whole political system, as also the state of the church in our country, makes such a union an utter impracticability. Such a thing could not be without an entire change in the essential elements and actual organization of the frame of government. The very freedom of religious opinion and action guarantied to the People, must operate as an insurmountable bar to such a union. I should as soon, nay, sooner, look for a despotism in place of our constitutional liberty, as the result which gentlemen apprehend. The recollection of the past, the interests of the present, and the expectations of the future—religion, which seeks its own perpetuity in the maintenance of its purity—all forbid it. Our denominational divisions constitute a system of sleepless and enterprising vigilance over the encroachments of the church. Protestant Christians have long ago ascertained, from history written in the blood of martyrdom, that their rights of conscience depend upon free government. They are committed to maintain the separation of the Church and the State by the instinct of self defence, and by the precepts of their own faith. I think I am not mistaken when I say that the church herself would be the last to seek an unholy and self-destroying alliance with the State.—Piety would die in the embraces of government. No, sir, Protestant Christianity must stand aloof from political associations by the law of her own existence. A loss of liberty might, perhaps, would necessarily corrupt the church; whilst liberty remains, the church will maintain its purity. Keep pure the church in our land, and the Constitution is defended with impregnable bulwarks.

In England we know, sir, that the church is part of the Government—that the articles of the established religion are held to be part and parcel of the common law—that the sacrament is a condition precedent to the tenure of office—that rich govermental revenues sustain the sacred aristocracy—that lands and franchises and political power, by the very principles of the British Constitution, (if Constitution Britain has, which I very much doubt,) appertain to the church; not to Christianity, sir, but to her form of church organization. Not so here. That aid which the Government can here give the church is alone in a freewill offering to the principles it professes, protecting all creeds and names equally by its tolerant and equal legislation. For myself I can conceive of no abomination more offensively abhorrent than a union of the Church with the State; and I would resist the very first approaches towards it with the sternest and most relentless hostility. But, sir, there is a union which is already, in some degree, consummated, which I hope I shall not live to see dissolved: I mean, sir, the union of religious principle with political conduct.

The leaven of moral principle should lighten the whole lump of the body politic. We should be cautious lest we divide things so happily and usefully united.—We should be careful lest we invite into our legislation, and adopt as rules of conduct, the philosophy of a merely human faith. No gentleman, I know, would give his vote directly or indirectly to unhinge Christianity, or in any way lessen its influences. I beg not to be understood as so charging. I only mean to say that the result at which they now aim may, in my opinion, produce that effect. The politicians of France desecrated the temples of God—burned the Bible—endowed the goddess of Reason with the attributes of the Deity—and soon, very soon, the foundations of society were broken up, and anarchy reigned triumphant. The vine clad hills and fertile plains and crowded streets of France flowed down with blood. To a public relaxation of moral obligation, I have no doubt, may be traced those startling horrors which proceeded and followed the French Revolution.

HAPPINESS.—An eminent modern writer beautifully says, "the foundation of domestic happiness is faith in the virtue of woman; the foundation of political happiness is confidence in the integrity of man; the foundation of all happiness, temporal and eternal, is reliance on the goodness of God."

Truth is always beautiful to behold.
Trust not him that seems a saint.
If thou givest a jest take a repartee.
Praise the friend, and not thyself.
Be not lazy, and thou wilt have no occasion to wish.
Lay up when young, and thou shalt find it when old.

"Brother, the sun is going down," said a good man to his christian friend. It was enough.—The latter went immediately and reconciled a difference which had occurred between himself and another person during the day. Happy would it be, had every one so kind and faithful a monitor. Take then the Scripture as such, and "Never let the sun go down on you in wrath."

SCHOOL LAND OF MICHIGAN.—The Hon. John D. Pierce, in an address upon the resources of Michigan for public institutions, estimates the value of the University lands at $921,900. The common School lands amount to over a million of acres, which are estimated at five dollars an acre, and if sold at that price, and the money put at interest the annual revenue of the above school fund would be three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

THE FEARLESS JUDGE.—We extract the following anecdote of Chief Justice Holt, as it exhibits one of the best and rarest qualities of a judge—unyielding moral courage: "In the reign of Queen Anne, in 1704, several freemen of the borough of Aylesbury, who proved their qualifications, were refused the liberty of voting at the election of a member of parliament. The law in such cases imposes a fine of £100 for every such offence. On this principle they applied to Lord Chief Justice Holt, who ordered the officer to be arrested. The House of Commons, alarmed at this step, made an order of the House to make it penal for either judge, counsel, or attorney, to assist at the trial; however, the Lord Chief Justice and several lawyers were hardy enough to oppose this order, and brought it on at the court of king's bench. The House, highly irritated at this contempt of their order, sent a sergeant at arms for the judge to appear before them; but that resolute defender of the laws bade him, with a voice of authority "begone;" at which they sent a second message by their speaker, attended by as many members as espoused the measure. After the speaker had delivered his message, his lordship replied to him in the following remarkable words: 'Go back to your chair, Mr. Speaker, within this five minutes, or you may depend on it I will send you to Newgate. You speak of your authority, but I will tell you I sit here as an interpreter of the laws, and a distributor of justice, and were the whole House of Commons in your belly I would not stir one foot!' The Speaker was prudent enough to retire, and the House were equally prudent in letting the affair drop."

RESTRAINT.—We apprecate no pleasure unless we are occcasionally debarred from them. Restraint is the golden rule of enjoyment.

If affords us the most unfeigned pleasure to state that the Charleston Observer has Phœnix-like, arisen from the ashes with renewed strength and beauty. It will be recollected that the building in which it was printed was a short time ago destroyed by fire, and a great portion of the type and press were destroyed or badly injured, which caused a suspension of the paper for some weeks.

Our Church in this City is unde great obligations to the Editor, the Rev. Mr. Gildersleeve, for his ministerial services at various times, and we sincerely hope that his loss will be more than made up by a large increase to his subscription list, and prompt payment of his subscribers, old and new.—*M. Methodist Prot. Banner.

THE Methodist Protestant Church in the South, and particularly in South Carolina, being as yet in her infancy, her history is but little known, while the views and principles of her Members have been studiously misrepresented. To enlighten the public mind in relation to those principles, and to correct misrepresentation, is the object contemplated by the publication of this periodical. And there is every reason to believe that wheresoever those principles are known and properly appreciated—based as they are upon the union of spiritual and ecclesiastical liberty—it will be conceded that the church stands upon the high ground of scriptural truth. The Methodist Protestant Church has already attained a respectable and firm standing among her sister churches, in various parts of the United States, and we trust the day is not distant, when she will rank second to none, for piety, numbers and usefulness in the sunny South.

While the principal design of the paper will be to make known the history, present condition, and future prospects of the Methodist Protestant Church; to vindicate her principles, and defend her from the attacks of others; due courtesy will be extended to other churches, and notice taken of their condition and prospects.—Literature, Science and the Arts, will not be forgotten.

Terms:—THE METHODIST PROTESTANT BANNER will be published monthly, on a quarto sheet, under the direction of a Committee of the South Carolina Annual Conference, at One Dollar per annum, payable in advance. Its enlargement in size and more frequent appearance, will depend upon the support it may receive.

Any person remitting Five Dollars will be entitled to a copy gratis.

Communications may be addressed to the Publishing Committee of the Methodist Protestant Banner, Charleston, South Carolina. 24

The Most Popular and Readable Periodical of the Day.

Burton's Magazine,

(THE GENTLEMAN'S,)

AND AMERICAN MONTHLY REVIEW,

WILL present its sixth and seventh volumes to the public during the course of the year 1840. Terms, three dollars per annum, in advance, or five dollars for two years, or two separate subscriptions, or ten copies for twenty dollars, cash. Printed in large octavo, white, thick paper, good type, etc. Each number contains as much matter as a volume of a novel; the illustrations are of the first quality. During the past year, nearly FIFTY of the most superior engravings have adorned its pages. The volumes for 1840 will be splendidly illustrated; each No. will contain three or four engravings, in line, mezzotint, lithograph and wood. The January and February numbers contain five of Cruikshank's most humorous designs, a fine likeness on steel, of Mr. Vandenhoff, the popular actor, engraved by Forrest, with an original and entertaining biography. Also, a splendid picture of the talented Miss Vandenhoff, with a memoir; also, a humorous representation of the Tournament at Englinton, with four engravings, illustrating the aquatic sports of England and America, and an engraved frontispiece and title page.

In the course of the present volume, the most interesting record ever written, will be given to the public in the

and passed the desert ridges of the Rocky Mountains. This eventful journey, wherein a handful of men encountered perils, scarcely to be believed, occurred a few years before the time of Lewis and Clark. The MS. is now in the hands of the editors, and in the January number its publication was commenced; also, a series of humorous and characteristic papers, from the pen of Jos. C. Neal, whose inimitable "Charcoal Sketches" have justly gained him the title of "The American Boz."

Edited by WM. E. BURTON and EDGAR A. POE.

To render Burton's Magazine the most desirable monthly publication for the present year, the proprietor, in addition to the promised articles from his powerful list of contributors, ensures a series of papers of original value, from the pens of the best authors in the United States. To perfect this arrangement he offers a in befitting sums, for articles of value, written expressly for the Magazine, and sent in, postage free, before the expiration of the month of February.

Premium of $1000

Important to Rail Road Companies.

THE subscriber offers to the public a new and improved mode of ascending and descending Inclined Plains on Rail Roads. This improvement supercedes the necessity of horse or stationary power, by giving to the locomotive engine a new wheel, affixed to one of the axles of the motive, which connects with an extra railing laid in the centre of the road, on the plain. As the engine approaches the plain, the pilot wheel on the centre of the axle, falls into gear with the extra railing and propels her onward. The construction and connection of the pilot wheel and extra railing is of such a character that it not only necessarily advances, but advances perfectly smooth, and cannot be impeded by the congealing of ice, the connection of the wheel and railing being on the right and left of the tread.

Rail Road companies or managers wanting further information, will please address the subscriber, at Harrisville, Harrison county, Ohio, or William P. Ellis, Washington city, who has obtained the right of the State of Maryland by purchase, or William C. Pool, of Baltimore, who has the right of Georgia, North and South Carolina, on commission.

Important to Farmers.

FARMERS are hereby invited to procure the hitherto unrivalled HULLING MILL.—This machine can be attached to any of the powers now in common use, and is calculated to save a great amount of manual labor. Clover-seed can be hulled at the rate of from three to five bushels per hour;—Rice can be hulled at the rate of twenty-five bushels per hour;—Oats, Barley or Spelts, can be hulled at the rate of thirty bushels per hour, ready for flouring;—Corn can be made into hominy at the rate of twenty bushels per hour. Corn, Oats, Rye, Barley, Spelts, or Buck-wheat, can be chopped at the rate of fifteen bushels per hour.

A moment's reflection will convince the Farmer of the advantage of possessing such a labor-saving machine. Is he a Rice grower?—he can prepare his Rice for the market in one-fourth of the time usually spent, and with one-fourth of the labor. Has he a surplus of Corn?—instead of selling it for twenty-five cents, he can make it into hominy and sell it for two dollars per bushel. Has he a surplus of Barley?—instead of selling it for fifty cents per bushel, he can hull and sell it for six cents per pound, &c. &c. The simplicity, durability, portability, and usefulness of this Mill, recommend it as one of the most desirable and money producing machines of modern invention.

Those wishing to procure this machine in Georgia, North or South Carolina, can address William C. Pool, Baltimore, Maryland; those of the State of Maryland, can address Richard B. Chinoweth, also of Baltimore; in this region of country, can address Lewis Ward, of Zanesville, Levi B. Ball, of Putnam, Abraham Baker, of Mt. Vernon, or Mr. Hanawalt, of Licking county; other sections can address the subscriber at Harrisville, Harrison county, Ohio. The most liberal terms will be given to mechanics who may wish to make, vend and use this Hulling Mill in sections not yet occupied. We invite the public to call and see for themselves.

HUMOROUS.

On the Rev. J. G.'s killing a Snake with his Umbrella and breaking it.

As Jemmy rode along one day,
Not sleeping or awake,
Starting, before him he espied
A frightful unco snake.

Says Jemmy, "heigh! what do ye mean,
Ye wrath-provoking crature?
Whence ha' ye come till fright me so?
There's death in every fature.

"Weel, I'm resolv'd to make ye' pay
For such a misdemeanor;
(At this his eyes began to flash, Appearing ten-fold keener.)

"Now if your phiz I rightly ken,
Ye look exceeding surly,
And if ye' wish to know my name,
They call me Jemmy Gurley."

The snake, unconscious of his doom,
Lay pleasantly a sunning,
But had he known our hero's wrath,
For safety he'd been running.

"What weapon shall I use," he cried,
"To end your frightful being?
Of all the sights I ever saw,
The worst I now am seeing."

At this, dismounting from his horse,
One foot in air—one grounded,
Umbrella was the weapon us'd—
With this its head he pounded.

But just as victory's voice he heard,
And saw the serpent dying,
He found th' umbrella's strength give way—
In fragments it was flying.

"Weel," says the hero of our tale,
"All conquorer's ha' their trouble,
But such a victory, with small loss,
Rewards the hero double." D.

A friend requests us to publish the following additional verses to the poem called "The Family Bible."—Ed.

1. Blest Bible, the light and the guide of the stranger,
With thee I'm encircled with parents and friends,
Thy kind admonitions will guide me from danger,
On thee my last lingering hopes then depend.
Hope wakens to vigor and rises to glory,
I'll hasten and flee to the bright promis'd land,
And for refuge lay hold on the hope set before me,
Reveal'd in the Bible that lays on the stand.

2. Hail thou the brightest and best of the morning,
The star that hath guided my parents safe home,
The beams of thy glory my path way adorning,
Shall scatter my darkness and brighten my gloom;
As wandering sages to worship the stranger,
Did hasten their way unto Canaan's fair land,
I'll bow to adore him, but not in a manger—
He's seen in the Bible that lays on the stand.

3. Though age and misfortune press hard on my feelings,
I'll flee to the Bible and trust in the Lord;
Though darkness should cover his merciful dealings,
My soul is still cheer'd by the heavenly word:
But now from things earthly my soul is removing,
I soon shall shout glory with heaven's bright band,
And with raptures of joy be forever adoring,
The God of the Bible that lays on the stand.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: It seems that my remarks in your twenty-fifth number have called forth a reply from the Rev. Mr. Dalbey, of Pittsburgh. I should not have noticed it, however, if he had not done me such injustice in the sentiments which he attributes to me. I am a little surprised, from the reputation of that gentleman, that he should so completely loose both himself and the subject in the fog, as he has on this occasion.

In the first place, my main position he passes by in total silence. He says not a word in defence of those ministers who take a leading part in the abolition question, now that it is assuming a political campaign. Can it be possible that the gentleman's ambition leads him to aspire to the appointment of foreign minister, or to stand at the head of one of the Bureaus at Washington, and that he wishes to keep this subject in the dark until he gets his abolition President installed, so that he may be certain of his reward? We repeat it again, that the public have a right to make the abolition of slavery a political question if they see proper, but we insist on it, that, whenever it assumes this attitude, ministers of religion should take no leading part in the matter. As long as it remained purely a moral question, it was a proper theme for the minister, but as soon as it entered the political arena, ministers of the gospel should have given the lead to politicians.

After quoting God's injuction to the prophet, "show my people their transgressions," he adds, "but this kind FATHER and DICTATOR to the ministers of Christ's gospel, cautions them against the discussion of 'a moral offence' in a RELIGIOUS periodical," &c. And why did not the liberal minded gentleman tell his readers the reason, which is—first; because abolition is now assuming a political phasis, and politics is not a fit subject for a "religious periodical." This difficulty he has not even attempted to touch. And all that eloquence about the "embassadors of the cross not cringing to such dictation," but despising "popular taste," and "denouncing sins of every grade," and especially exerting themselves in behalf of the "dumb victims of oppression," is an assault upon the public sympathy which may be designed to make political capital. I, however, hope better things of the gentleman. But still, man is such a riddle to himself, even though he may not be sensible of such a motive, yet, it may be the very consideration which is unconsciously moving him to action. The thought of standing high in the confidence of the President of a great nation, and reaping the emoluments of a profitable office, are very infatuating ideas, and are calculated to work wonders upon the moral faculty. But secondly: if the abolition question had not assumed a political aspect, I think, under existing circumstances, it is highly improper to introduce abolition discussion into the pages of the Recorder, for, first—it is not necessary, as there are a number of papers in the west, which, in whole, or in part, are dedicated to that particular question: secondly—we repeat once more, that, from the exciting nature of the subject it could not be introduced in the paper without injury to the special object for which it was established, —the promotion of the interests of ecclesiastical liberty.

There is scarcely an important enterprise in the land, that has not one or more papers dedicated to its particular interests. But what would be thought of the Temperance Recorders, the Medical Journals, the Agricultural papers, &c., &c., if they were to enter into this agitating discussion? Would it not be, in them, the height of folly?—What is a more important subject than that of ecclesiastical liberty? Priestly tyranny has reduced more nations to bondage, ignorance and superstition, than there are slave States in the Union. It has caused more blood to flow, and more misery to exist among mankind, by a thousand fold, than was ever caused by American Slavery, bad as it is. But, will the abolition papers permit this discussion, as now going on among the Methodists, to be introduced into their columns? I trow not, sir. As much as they vapor about a muzzled press, introduce that question to them, and you will find the abolition press just as much muzzled as any in the land. I refer you to the controversy between the editor of the Recorder and the editor of the Philanthropist. The latter had insinuated that the former was "pledged to silence" on the anti-slavery question: when, he of the Recorder, in order to satisfy the public who was "pledged to silence," proposed to open his columns to what the other might write on the subject of American Slavery, if, in turn, the columns of the Philanthropist would be open to what he might write on the subject of Ecclesiastical Slavery. But the champion of "Human Rights" not only declined the proposition, but acted like any thing save the gentleman, plainly shewing that he had no intention of carrying out the principles of free discussion in his own columns, in the manner which he so abusively enforced on others. This term, 'free discussion,' works wonders in the mouths of abolitionists, but when it comes to be tested in their own columns, it means the discussion of just such subjects, and them only, as suit their own cause.—As it respects the Prospectus, to which I am referred, it is nothing new to me. And in reference to what is said about the 'patriotic editor,' I would simply remark, if his correspondents would treat this subject with as much discretion as he does, there would be little cause of complaint. But, however, the patrons of the Recorder mean to hold both the editor and his correspondents responsible to public opinion, for the manner they shall discuss any subject whatever.

The gentleman indicates, that I am not satisfied, because he did not say something in "abhorrence of abolition," at which he supposes I would be "highly gratified," &c. Now this suggestion is perfectly gratuitous, and is an illiberal inference from my article, one object of which was to shew, that ministers of religion should so conduct themselves as to be worthy the confidence of all parties, that they might be prepared to promote the spiritual interests of all. The very ground of my objection to the gentleman, was, that he had advertised himself to be a party man, and that this would disqualify him, to some extent, for usefulness with the opposite party;—the pastor should endeavor to be the servant of all, and should therefore treat all with kindness and respect. While we are upon this subject, and as I am not a minister, I shall take the liberty to say that I equally object to the spirit manifested by the pro-slavery men and the abolitionists. The first, with their mobs and their riots, deserve the condemnation of every friend of order; and the latter, with their provoking and taunting denunciations, equally deserve the censure of calm and dispassionate men. These pronounce their southern neighbors to be "tyrants," "murderers," "man stealers," &c. &c., and this is called "moral sausion," by which it is proposed to convince them of their error. That man must be very ignorant of human nature, indeed, who would presume to convince any one in the use of such terms as these. In fact, there is a denunciatory and reckless spirit manifested all round, upon this exciting topic, which shews that reason has left her throne among all the parties.

Again, says Mr. D., "I think" "I have as good a right to make my principles known to the church, for whose interest I have labored since her first organization, as J. SMITH." The gentleman has applied to me the appellation FATHER, and has endeavored to shew himself witty in the use of the term. But nothing that I have said begins to breathe so much of the spirit of the true patriarch as the sentence here quoted. He has been an ancient laborer in her service,—ever since the church's birth he has been toiling to promote her "interests." Therefore he has superior claims—patriarchal claims to embue her with his peculiar "principles." And notwithstanding, nine-tenths of even the abolitionists themselves, do not wish to see this exciting subject introduced into a paper, which should be a bond of cement and union to a youthful and struggling community, yet, his ancient services entitle him to the privilege of appearing on its pages, to politely tell the slaveholder, in substance, that he is a "man stealer," and that the devil is his "father." Such courteous "moral suasion," from such a venerable source, cannot fail to produce lasting conviction! But more particularly when he considers the "dumbness of churches" is it the duty of this "FATHER" in Israel to enlighten them with his sage instructions. I would here suggest for the gentleman's consideration,—whether, has the church done the most for him, or he for the church? Whether, is the obligation the strongest, on his part, to sacrifice his opinions to the welfare of the church, or, on the part of the church, to sacrifice her interests to his peculiar notions? Some serious reflections, I think, on the nature of these queries would have a salutary influence.

I cannot close without referring to the gentleman's insinuation as it respects my infidelity.—It is true he has not called me one, in so many words, but he has classed me with them, and indicates that I am as much worthy of attention as they are. This smells mighty much of popery. In the days of papal ignorance, when any man held an opinion contrary to the sentiments of his Holiness, he was at once branded with infidelity, or classed with infidels. Now, I can assure the gentleman, if he ever converts me to christianity, it will not be by this kind of insinuation; nor, were I a slaveholder, would he ever dissaude me from the error of my way by calling me a 'man stealer' and a child of the devil.

He also indicates that I am opposed to the "sanctification of the church from the pollutions of slavery." And where did he learn this? Or did he say so, because he was at a loss for something else to say? Are any of your Conference slave holders? Have they not passed a resolution declaring slavery to be a "great evil?" What more do you want them to do? I am afraid, sir, though you do not intend it, that notwithstanding there may be at work an unconscious motive in favor of your abolition President. The "sanctification" of the church and every thing else, must be made to contribute to that desirable end. Under cover of the sacred and imposing terms, "patriotism," "philanthrophy" and "religion," it is proposed to conceal this design, until the object is accomplished.—All great agitators are generally found to reside in the large cities. Their location gives them a degree of fictitious importance with the public. Then they, in turn, on the success of their parties, usually receive the richest reward. These considerations cannot well help exciting the zeal of our Pittsburgh friend. If the church were to turn him out to beat the brush awhile, it might have a salutary influence in regulating his temperament.

Now, I wish the gentleman to understand me, I do not impeach his integrity. I am willing to admit, that, for honesty of purpose, he stands in the front rank of his fellows. But still, I hold he is liable to err, and to be under the influence of motives of which he is not fairly conscious himself. I admit his right to be a MODERN abolitionist, if he thinks proper, and that he ought not to be any the more, nor any the less esteemed for this opinion. I admit that he has a right to communicate his views to the public, but not through every medium, even among those which are dedicated to moral subjects. What paper in the country is sustaining a greater "moral enterprize" than the Temperance Recorder? yet, that man must be phrenzied, indeed, who would clamor about his right to trouble that messenger of mercy with this vexed question. I admit his right to be an abolition lecturer if he see proper, but in that event, if he possesses a proper sense of duty, he will resign his pastoral charge and enter the field as such. I also admit his right to vote for his abolition President, but not to make the pulpit nor the religious press subserve the interests of his election. Every intelligent and patriotic citizen, who wishes to guard against the union of the Church and State, will raise his warning voice against any such a movement as this. And if "slavery itself will compel us to speak and act on this subject," it will "compel" us as politicians and not as religionists.

With regard to the duty of the Western Recorder, in reference to this question, I should suppose all it ought to be required to do, is, to publish the resolutions and decisions of your official bodies, in relation thereto. This, I should say, no man ought to except to. The decision of public bodies are usually couched in decent and respectful language. But, to claim, that every essayist, who chooses, has a right to enter its columns, to have the supreme pleasure of telling the slaveholder he is a "tyrant," a "man stealer," a "child of the devil" &c., I think, to say the least about it, is very illy calculated to save the church from the "pollutions of slavery."

May I not hope, however, that when the gentleman and myself come properly to explain our respective opinions on this exciting question, that we are not so wide apart as might be supposed. With all due respect, I subscribe myself

J. SMITH.

BOWLINGREEN, IA., MARCH 17, 1840.

Dear Brother:—I like your course pursued in the Recorder, in not interfering with politics, only in cases of palpable usurpation of power; and I think, that should be exposed either in Church or State. For no true republican can stand by and see his liberties either in Church or State usurped, and hold his peace. Nay, he is verily guilty if he seeth the enemy coming on, either body or soul, and doth not raise his voice or wield his quill to warn the people of their danger. I am your Brother in Christ,

J. D. MEDEARIS.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

ZANESVILLE CIRCUIT,
Springfield Chapel, March 24, 1840.

Mr. Editor: Agreeably to public notice given in the "Western Recorder" of the 11th instant, a protracted meeting of the Methodist Protestant Church commenced at Springfield chapel, in the vicinity of your office, on Friday the 13th, at early candlelight. Sir, notwithstanding I am but an humble layman, I feel that it is my privilege, by your permission, to speak through your valuable, yea, I may with propriety add, very valuable paper, of the goodness of God to many precious souls, during the protracted interview. The meeting continued until Monday morning without much prospects of a glorious termination; at which time, the members, together with a large number of persons whose minds, it afterwards appeared, had been seriously awakened, convened for the purpose of enjoying the benefits of a love-feast; in which, Mr. Editor, the humble followers of the meek and lowly Lamb that taketh away the sins of the world, did emphatically enjoy a love-feast. The fathers in Israel, who have borne the "burden and heat of the day," were made to rejoice in the God of their salvation, and encouraged to prosecute, with renewed vigor, their journey to the skies. The babes in Christ were also invigorated to put their trust in Him who hath redeemed them, not with the corruptible things of this world, but with His own most precious blood, and manifested a strong determination, by the grace of God, to run with patience, the whole length of the celestial road. Hard hearted sinners were made to feel and see their awful condition by reason of their exceeding sinfulness and their disobedience to the divine injunctions of the God who made them. At the close of the love-feast, ten requested probationary privileges and were accordingly, as such, admitted into the church. "Come thou with us," says the church, to all who are inquiring the way to Zion, "and we will do thee good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel."

On Monday evening, Bro. Fairchild's sermon was followed by a brief, but powerful exhortation from Bro. Thrap; after which, preparations were made and an invitation given to those who desired an interest in the blood of Christ—four presented themselves at the altar—three of whom emerged from nature's darkness into the light and liberty of the children of God. But, Mr. Editor, the most interesting scene that I ever witnessed was during this evening's exercises; the scene in question, was a gentleman and his wife prostrate, within a few feet of each other, at the foot-stool of Sovereign Mercy, pleading the merits of a Saviour's blood. This was truly a sight over which Angels and pious men could cordially unite in rejoicing. They however, wrestled, Jacob like, 'till God for Christ's sake pardoned their sins.

Tuesday evening, the citizens of the neighborhood assembled again—the exercises were similar to those on the previous evening—10 or 12 individuals meekly kneeled at the mourners' bench—they prayed, and the people of God prayed with and for them; none, on this occasion, professed to have found the "pearl of great price."

Wednesday evening, the people flocked, in due time, to God's earthly sanctuary. Brother Fairchild preached, and after the delivery of a few practical remarks by Bro. Thrap, the mourners were requested to come forward—some availed themselves of the opportunity and prayed earnestly for the removal of the load of guilt that then rested so heavily upon them. This evening, one only, was enabled to testify that God hath power on earth to forgive sins. The value of one soul, however, is incalculable; for, in the language of inspiration, "What would it profit a man if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul."

Thursday evening, in conformity to previous notice, a very large concourse of the citizens of the neighborhood convened for the purpose of securing to themselves the advantages arising from properly attending to the exercises of a General Class-meeting. It continued about an hour and a half,—during that time there was much speaking,—every soul who testified for God, expressed a determination, by His grace, to continue in the ways of holiness. At the conclusion of the class-meeting, arrangements were made for the reception of sin-sick souls—thirteen bowed at the mourners' bench, and four, after profusely shedding penitential tears and uttering from the bottom of their hearts, the prayer of the poor Publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner," obtained the remission of their sins. From the time the mourners kneeled, until the congregation was dismissed, I think no pen, save that of an Angel, could portray the glorious dealings of God to the hearts of His people. I therefore, leave the reader to his own imagination.

Friday evening, we had another refreshing season—the members appeared to be alive to God—mourners presented themselves at the altar and prayed loud and long to be extricated from their miserable condition,—four found peace with God.

Sabbath evening, notwithstanding it was the conclusion of the protracted meeting, some four or five were found at the altar, praying for mercy. Accession to the church,—nineteen; seventeen were from the ranks of Satan, and the other two, who joined on the occasion, enjoyed full membership in the Methodist Protestant Church in another part of the District, having recently moved to this circuit.

The above description of our meeting, Mr. Editor, is as accurately given as the feeble abilities of your unworthy correspondent would enable him. A YOUNG MEMBER.

ADAMSVILLE CT., O., MARCH 18, 1840.

Bro. Springer: I have delayed reporting from Adamsville circuit until the present, from the circumstance of not having that pleasing intelligence to communicate that I desired. The circuit has been in rather low condition for some time. This probably may be attributed to affliction in the family of my predecessor, Brother McConnell, during his last quarter, and my own affliction during my first quarter, which has caused a train of disappointments for some six or seven months. These exercised a discouraging influence in many parts of the circuit. But thanks be to God, notwithstanding our discouragements, a portion of our membership have kept alive in religion; others are arousing to an increased attention to the means of grace, and sinners are inquiring "what shall I do to be saved?" These are comfortable indications that the Lord hath not forsaken His people. We believe He will ere long visit us more powerfully with the outpouring of His spirit and the display of His power in operating upon the heart of the sinner.

We have just closed a protracted meeting at Prospect meeting house. Bros. Stephens and Linder were in attendance, whose labors were evidently blest of the Lord. During the meeting seven united with us in church fellowship, making in all thirty-seven since Conference.

Yours, respectfully,

PHINEAS INSKEEP, Supt. Ad. Ct.

BROOKLYN, OHIO, MARCH 10, 1830.

Mr. Editor: Our first quarterly meeting for Cleveland circuit, was held in Orange. The Lord was with us of a truth. Several professed religion,—and the members were much stirred up and encouraged to look for greater manifestations.

We have had since a refreshing time in Cleveland. Several hundred in that place have professed religion, and about fifty have united on probation with the Methodist Protestant Church. In Brighton village, about forty have united with us; among whom, are a large share of heads of families and valuable materials. Since Conference, one hundred and twenty have united with us. Bro. Cass labored with us at the protracted meeting in Brighton, to profit, and Bro. Reynolds in Cleveland.

But while the Lord has been dealing out mercies with one hand, He has chastised us with the other. Two of our beloved sisters are no more.

Sister MILLS, of Auburn, aged sixty-three years, returning from a funeral on horse back, was thrown from her horse and killed instantly. The fortieth anniversary of her marriage closed her eyes in death. In her, the family, the church and the neighborhood have sustained a loss which will be severely felt.

REBECCA DODD, consort of Harrison Dodd, a young convert at Brighton, a star in the kingdom of grace too bright for mortality, after a short but severe illness, fell asleep in Christ, leaving behind her undisputed evidence of her acceptance with God. These have both, we have little doubt, left the church militant to join the church triumphant.

Our third quarterly meeting will be held in Brighton, May 30th and 31st, at which time the President is expected to be with us. Assistance from abroad is requested.

Yours, &c., L. M. COCHRAN.

BROWN CO., O., MARCH 20, 1840.

Bro. Springer: Last Sabbath evening we closed a good quarterly meeting on this circuit. Three were added to the church. Times are getting some better, and we are trying to hope against hope for future success.

Our next quarterly meeting will be held on the 10th of May next, at the Nebo meeting house on Clover creek, and we invite Bros. M'Guire, Hughey and Euans to our assistance, and I will return the service if they will give me timely notice. Yours &c.

JAMES ROSE.

Brother Springer:—Through the goodness and mercy of God we are still alive as a church, although we have had some cause of discouragement, since the commencement of this Conference year, as we have lost several members by removal. I hope the Lord will bless them and make them useful where they are gone. But we have had some refreshing times. At our first quarterly meeting we had a gracious season; the older members were blest, some sinners converted and five added to the church. Our presidential meeting was one of the very best for the members. There were five added to the church at this meeting. At our second quarterly meeting we had good congregations, and serious attention paid to the word of life. Four were added to the church, and two since, both heads of families; our prospects begin to look up.

Brother Clark is a worthy man, and much beloved by his people. I hope the Lord will continue to bless his labours amongst us. Five miles below us on the river, Brother C. has formed a class of about sixteen members. Some belong to Ohio circuit, two to this station, but the larger number are from the world. Next Saturday and Sabbath he and brother Herbert hold a two days meeting there. May the Lord bless their labours in that place.

For two weeks past our place has been visited by the small-pox, which has been afflicting to our citizens. The way it was introduced appears to be by a young man living in our town receiving a letter from his brother in old Lancaster, Pennsylvania, who had just recovered from the disease; from this letter he took the small-pox and died, and from him it has spread through town. Seven or eight cases now exist here, one very bad.

Brother Springer, my heart has been made to rejoice while reading the revival intelligence that has been communicated through your paper, since Conference.—Oh! that God may bless us as a church and make us a holy God-fearing people. May our light so shine around us, that every species of darkness and tyranny may be done away, in our happy land.

Yours in the bonds of a peaceful gospel. Amen. Adieu.

THE RICHEST GEM.—A disconsolate Peri stood one morn at the gate of Eden suing for admission. It was told that entrance could only be obtained in one way, and that was to traverse the earth and procure a gem, the richest it contained, and present it to the keeper of the celestial gate, which, if approved, would be a passport to the world of spirits.—The Peri accepted the proposal, and went in search of that most valuable of all earth's riches. It explored land and sea from pole to pole, and finally found a lump of pure and solid gold. This it deemed most priceless—grasped it in aerial fingers and struck its pinions for the celestial world. The gold was refused and the Peri despatched to seek another gem more priceless still.—It roamed through groves and flowers, by the deep ocean's shore, the wild mountain's brow, & the silver stream —went to the battle field and caught the last drop of blood which streamed from the young warrior's heart as he sunk in death in the cause of liberty. With that and other gems, it struck its pinions once more for the abode of happiness, but was refused at the gate, its offering being unworthy. A third time the Peri sought to find the richest gem. It, after many days of weary search, passing through a deep dark glen, robed in autumnal hue, espied a sleeping infant. It stooped and gazed upon the babe, absorbed in admiring the sweetness and innocence of its faultless face—was about to bear it off as the first born prize, ("for of such is the kingdom of heaven,") when a dark and haggard robber came from the thickened forest through the leaves and stood bending over the sleeping child; the robber gazed with silent awe and admiration —he thought of his own infantile days when he was pure as the slumbering child before him—contrasted his present life, his degraded virtues and his adamantine heart with the sleeping innocent at his murderous feet--his breast moved with compassion, his eyes melted a tear, the angel snatched it, struck its pinions for paradise—offered the boon—it was the tear of penitence, and found admission.—Baltimore Post.

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.—About two centuries before the birth of Christ, She-hwang-te [the book burner,] constructed the great wall of China to stop Tartar incursions. The wall, which has always been considered one of the world's wonders, is 1500 miles in length, of great height and thickness, furnished with fortresses and towers innumerable, and is carried with singular skill over mountains and rivers, as well as across the plains and valleys. Lord Macartney exclaimed on seeing it, that it was certainly the most stupenduous work of human hands, and he rationally concluded that at the remote period of its building, China must have been a very powerful and civilized empire. Dr. Johnson was accustomed to say of it, that it would be an honor to any many to say that his grandfather had seen the great wall of China. Mr. Barrow, who saw it with Macartney, went into some amusing calculations as to the quantity of the materials of all the dwelling houses of England and Scotland, supposing them at that period (at the end of the last century) to amount to 1,800,000, and to average 2000 cubic feet of brick work or masonry, would be barely equivalent to the bulk of the wall, without taking in its fortresses or towers, which he calculated contained as much masonry and brick work as London did at that time. Stupendous as was the work, it failed in its object.

Envy, if surrounded on all sides by the brightness of another's prosperity, like the scorpion, confined within a circle of fire, will sting itself to death.—Lacon.

MUSIC.—'Music is the food of love,' but we have found out that it takes something more substantial for matrimony.

WESTERN RECORDER.

From the Brother Jonathan.

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY.— The correspondence communicated to Congress on the 12th ultimo, by the President, consists of two letters which have passed between Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox, in relation to the alledged preparations on the disputed territory. The letter of Mr. Forsyth, dated March 6, covers the report of Mr. Wiggin, the substance of which appeared in this paper of yesterday. The reply of Mr. Fox, is dated March 7. He says that after deducting from these reports what is fanciful, and what is conjectural, "the alleged points of variance do not appear to the undersigned to be by any means so material, as they seem to have been considered by the government of the United States."

He denies that the establishment at Lake Temiscouta is a new one, as a detachment has been stationed there from time to time since 1837, when the necessity of marching reinforcements from New Brunswick to Canada commenced. With regard to the buildings spoken of, he says they are for the shelter of troops on the march, and the lodgment of stores, &c. They have been in the course of construction from a period antecedent to the provisional agreement. The letter concludes:

"The undersigned will not refrain from here remarking upon one point of comparison exhibited in the present controversy. It is admitted by the United States authorities that the armed bands stationed by the Government of Maine in the neighborhood of the Arostook river, have fortified those stations with artillery; and it is now objected as matter of complaint against the British authorities, with reference to the buildings at Lake Temiscouta, not that those buildings are furnished with artillery, but only that they are defended by palisades capable of resisting artillery. It would be difficult to adduce stronger evidence of the acts on the one side being those of aggression, and on the other of defence.

The fact, shortly, is, and this is the essential point of the argument, that her Majesty's authorities have not as yet altered their state of preparation, or strengthened their military means within the disputed territory, with a view to settling the question of the boundary, although, the attitude assumed by the State of Maine with reference to that question, would be a clear justification of such measures; and it is much to be apprehended that the adoption of such measures will sooner or later become indispensable, if the people of Maine be not compelled to desist from the extensive system of armed aggression which they are continuing to carry on in other parts of the same disputed territory.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Sec'ry of State of the United States the assurance of distinguished considerations. H. S. Fox.

For two weeks before the sailing of the Great Western, the British House of Commons had been in a state of vehement agitation about a question of privilege.— It appears that in a Report made to the House on the causes of vice in the metropolis, one Stockdale, a publisher of the worst sort of books, was very severely treated. The Report was published by Mr. Hansard—Printer of the House, whom Stockdale straight way prosecuted for a libel. He was sustained by the Court of Queen's Bench, on the ground that the House of Commons had no more right to publish libels than an individual. The House after infinite indignation duly expressed, committed for contempt, the attorney and his clerks who issued the process and the deputy Sheriff who executed it. Petitions and remonstrances were flying about in all directions, and it was doubtful which party would at last get up the biggest storm.—Charles. Mer.

ANOTHER BOUNDARY QUESTION.—The Territorial Legislature of Wisconsin have set up a claim to all that part of Illinois which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the extreme southern point of Lake Michigan; thus including Chicago, Galena, a large portion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and, at least fourteen counties; and have resolved that it is inexpedient for Wisconsin to be admitted as a State into the Union, unless this claim is acceded to.

The Wisconsin Legislature found this claim upon the fifth article of the "Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States north-west of the river Ohio," commonly called "the Ordinance of 1787."

THE AMERICAN MINISTER IN PARIS.— "The American Ambassador's rout on Thursday evening, was, as usual, most numerously and fashionably attended.— Many English visiters of distinction were seen in General Cass' elegant saloons. The son of the late Emperor of Mexico, Iturbide, was amongst the guests."

"There were a great number of very elegant balls given last week, among the list were those given by General Cass, the American Minister."—Galignani's Messenger.

A RUSSIAN EMBASSY TO CHINA.—It is stated that an embassy from St. Petersburg is about to set out for Pekin, and that the embassy consists of military officers of distinction, whose mission may be presumed to be that of assisting the Chinese by their counsel in the approaching conflict with Great Britain.

ESCAPE FROM THE BROOKLYN PRISON.— Wednesday, Bill Smith, alias Mouse, escaped from prison at Brooklyn, in the following remarkable manner. By aid of some tools which had been furnished him by some one from without, he unscrewed the nuts and drew out the bars of his cell—then picking the lock of the outer door, he gained the cockloft of the building, where by much labor he succeeded in making a hole in the stone wall, from which he escaped, by letting himself to the ground with a large rope furnished from without, and which was left tied to a beam in the cockloft.

Mouse was convicted of petit larceny at the February term of the General Sessions, but was subsequently surrendered to the authorities of Queens County to take his trial for being concerned with one Ritchie, in a highway robbery.— Ritchie was sentenced to 7 years state prison, for his participation in the robbery: and Mouse and Chas. Ross, his partners, bid fair to receive similar justice. Mouse is a noted rogue, and will be easily recaptured.—Brother Jonathan.

STOP THE MURDERERS.—About six weeks since a man was murdered on the Atchafulaya river, by three brothers, notorious desperadoes and the terror of the neighborhood. They were arrested, carried to Opelousas and imprisoned. A few days after their imprisonment they broke jail and escaped. They returned to the house of the man whom they had killed, where they found his wife and two daughters. They murdered his wife also, and then carried off the daughters, whom they compelled to live with them in their hiding place.

The circumstance created a very great excitement amongst the planters in the neighborhood, a number of whom, with the assistance of some Indians, went in pursuit of the murderers. Their retreat was soon discovered, when one of them, the most desperate of the gang, was shot through the head with a rifle ball and killed. The other two were again taken to Opelousas and imprisoned. A few days ago, owing to carelessness or wilful neglect on the part of the jailor, the door of the prison was left unlocked, and the wretches again escaped. We give the particulars as we have received them from a gentleman direct from Opelousas. —New Orleans Picayune.

CURIOSITY.—Mr. Leonard Scott of this city, brought to our office yesterday a steel trap, grown fast into a tree, showing the jaws on one side and a piece of the pan on the other, and being so completely embedded in the wood, as to lead one almost to suppose it part and parcel of the tree itself. It was found in Ohio forty-five feet up the tree, and the old hunters and trappers there say it must have been carried up by some animal of the cat kind, which probably perished and left the trap in the forks, which have since grown round it in the manner mentioned. It is certainly a great curiosity, and would be an acquisition worth making to one of our museums or to any cabinet of curiosties private or public.— Mr. S. has placed it in the window of Tiffany & Young's Fancy Store, 259 Broadway, where it will remain a few days for the gratification of the curious.—New York Evening Post.

WASHINGTON, MARCH 18, 1840.

In the Senate yesterday, the Cumberland Road bill was taken up, and a motion was made to postpone its further consideration until Monday next, which, after some remarks from Messrs. Tappan, Young and Smith, in opposition, was lost—yeas 15, nays 22. Mr. Norvell then offered an amendment to the bill, which embraced nearly a hundred appropriations for roads and harbors in all sections of the Union—at an expense of two millions of dollars. Mr. Tappan inquired why Mr. Norvell did not include the pay of members of Congress, and an appropriation for the purchase of books, as he seemed disposed to make an omnium gatherum of the bill. Mr. N. replied that in his opinion, this was the only mode by which these appropriations could be got through Congress, and that opinion had induced him to tack them to the Cumberland Road. He then moved that it should be postponed until Thursday, which was agreed to—yeas 20, nays 14. The bill more effectually to secure public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters was taken up, and after some unimportant amendments was informally passed over. The Senate then went into secret session on the nomination of Calvin Blythe to the collectorship of the port of Philadelphia, which was confirmed.— This is a most excellent appointment, and will be very popular with the democracy of that State.

In the House, the morning hour was consumed in debating the question of printing the report of the committee on elections. The Treasury note bill was then taken up, and debated by Mr. Cushing, who is one of the most liberal whigs of the body, and treated the subject as a national, and not a party question.

In the Senate to-day, nothing of interest was done, the morning hour being consumed in debating a pension bill which proposed to give Lemuel White forty dollars a year for services in the Revolution, but the proof being defective, it gave rise to debate; but eventually humanity triumphed over justice, and the bill was orderd to be engrossed. The Senate then went into secret session on the treaty concluded some time since with the New York Indians.

In the House, the morning hour was again consumed in debating the motion to print the evidence taken by the Committee on Elections. The Treasury Note bill was taken up.

MT. PLEASANT, O., JAN. 18th, 1840.

SILK BUSINESS.—Sir: Your letter of the 13th ultimo was duly received, and in reply I may inform you that I am more than ever confirmed in the belief that the silk business will succeed in this country. You have no doubt been informed that I commenced the business eight or nine years ago. At that time there was no Multicaulis fever; nor any silk fever in the country. I soon became convinced that the business was not only practicable, but that it would soon become very profitable, and finally a great national source of wealth. I came to this conclusion by the force of experimental facts that developed themselves from year to year, as I experimented in a small way on the native leaf. About four years ago I extended my operations and raised and manufactured 80 yards of pongee handkerchiefs; this was done under every disadvantage that was possible to be encountered and overcome by human exertion, with the exception that I fortunately became acquainted with Mr. R. Fox, a skilful silk weaver, who wove my web. I had every difficulty to encounter that human patience was competent to endure.— Limited in my means, a sickly family to attend to, two of whom died soon after— nothing but the native leaf to depend upon, and they scattered over the fields and woods of four or five miles square; no knowledge of the art of reeling, throwing or training of silk, nor any work on the subject that I could obtain any knowledge from—embarrassed in my circumstances, and viewed as a maniac by most of my neighbors on account of my engaging in so visionary a project, as they esteemed the silk business to be.

Such were the circumstances under which I commenced the business; and, independent of such circumstances, I have witnessed enough to convince me that the growing of silk is profitable, and will become a great source of national wealth.

Within the last two years a very respectable number of the farmers of this vicinity have become equally, "visionary," and are preparing to engage in the business of growing silk.—You are aware that I. W. Gill took hold and assisted in establishing a factory in this place, which we got into successful operation last August; and if any doubt had existed in relation to the success of the business it must now vanish, for we have succeeded beyond our most sanguine expectations. I am, however, no longer interested in the factory here, but am about to transfer my operations to Wheeling, having taken stock in a company about to be chartered at that place. My residing here will not injuriously affect the establishment. Mr. Gill is fully satisfied with the profits of the business, and he has never lacked enterprise when there was a fair prospect of reward. Wheeling possesses advantages in the manufacturing line that this place can never enjoy, and as I intend to devote the balance of my time to the business, I wish to locate where I can pursue it with the least possible inconvenience.

You inform me that the trade in Multicaulis is dull in your place, and wish to be informed how it is here. The trade here is just as it ought to be; trees sell at fair prices in small lots to practical men who want them for their own use, not for speculation. This speculating in the trees has done more to injure the silk business than all the preachers of "humbug" who swarm the country from Maine to Georgia. No man ought to touch a mulberry tree unless he intends to go to feeding worms, if he does, he is only a curse to the business, for he causes hundreds of well disposed citizens to doubt there being any reality in the raising of silk, and thereby retards its progress. But the speculation in trees is over, thank heaven and some think the silk business is over also, but in that they are very much mistaken, it is just about to take a fair start. All sensible men who have trees will quietly hold on to them and go to feeding. There are but few trees that will not produce twenty-five cents worth of leaves per annum to the silk grower, and unless he has more foliage than he can use, it is folly for him to sell for less. All things, whether political, commercial or financial, as they are now working, will only tend to make us one of the greatest silk growing nations on earth, and second only to China in point of wealth. Suppose we had been a silk growing nation ten years ago, and had supplied ourselves with that article during that time—we would have saved about two hundred millions of dollars that has been shipped to Europe to pay for silk alone. This enormous sum may be saved to this nation in a very few years, and I have no doubt will he. We may not only save twenty millions a year, but we may pay our exchanges to the amount of twenty or thirty millions annually in silk, and in less than forty years we will do it. No doubt you think I am a visionary man; so many thought four years ago when I told them we could clothe ourselves in silk, taking the amount of labor as the standard of value, at a less expense than we could in cotton goods: the one is now proved, the other will be.— The political action of our statesmen has crippled, if not destroyed, the commercial and financial interests of the country, it is true; but that has not injured the silk business: it has only reduced the price of mulberry trees a little, which has rather benefited it; it has caused hundreds to turn their attention to the business who it is not likely would have done so if they could have got a dollar a bushel for their wheat; and these are the persons who will do some real good at it. I bought fifty dollars' worth of cocoons of a farmer last fall, who told me that his little daughter, about twelve or thirteen years old, had done all the business of rearing them, and that he had not a blade the less on his farm. Every farmer in our country who has two daughters of that age may do the same thing. Sir, the time is not distant when every enterprising, intelligent farmer, will esteem a mulberry orchard as necessary an appendage to his farm, as he now does a fruit orchard; but in order to effect this the tree growers must go to feeding worms, and bring in their cocoons to the factory —then the farmer will see there is a reality in the business; this is now the case in this neighborhood, and may soon be the case in every part of the Union, if those who have trees will go to using them instead of trying to sell them at a time when there is no money in the country to buy with. No man should ever think of selling a tree until he can feed a million of worms annually, and have a surplus of foliage.

I know of nothing that is more disgraceful to this nation than the fact, that we are the servants of servants, when we might be independent. We first pay tribute to the southern planter for the raw material, and then to the European pauper for the manufactured goods we clothe ourselves in, when we might furnish ourselves with a better and cheaper article, through the aid of a few little worms. How long will the high-minded sons and daughters of America submit to such a low and degrading debasement? Not long, I can assure you. The spell is now broken, factories are being started, and are doing a profitable business; a demand is created for cocoons, and the farmers in this region are beginning to see there is money to be made at raising them; and you know the farmers love money. They do not often risk much; but when they see there is money to be made, they generally try to get at it if it's within their province. They generally act slow and caustiously, and that is the right action to insure success; hence, what trees we have to spare are being sold in small lots.

Yours, with respect,

THOMAS WHITE.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the Brother Jonathan.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP BRITISH QUEEN.

The British Queen came to her dock Wednesday at a quarter to twelve, in fine style. She brought London and Liverpool dates to the first of March, but no English news of consequence, political or commercial. The dates are only fifteen days later than those received by the Great Western; and in that time little of importance appears to have transpired, excepting the resignation of the French Ministry, the circumstances attending which are detailed in the letters of our Parisian correspondent, given below.

The Bank of England has reduced its rate of interest to 5 per cent, on bills not having more than six months to run.

The Duke of Wellington had so entirely recovered that bulletins of his health were discontinued.

The price of corn is quoted at 56s. to 72s. Flour 56s. to 63s.

Papers in reference to the China dispute are in preparation to submit to Parliament, including all the documents, &c.

The Ministers had been defeated in the Commons, by a majority of twenty-eight, upon a motion relative to a pension to Sir John Newport.

A line of battle ship, to be called the Royal Albert, is to be put on the stocks.

Parliament was still engaged in the famous question of privilege about the arrest of the Printers of the House of Commons. This subject seemed to exclude and take precedence of all others.

The advocates of the Beer act amendment bill, are trying to connect the late Chartist outbreak with the beer houses, and allege that all the preliminary meetings of the factions have been held in such places.

The session of the Spanish Cortes was opened on the 18th instant, by the Queen in person.

Paris, February 21, 1840.

DISSOLUTION OF THE FRENCH MINISTRY, ETC.—Yesterday, the 12th, being the day fixed for the discussion of the "dotation" of the Duke de Nemours, I went to the Chamber of Deputies, for which I had been fortunate enough to procure a ticket, although the anxiety to obtain admission was immense. The hall was literally crammed. On entering I found M. Laffitte in the tribune explaining some circumstances connected with the purchase from him by the King, of the forest of Breteuil, which M. Amilhau, the reporter of the Committee upon the dotation, had intimated was not altogether a fair transaction. A part of the Committee's duty had been to examine the income of Louis Phillippe, in order to ascertain whether a statement made by the ministers of its inadequacy to provide for the Royal Princes was correct; and the report had stated that the revenues from the forest were much less than M. Laffitte had warrented them to be at the time of the sale. When this point was disposed of, the members who had inscribed their names to speak either against or in favor of the grant, were called in order of their "inscription," to say their say; but they all declined with the exception of one of its opponents, whose voice, however, was completely drowned by the noise that was made evidently for the purpose, as soon as he opened his mouth. Several deputies also ran up to him, pulled him by the coat tail, whispered something in his ear, at length got him back to his seat. The secret of these singular proceedings was, that in a caucus held the evening before by the opposition speakers, it had been resolved to abstain from all debate upon the subject—a determination of which the individual in question, who had not been present at the meeting, was ignorant. The vote was then taken by ballot, and resulted in a refusal of the grant by a majority of twenty-six. Great was the sensation in the house when this result was announced; no less great, I suspect, was the regret of the audience at the mode in which the affair was conducted. They had anticipated the enjoyment of a scene of tremendous excitement and uproar, and must have been wofully disappointed at the slight compensation which they received for the trouble it had cost them to get into the Chamber, and the pressure and suffocation they had endured. One reason, doubtless, why there was no debate was the apprehension, by the deputies, of just such a scene as the public expected. Men's minds were so much heated upon the subject that there was danger almost of a general conflagration in enkindling a flame. The question, moreover, was one of so delicate a nature, involving, as it did, the private feelings of the King, that even his implacable foes were disposed to shrink from giving a legislative sanction to the outrages that had been heaped upon him and his family out of doors.

The Chamber adjoured immediately after the vote. In the evening I went to a dinner where, among the company, were several embassadors, and also the Marquis de Dalmatie, the son of Marshal Soult. The Marquis, from the position of his father, as head of the ministry, was of course an object of peculiar interest under the circumstances, and communicated the information that the cabinet had sent in their resignations in consequence of their defeat. You may suppose that this intelligence was very well calculated to produce a flutter among the diplomatists, all of whom disappeared soon after rising from the table. The ambassadorial corps in Paris must be kept in a constant state of fverishness from the uncertainties and changes of French politics, which would set their astuteness at defiance, were they all Metternichs and Talleyrands. To-day they may write to their governments what they suppose to be unquestionable facts and most sagacious prognostications; and to-morrow they may have the agreeable task of disabusing said governments of the impressions which the previous despatches were adopted to create—in other words, of making a confession like that conveyed by the gramatical Kentucky phrase: "I don't know nothing, and always did."

The journals of this morning are monopolized by the subject. The ministerialists declare that the vote is a direct attack not only upon the King, but upon royalty itself, forgetting in their rage, that such an assertion is equivalent to an avowal that the majority of the representatives are anti-monarchical—an acknowledgment for which the government will hardly feel grateful, as it would imply that its conduct had been such as to alienate its former friends from the very principles on which the existing institutions are based, there being no doubt that the chief portion of the Chamber were "dynastic" at the commencement of the session. A more probable charge is the statement that many who were originally favorable to the measure were frightened by the outcry against it, into desertation to the ranks of its enemies. The opposition papers of all shades are in ecstacies—Carlists, Bonapartists, Republicans, all behold in the event an augury of success to their respective factions—the Constitutional opposition are chuckling at the overthrow of the cabinet. On one point they all appear to agree—that the hero of the battle was M. de Cormenin; that it was his pamphlet of which the number circulated is almost incalculable, that dealt the death-blow of the project. The republican party, accordingly, to which he belongs, are getting up a subscription for the purpose of striking a medal "in honor of the courageous and brilliant writer, to avenge him for the insult and calumnies of the hirelings of the Court and the police, and at the same time offer him a token of the esteem & the gratitude of his country." The National, the organ of the republicans, heads the list with a hundred francs, and publishes quantities of names of enthusiastic subscribers.

Whatever may be thought of the right of the King to make the demand as a necessary consequence of the monarchical principle which the people of France had established after the revolution of the three days, it was very evident that the step was injudicious in the extreme. Even if the Chambers had passed the grant, which, by the way, it was generally supposed they would do, for I heard a prominent member of the opposition acknowledge only a few evenings ago, that it was hardly possible it could be rejected—the thing would still have rankled in the public mind, and been a perpetual topic of exasperation. It is unfortunate for Louis Philippe, that the notion is prevalent of his being much more fond of money than beseems a monarch, and in spite of all proofs that his civil list is insufficient for the dignity of the throne, people would persist in believing that avarice was the motive of his demands. Yet it is an undeniable fact, that he has expended a large amount of his private fortune in improving and embellishing both his capital and Versailles, and his friends affirm that he is absolutely in debt and unable to provide in a suitable manner for his children; but, as the Roman historian remarks, Conflata magna invidia, seu bene seu male, gesta premunt—in less classical parlance, give a dog a bad name, &c.— you know the adage.

All sorts of rumors are in circulation. It is even announced that the King has written to the father of princess Victoria, the destined bride of the Duke de Nemours, to have the match broken off, but it can hardly be possible he would be guilty of such a proceeding. There is no doubt of one statement, that he has determined to give no more court balls; and, if it be true as is affirmed, that at the one already given, there were no less than three thousand seven hundred bottles of wine drank by the thirsty guests, he may have some reason for pleading that he cannot afford to entertain the public. As to the question, "who will be the next ministers?" no one can answer it. The difficulty of forming the cabinet just dissolved was so great, that a long interregnum may occur, unless a coalition still more strange than the one on which that cabinet was erected, be brought about by the necessity of the case. The Duke de Broglie, Count Mole, Thiers, Odillon, Barret, are the principal names mentioned; it would not be altogether impossible for the two last to put their combined shoulders to the wheel, little accustomed as they have heretofore been to act in concert. Time will show, as wise people say.

ENGLAND.

From the Court Circular of Feb. 26.

The Queen held a Court yesterday afternoon at Buckingham Palace, for the reception of addresses on the Throne.

The members of the Religious Society of Friends having, according to ancient custom, been uncovered by the Yeomen of the Guard, were then introduced to the presence of her Majesty on the Throne and presented to her Majesty the following address:—

To Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dominions thereunto belonging.

The respectful address of the undersigned members of a meeting appointed to represent the religious Society of Friends in Great Britain and Ireland.

May it please the Queen,

As a christian and loyal body, permit us, on the important and deeply interesting occasion of thy marriage, to convey to thee the renewed assurance of our cordial attachment to thy person and government.

The institution of marriage we have ever regarded as a Divine ordinance, and it is our prayer to God that His blessing may richly crown this union, and render it conducive alike to thy own happiness and the welfare of thy people.

It is with heartfelt satisfaction that we anticipate thy future happiness in this union, and earnest are our desires for thee and for thy consort, that, walking in the fear of the Lord, thy example may be so ordered in all things by that wisdom which is from above, as powerfully to promote the course of true religion and virtue throughout the land.

The real prosperity of our beloved country is an object dear to our hearts and under this feeling we would express our belief that in proportion as pure practical christianity is permitted to sway thy counsels, and is promoted among thy subjects, will the prosperity be most effectually advanced, social order maintained, and thy throne established in the affections of thy people.

May He, by whom kings reign and princes decree justice, bless thee, O queen, and increasingly make thee a blessing to thy own and to surrounding nations, and mayest thou at the end of thy days, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus our Saviour, be received into everlasting glory."

Her Majesty returned the following most gracious answer:

I earnestly join in your prayers for the welfare of my people, and acknowledge with thanks your interest for my own happiness, which is inseparably connected with the subject of your congratulations.

I feel with you that the prosperity of nations is most effectually secured by observing the precepts and cherishing the benevolent spirit of the christian religion.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, during the presentation of these addresses stood by the side of the Queen; and near her Majesty, by the throne were the Mistress of the robes, the Duchess of Bedford, Lady in Waiting, the Lord Chamberlain and the master of the horse.

Her Majesty was attended by the following members of the cabinet, the first lord of the treasury, the secretary of state for the home department, and the chief commissioner of the woods and forests.

Her Majesty's hon. corps of gentlemen at arms, commanded by their lieutenant the Hon. Sir E. Butler, lined the throne room.

THE RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

EDNESDAY, ... APRIL 1, 1840.

Capt. DUFFEY has recently taken the editorial arge of the Lancaster (Ohio) Gazette.

It is reported that the Treasurer of Hocking unty, has recently absconded, "leaving the unty minus six or eight thousand dollars."

THE WEATHER.—We have had for a few days st, a pretty fair specimen of blustering March ather; a considerable quantity of rain, mixed th a portion of snow. We have, however, dications of a forward spring.

We inform Bro. Norris, of the Olive Branch, at we have none of the numbers containing r remarks on Junius and Bishop McKendree, cept our file. If any of our readers are done th that number, and will send it to us, we ill forward it to Mr. N.

The Ohio Statesman calls our attention to e Report of Mr. Glover, of the select committe of the Senate, to whom was referred the Bill the House for the "further protection of relious societies." In a few weeks we will publish e Dr's Report, on which we propose making a w remarks.

PRICES CURRENT.—In our last, we gave liberal xtracts from our exchange papers, on the subject prices current. We gave the prices of most rticles in the produce, or victualling way, that r readers have either to sell or buy. As there little alteration this week, we shall omit our otations. We state, however, that the intelgence by the British Queen, is no more favora- for flour.

We refer our readers to the notice of the opening of the Methodist Protestant Academy, at righton. The Principal, Mr. Fuller, I should dge from the character of his communications us, is very competent for his post. Any notes he may want us to publish for the benefit the Institution, will be done cheerfully without reward.

HARRIS' INTELLIGENCER.—We give in this umber the terms of this valuable commercial eet, edited and published by our old friend saac Harris, of Pittsburgh, Pa. No man in the lace is better acquainted with its business than Ir. Harris, as he has grown up with it from a ate of infancy; and I doubt if there is as good commercial paper in the place. It also conains a variety of well selected matter, tending liberalize and moralize the public mind.

COLORED AMERICAN —This paper, after a susension of some weeks, has again got under way. t is now under the care of C. B. Ray, a man f color, who is both editor and proprietor. The bject of this paper is to improve the moral and ntellectual condition of the colored people of the United States. The editor is a man of considrable ability, and from the known principles of ur nature, his labors will have a greater influnce, with those for whom they are designed, than l dozen other papers. It is published at New York, 9th Spruce st., 3d story, at $2 per annum.

MANHATTAN BANK.—A committee of investitation into the affairs of this Bank, have made uch disclosures, as has caused the resignation of everal of its officers, among whom was Mr. Cashier White, who attacked afterwards, in the treet, with a bludgeon, Mr. Jonathan Thompson, who is a Director in said bank, and who had been the principal instrument in the disclosures. White has since been held to bail in 2,000 dollars for this cowardly assault. It is said that such was the excitement this affair produced in Wall street, that it was difficult to prevent sundry persons from inflicting summary punishment on the Whites.

HOW TO RIDE TO MEETING.—On Sabbath last, we rode to meeting in company with two small boys. The oldest past on with as much sedateness as any man; the other behaved very well, but was disposed, occasionally, to move on briskly to show the gaits of his horse. As we reached within some two hundred yards of the meeting house, the little fellow took another shoot ahead —the oldest called after him to stop, and then remarked to us "that it was not right for any one to ride to meeting that way." We highly commend the little fellow for his good sense, and would suggust to many young men of twenty or more years of age, the propriety of taking a lesson or two from him.

ZION'S WATCHMAN.—We suggested sometime since, that in relation to Zion's Watchman, there was something "rotten in Denmark." We made up this opinion from our personal knowledge of that paper. A remark in the last WESLEYAN OBSERVER seems to strengthen this opinion. A correspondent, speaking of the necessity of the Observer's existence, says:

"The Watchman, though read and prized by many, from a number of circumstances not necessary here to mention, could not have the circulation and influence in many parts of the Eastern Conferences that another paper would."

Now, what is the reason that the Watchman has lost its "influence" in the East, that it becomes necessary to have another paper of the same character? We presume this was not occasioned by building churches, and telling the truth.

The following considerations among others, are offered by a correspondent of the Wesleyan Observer, as reasons for the existence of that paper:

"Zion's Herald is an excellent paper, and deserving of extensive patronage. This I wish to increase and not reduce. But the Herald cannot, and ought not to, take just the course which it is desirable the Observer should take. The former is devoted to the defence and propogation of christianity through the institutions of Methodism. This, if I understand it, is its leading object. And in this respect it is the principle organ of, at least two large Conferences. Now, from the very nature of things, no one subject, however important, can be expected to occupy a large portion of that paper, and, perhaps, for weeks or months together, even if all its patrons were friendly to such subject. It would exclude from its columns writers on other important subjects, for the want of which the church would suffer. But the fact is, a very respectable portion of the patrons of the Herald, I presume, are unfriendly to the introduction of one subject to the columns of that paper. It is true, they are willing that the paper and its editor should be so far unshackled as to admit a few articles on almost any subject, abolition as well as any other. But they do not wish to see the subject of slavery and abolition extensively treated. Now these objectors are brethren and good brethren, supporters of the paper and of Methodism. They have their rights, and should not be deprived of them by force, even if the majority could do it. That would be a species of slavery. They, as well as the friends of abolition, want that paper for the common interests of the church, with its columns open, so far as the general interests will admit, to all moral and religious subjects.—Then no one great or exciting subject can be fully discussed in that paper."

The Bill "to regulate and reform the banking system of this State," was postponed to the first Monday of December next.

STATE HOUSE.—The Report of the joint committee, directing the Governor to issue his proclamation for proposals for the location of the Capital of the State, was indefinitely postponed in the Senate, by a vote of 19 to 14. The repeal of the law making appropriations for the new State House, is the only action that has been had in the Legislature on this subject.—O. State Journal.

The bill of the House "to authorize the Commissioners of the Canal Fund to borrow money for the continuation of the public works," in addition to the sum already authorized to be borrowed, as amended in the Senate and passed, embraces the following items:

For the Western Reserve and Maumee Road,	$25,000
Muskingum Improvement,	80,000
Walhonding Canal,	50,000
For payment of contractors, without restriction as to interest,	400,000
	$555,000
Amount previously authorized to be borrowed,	1,013,612
Total, loans authorized, ...	$1,568,612

The amount expended during the last season, was 1,908,000 dollars. If we deduct from this sum the total amount authorized to be borrowed for 1840, and then deduct the sum of 400,000 dollars, now due and to be paid to contractors, it will leave 1,167,612 dollars; being 740,388 dollars less than was expended during the last season.—Ib.

The Little Rock (Arkansas) Times states that a few weeks since, a man belonging to the United States, at the head of eight or ten men, attacked a body of Cherokee Indians in the night, killing seven or eight of their number. No reason is given for this, but that he was afraid the Indians would attack him!

QUEEN VICTORIA.—A letter from London, in the Philadelphia Gazette says: I have seen her Majesty several times, and whatever the papers may say to the contrary, she has not the slightest pretension to beauty. She has goggle eyes, and a squirrel mouth. Her stature is low, and her person heavy.

COUNTERFEIT.—We learn this morning that the counterfeit ten dollar bills on the Newark Banking and Insurance Company, for which one company has been sent to the State Prison, are in circulation again. One of them was received for a load of hay yesterday.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

There is this difference between health and money: money is the most envied, but the least enjoyed; health is the most enjoyed, but the least envied; and this superiority of the latter is still more obvious, when we reflect that the poorest man would not part with health for money, but that the richest would gladly part with their money for health.

MARYLAND.—The Legislature of Maryland terminated its session on the 24th ult. A bill had passed the House of Delegates, by a vote of 41 to 25, for taking the sense of the voters, at their October election, upon the propriety of calling a convention to form a new constitution. We do not know its fate in the Senate.

SMALL NOTES.—An attempt to prohibit the Banks of Virginia from issuing $5 notes, was recently voted down in the House of Delegates, by a vote of 93 to 20. On the 16th ult. a bill passed the same body, giving the Banks of the State the right to issue one and two dollar notes for one year, redeemable in specie.

Among the petitions presented to the Senate of Pennsylvania, on Saturday, was one from the citizens of Philadelphia, representing themselves in debt and unable to pay, and praying that the Legislature would pass an act allowing them to suspend payment until February, 1841. The Nashville Whig contains the particulars of a recent murder, at Hopkinsville, Ky. It appears that a musician named Cuvellier, had been in correspondence with the wife of an English vocalist, named Barclay. The latter discovered some of Cuvillier's letters in his wife's possession, and went to him armed with pistols to demand the restoration of the answers. Cuvillier pulled one of them from his pocket and destroyed it in B's presence. The latter drew a pistol from his pocket and killed him on the spot, and then surrendered himself to the authorities.

An unusually large number af letters were taken out by the Great Western. One of the papers states that Gilpin alone took upwards of two thousand dollars in postage. Letters from London, dated on the morning of the 1st ultimo, received by the "British Queen" on Wednesday, have been answered by the Great Western, and will reach England on the first of April—only one month from London to New York and back again! Two years ago, the time occupied was two months and more.

DAMAGES AGAINST A STEAMBOAT CAPTAIN.—In the Common Pleas Court, last Friday, was tried the case of B. S. Hendrickson vs. Captain G. L. Dolson of the steamboat Washington, for assault and battery. It appears that plaintiff with his family went aboard the Washington for a 4th July trip, last summer, but owing to the extremely crowded state of the boat, brought his family ashore again. The Captain demanded 25 cents fare, but defendant refused to pay, whereupon the Captain seized him by the collar, and dragged him some distance towards the boat, until compelled to let him go by the bystanders. For this assault, jury gave plaintiff $125 damages.—N. Y. paper.

RIOT IN PHILADELPHIA.—We have advised our readers of the riotous opposition made in Kensington, Phil, to the laying of rails by the Trenton Company along Front Street in that ward. On Thursday night a larger crowd than ever collected, and made a bonfire of whatever wooden materials belonging to the company they could find. It seems that the Court of Common Pleas had decided in favor of the company, and that the parties opposed then took an appeal to the Supreme Court. On Friday morning the difficulties were temporarily adjusted.—The company have agreed to wait the decision of the Supreme Court, and the crowd have dispersed.—Bro. Jonathan.

REVIVAL IN LOWELL.—Our prospects are brightening in this city. Last Tuesday evening 67 were forward for prayers, and eight or ten converted.—Sunday evening we held our quarterly love feast. One thousand persons at least, were present; and one hundred and sixty spoke in just one hour. Between eighty and ninety came forward for prayers, a number of whom (the exact number not ascertained) were made happy in God. Our love feast was the largest ever attended, except a camp meeting; and it was one of the best.

A Liverpool paper, adverting to the North Eastern Boundary Question, says: "We see enough in this dispute to believe that circumstances may arise to place this question of peace or war beyond the power of any individual to control; and, therefore, the sooner effectual steps are taken to settle it the better. The commissioner appointed by the British government to survey the disputed territory, returned from his mission two months ago, and as the question is one which admits of no delay, it is time, we think, that parliament and the country should know something of the result." We observe one or two other paragraphs in the English papers not particularly pacific in their character.

In reference to the great Libel Case, we learn from the Baltimore Patriot that at the opening of the Court on Friday, the defendant by his counsel, expressed his desire that the case should be brought to a close, by a new trial, or otherwise, at the present term. The Attorney General not being prepared to determine at once the course which public duty might prescribe or require on his part, took time to consider.

The Patriot of Saturday afternoon says: "At the opening of the City Court, this morning, the Attorney General stated that, on reflection, he had concluded not to prosecute the indictment against Mr. Breckenridge any further, and therefore entered a nolle prosequi, which terminates all further proceedings in the case."

THE ASPECT OF AFFAIRS IN NEW YORK.—Money is said to be abundant in New York, but such is the want of confidence that people are afraid to employ it. The Banks, it is said, discount all good paper at seven per cent. while many transactions have occurred as low as six per cent. Exchange in Philadelphia has also considerably improved. The Express says:

"Our banks are full of money, but there is neither confidence nor business to employ it. The business of the city is so limited that there is vast deal of unemployed capital. The old established Houses of the city are giving out but little paper. Such firms as might be named, and, such as in ordinary times, have a large amount out, have next to none.—This description of paper can be readily negotiated both in and out of bank, at 6 a 7 per cent. The principal paper in the street to be shaved is the acceptance of Southern Institutions here, and the certificates of deposites of some of our near banking institutions, some of which enjoy no confidence, while others have friends to buy up their paper at 1½ per month.—The opening of the spring trade so far, has had very little influence on the market. The abundance of money arises more from the stagnant state of things, than from any other cause. The rate of Exchange on Europe is decidedly in our favor, and consequently there is no business, whatever, in our banks."—Bicknell.

The New York Morning Chronicle thus alludes to the Dry Goods Trade,—a matter in which the western merchants are much interested:

"Since our last report on this branch of trade, the stock in this market has been greatly increased by the arrival of about a dozen packets, all of them have brought as we predicted in our last, fair cargoes of dry goods. This addition to the supply to new and desirable goods, must naturally have some influence to revive trade among this class of merchants. The merchants in the neighboring cities, have been anxiously waiting these arrivals, and they will now be able to get in their spring supplies, whether large or small. The packets that left Liverpool early in the season, have not brought so full cargoes as those that left later. This can only be attributed to the disappointment of the manufacturers of Great Britain, in not receiving more extensive orders from this country, and which induced them to ship a considerable quantity on their own account. It is a fact very well known among our leading merchants, that the orders from this country which went out early in the season were very small, and the sudden increase of shipments at Liverpool, the latter part of January cannot be reasonably attributed to any other cause, than the determination of the manufacturers of Europe, to ship their surplus stock on their own account, which, if they do to any extent, must create an overplus in this market, injurious to the interests of this community and to the shippers."—Ib.

ORIGINAL PIECES, NO VII.

TO AN EGYPTIAN MUMMY. *

E'en from my youth it seemed to me
"As if the" silent "dead could feel
The icy worm around them steal,
And shudder as the reptiles creep,
To revel o'er their rotting sleep,
Without the power to scare away
The cold consumer of their clay."
Say, chilly sleeper, is it so?
Tell if the dead can feel or no?
Say, if in slumber if the fears,
With all the hopes of bye-gone years,
In vision float with magic ray,
As once they did in Pharoah's day?
Tell if you know the change on earth,
The things which happen'd since your birth?
Those things of the shades which the graves conceal,
Are things of the dead which we'll not reveal,
Yet all who come to this slumbering realm,
As sure as they come it will overwhelm,
Where actions are hid in the depths of night,
And the last of all days shall bring to light,
So trouble me not in my chilly sleep,
For pay for your toils you will never reap.

SON OF EGYPTIA.

Regardless of toil I will tell you a tale Of things that have been since your cheek has grown pale;
Your kings are all gone, your language is lost,
Your fame it has di'd, your temples are tost
By whirlwinds of change, and others succeed
To rifle your tombs and hide ev'ry deed
Of a nation once brave—ruling with awe, Science, Religion, and Letters and Law.
Osiris and Osis have sunk in the tomb,
And prov'd such gods were but phantoms of gloom,
But the God of the Hebrew that breathed on the plain
That night when the first born of Egypt was slain,
Is as great and young as he was on that morn,
When the Hebrew was free and Egyptia forlorn;
And the sons of those slaves who labored thy soil, Hard task'd, making brick, loosing sweat by the toil,
Became a great name that ran through all lands,
Nor paus'd when it reach'd the farthermost strands;
Her law was a lamp that illumined around
Most nations of earth that moderns have found,
And from them at length Great Shiloah came,
And kindled on earth a love-burning flame, Reaching out, spreading round with the progress of time,
Over sin, o'er wrong still hast'ning to climb,
'Till all men are brothers, the great and the small,
Then with triumph complete it will reign o'er all.
Yet the Jew would not own this Prince when he came,
But put him to death with contemptible shame,
And looked for a king with a terrible name,
Who would conquer all lands and live upon fame.
Then fled far away their national bliss,
They became a by-word, a contemptible hiss;
Four thousand years now they've been looking for Him,
They begin to despair of this bigoted whim.
Egypt, Egyptia, you've seen much of time,
Have known ev'ry grade of greatness or crime,
Your fame is nigh lost by ravage of years,
That obliterates names and never sheds tears.

*There is nothing upon which the living eye can rest, more impressive and interesting, than the preserved mortal remains of human beings, who were inhabitants of this earth more than three thousand years ago. Such are the Egyptian Mummies, embalmed, bandaged, encased, and preserved in excavated recesses of everlasting rocks. This Mummy was brought to this country by Capt. Turner, of Charlestown, Massachusetts, from Trieste, at which place it had been received from Thebis. It is very perfect; retaining all its forms and features. It stands in the back part of the coffin, wrapped with numerous thicknesses of the twined linen of Egypt, mentioned in the Scriptures. The envelope is removed from the face, hands and feet. It is of a dark color, derived from the embalming materials, and not from the original color, as the hair is sandy and straight. The coffin is said to be of sycamore wood, covered with an Egyptian cement. On the front or lid are various hyeroglyphics, supposed to be a biographical account of the deceased person, who, according to history, must have lived on this earth three thousand years ago.—[Zanesville paper advertisement, 1829.

DEFERRED ARTICLES.

A young man died recently in Cincinnati of hydrophobia, caused by the bite of a mad dog in July last.

CENSORIOUS.—It is observed that the most censorious are generally the least judicious, who having nothing to recommend themselves, will be finding fault with others. No man envies the merit of another who has enough of his own.

SHADE OF THE DEPARTED.—One of the country papers gives an account of a lounger in its editorial office, who had been in the habit of sitting there so long that when he died his shadow was found fixed upon the wall.

The Boston Centinel, states that the factories of Massachusetts, turn out fabrics to the amount of $91,500,000 annually. These articles of domestic manufacture, must employ the labor of many thousand hands—men, women and children.

AN OLD-FASHIONED LAW.—If a man should be convicted, in New York, of abandoning his wife, the magistrates possess the power of apprenticing him out by the year in the service of any individual, and the proceeds of his labor shall be devoted to the support of his family.

One of the powder houses of the Messrs. Beatty, on the Susquehanna railroad, about seven miles from Baltimore, blew up on Friday with a tremendous explosion. There were six hundred kegs of powder in the house at this time. Fortunately no one was in the building.

The Mormons have purchased a tract of twenty thousand acres at the head of the Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi on both sides of the river including the town of Commerce. This name is changed to Nauven, from the Hebrew. The whole purchase money amounts to 70,000 dollars, a large portion of it on long payments.

AN IMMENSE TRAIN.—The Engine "Cowan and Marx," drew, on Thursday 20th over the railway from Reading to the Columbia bridge, one hundred and one loaded cars. The gross weight of the train was 423 tons of 2240 lbs. The distance is 54½ miles, and the running time 5 hours and 33 minutes, being an average speed of 10 miles per hour.

By a fire in Baltimore on Friday night, a house in South Liberty street, occupied by Mr. F. Scholmeyer, upholsterer, was consumed; and Mr. S. himself perished in the flames. His wife and child were so much injured that little hopes were entertained of their recovery. They were taken from the fourth story, to which they had retreated, by the almost superhuman exertions of the firemen.

COMICAL MISTAKE.—A country chap visiting Little Rock recently, concluded he must go to the theatre before leaving. Having never been inside a theatre in his life, he mistook the door entering that establishment, and walked into a billiard room, some wag pocketing the dollar he handed him on entering. The best of the joke is that he never discovered his mistake, but sat until the house was closed, professing to be highly delighted 'to see a lot of fellows knocking about a parcel of little balls.'

The New York correspondent of the National Intelligencer says that the Secretary of the Treasury over-estimated the amount of revenue to be derived from the customs, and adds:

"The fact is, the Merchants are too poor to make importations, and the country could not pay for them if they made them. Ships from Europe come here without freight. But few orders are going out. There is no disposition for business, but the great and general business of getting out of debt."—Mt. Pleasent, Pa., Register.

CONGRESS.—The House of Representatives has at length decided the matter of the New Jersey Contested Election, by admitting the Administration candidates, Messrs. Dickerson, &c. to seats, by the following vote:—Yeas 111—Nays 81. Mr. Adams, and several other prominent members, refused to vote on the question. —ib.

CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA.—A good work for the perusal of those who desire an acquaintance with the Constitution of our State, and an accurate insight into the character of the amendments lately added to that instrument.—The Book is entitled, "A familiar exposition of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, for the Use of Schools and the People," by Daniel Fuller.—ib.

GOING AHEAD.—The way the young Lawyers go ahead in the west, is thus described by Mr. Howard, of Indiana, in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives of the United States:—ib.

"A young man whose father has given him a good education and good morals, sets out for the west, having spent some time in acquiring a profession. He arrives at one of our county towns with purse exhausted, and coat threadbare.—He goes to a western inn, and soon strikes a bargain with the landlord, the substance of which is, that he is to sleep under the tavern-keeper's roof, eat at his table, and to pay him for these benefits when he shall be able to make the money by his profession. He commences the practice of the law, in a short time, gains a strong hold on the affections of the people, and a still stronger hold on the good will of the daughter of some substantial farmer. He marries, becomes a useful citizen, and not unfrequently a squatter in this Hall as a member of Congress.—Sir, I see such men all around me."

FRAUD.—The Pittsburg Advocate states that within a few days past, several spurious Bills, of the denomination of ten dollars, purporting to be of the Exchange Bank of Pittsburgh, have been presented at its counter. They appear to have been struck from the plate of that fraudulent Philadelphia concern, the Exchange and Savings Institution; the words "and Savings Institution," which were printed in small letters, having been erased; and Pittsburgh very clumsily inserted in place of Philadelphia. The signature, J. Forester, Cashier, and Wm. Robinson, Jr. President, are engraved. The engraving and general appearance of the note are altogether unlike the genuine, but as several of our merchants, who ought at once to have detected the fraud, have been inadvertent enough to receive them, it is well the public should be apprised. The vignette of the fraudulent note is a representation of Perry's victory; while that of the genuine is the figure of a female seated and holding open the lid of an iron chest.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE AND JOURNAL.—It appears from the last number of this paper, that one of its corrections, "known and respected" by the editor, has requested him to "state the difference between the government of the Wesleyan Methodist connection, and the Methodist Episcopal Church in this country." But this he declines, with the flimsy excuse, that he has not time to do it. But how much time would it take? A man at the head of the great official, ought to understand the subject—and if he understands it, a few simple points of analogy or contrast would answer. This is probably all his correspondent expected. But this he DARE not do. Ergo, the people must not know these things—they are too deep, too wonderful for them. It would not be safe in the Christian Advocate to contrast or compare different systems of church government. It might set the people to thinking and investigating; and unless Episcopacy is better and more scriptural than any thing else, they might become dissatisfied with it. Hence the doctrine at head quarters seems to be, keep dark.—American Wesleyan Observer.

THE BLOOD HOUNDS.—Mr. Adams, on the 9th March, offered the following resolution in the House, containing an admirable hit in reference to the employment of this new species of troops in the Florida war. Mr. Adams having expressed a desire to be heard, before the question was taken, upon the resolution, the subject was laid over to a subsequent day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the natural, political, and martial history of the blood hound, showing the peculiar fitness of that class of warriors to be the associate of the gallant army of the United States—specifying the nice discrimination of his scent between the blood of the freeman and the blood of the slave—between the blood of the armed warrior and that of women or children—between the blood of the black, white, and colored man—between the blood of savage Seminoles and that of the Anglo-Saxon pious Christian. Also, a statement of the number of blood hounds, and of their conductors, imported by this Government, or by the authorities of Florida, from the Island of Cuba, and the cost of the importation. Also, whether a further importation of the same heroic race into the State of Maine to wait the contingency of a contested Northeastern boundary question is contemplated, or only to set an example to be followed by our possible adversary in the event of a conflict. Whether measures have been taken to secure exclusively to ourselves the employment of this auxiliary force, and whether he deems it expedient to extend to the said blood hounds and their posterity the benefits of the Pension Laws.

FOREIGN PERSONAL NEWS.

Galignani's Messengers says that Mr. George Plitt, of the United States Post-office Department, has returned to Paris from Germany, where he has been, in pursuance of his mission, to examine particularly the post office system in England and on the Continent, with a view to improvements in that establishment in the United States, and to make arrangements for the interchange of documents, reports, etc. Mr. Plitt appears to have been well received throughout his extensive tour, and to have left a strong impression in favor of the general advantages to be derived by carring the proposed interchange into effect.

Dr. Chalmers, the great leader of the Church of Scotland, and unquestionably the most able and eloquent man connected with it, has written a letter to his friends in Scotland, in which he acknowledges his political errors, and declares his thorough conviction that it will be the best policy for the clergy of all denominations to support her Majesty's present Whig government in preference to the Tories.

Several members of Napoleon's family are at present in London. On the 25th of February, Prince Louis Napoleon entertained at dinner his two uncles—Joseph Bonaparte, ex-King of Spain, and Jerome Bonaparte, ex-King of Westphalia; and his cousin, Prince Lucien Murat, son of Murat, ex-King of Naples. The other guests were several distinguished officers of the French army under Napoleon.

The Empress of Russia, intends to go to Italy in the spring for the benefit of her health, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess de Duchtenberg. The hereditary Grand Duke is expected to go to Darmstadt in April.

The Baron de Vertueil de Fuillas, reponsible editor of the France, has been liberated from Ste. Pelagie, after a year's incarceration, resulting from a political condemnation of that journal.

Marshal Maison died at Paris in the last week of February, at the age of 69, from the breaking out of an old wound received forty years ago.

WONDERFUL PROMPTNESS AND DELIVERANCE.—The following thrilling sketch relates to a furious storm on Lake Erie, a year ago last winter. It is another illustration of the truth that, circumstances alter cases. That which was commendable intrepidity in this case, would be mad presumption, if done to make an ostentatious display of speed, needlessly exposing hundreds of lives to decide which combination of wood and iron could be driven fastest.—Youth's Cabinet.

In that fearful night, the steamer Constitution, Capt. Applebly, was out amidst the terrors of the gale. By the glimpses caught at intervals, when the fitful storm for a moment broke away, the anxious and watchful commander was made aware of the critical situation of his boat, which was rapidly drifting in—under the hurricane power of the gale, which blew almost directly across the lake—toward a dangerous reef, from which escape would have been impossible. He went directly to the engineer, and ordered on "more steam." The reply of the engineer was that there was already as much on as the boilers would safely bear.

Again did the captain seek the deck, to see if his laboring boat was making headway, and again returned to the engine room. He explained to the engineer their hazardous situation, and told him that all hope was lost, if no more headway could be gained—but left the engineer to act his discretion in the crisis. A moment of reflection, and his decision was made. Life or death hung on the issue. Certain destruction awaited the boat and her crew, in a few brief minutes, if she did not gain upon the driving storm. This might be averted, if the boilers—already crowded to a fearful pressure—could yet bear a heavier strain, and that he determined to TRY. True, the awful horrors of an EXPLOSION were vividly before him—the mangled limbs, the scorched and lifeless bodies, the death shrieks and the groans of the hapless victims, were before his eyes and on his ear—the alternative was a fearful one, yet it must be resorted to.

He coolly directed the heads of two barrels of oil to be broken in, and the furnaces were rapidly fed with wood dipped in the highly inflamable liquid, while two men with ladles dashed the oil into the flames. The intense heat which these combustibles created, generated steam with the rapidity of lightning, and soon the resistless vapor forced up the safety valve, and issued forth with tremendous violence, its sharp hissing heard above the wild uproar of the waters and the storm. With a desperate and determined courage, which equalled the most daring heroism that the page of history has ever recorded, the engineer sat down upon the lever of the safety valve, to confine and raise the steam to the necessary power required to propel the boat against the drifting waves! In this awful situation he calmly remained, until the prodigious efforts of the engine had forced the Constitution sufficiently off shore to be beyond the threatened danger.

This intrepid act was not a rash and vain-glorious attempt to gain the applause of a multitude by a fool hardy exposure of life, in some racing excursions—it was not the deed of a drunken and reckless man, wickedly heedless of the safety of those whose lives were periled—but it was the self-possessed and determined courage of one whose firmness is worthy of all admiration. We give it as it was told us, as one of those frequent scenes of real life, whose actual realities are indeed "stranger than fiction."—Buffalo Commercial.

ANECDOTES OF THE BAR.—We may mention the name of a prince, as having been, for a time at least, connected with the New Orleans bar. M. Achille Murat, son of the ex-king of Naples, made his debut as an advocate there, and showed himself a remarkable man, if not an orator. With a singularity, however, which belonged to his character, he never appeared at the bar a second time, and has since quitted the gown and the country. We may, however, mention an anecdote of his stay here, which rests on the authority of his mother, the princess of Lipona.

While Italy was a province of the empire, a mutiny broke out in the garrison of Leghorn, of so serious a character, as to excite in a high degree Napoleon's indignation. He was no friend of insubordination, and resolved to crush it in its bud, and make a terrible example of the culprits. Joachim Murat was charged with this painful duty, and set off for Leghorn without delay. When he arrived there, the insurrection had spent itself, and shame and remorse succeeded a temporary forgetfulness. However, the Emperor's orders were strict, and punishment must be inflicted. Murat therefore called the soldiers together, and, after reproaching them bitterly for their offence, required that the ringleaders of the mutiny should be given up, otherwise ten men out of every battalion would be drawn by lot, and shot. The soldiers hung their heads, and professed themselves ready to submit to any punishment their emperor might inflict upon them, but begged the general not to force them to turn informers against their comrades. Murat would not yield, and the ten men whose names were drawn were about to be carried off, when three soldiers stepped to the front, and avowed themselves the instigators of the revolt. There was so much shame and contrition expressed by the vieux moustaches, that Murat was deeply moved. He stood silent awhile, then ordered the three criminals to be taken to prison, to be shot the next morning. That same night, when every thing was quiet, except the measured step of the patrol, and the cry of the sentinels on the walls, Murat was seated in his apartment, while before him stood three grizzled veterans, cap in hand, weeping like children. It was not death that the heroes of Arcole and Marengo feared—it was to be disgraced to die the death of traitors; they wept, not for their fate, but for their crime!

"Listen!" said Murat. "I believe you are really sorry for what you have done, and I want to save your lives. To-morrow, at day-break, you will be led out to execution, outside the city. I will take care there shall be no spectators. The platoon will fire on you with blank cartridges, and you must fall down and remain motionless, till they march off the ground. A trusty man will be ready to put you into a close carriage; a vessel sails to-morrow for America, on board of which you will embark. Here is a purse of gold for each of you. You will promise to behave yourselves?"

Every thing happened as he had arranged it, and Napoleon thanked Murat for having taken the lives of only three of his soldiers. The circumstances remained a secret till 1830, when Prince Achille Murat, walking one day in the suburbs of New Orleans, was caught in a shower. He sought shelter in the nearest house, a small and plain one; a man and wife, with their children, were the only inhabitants. The man had an austere, yet good-natured face, and that stiffish walk which an old soldier can never get rid of. The prince remarked that his host eyed him fixedly, and seemed strangely agitated. The prince, on the other hand, sitting by the humble hearth, cast his eyes round the room with the idle curiosity of a man who has nothing to do. He rose, for he saw on the walls some coarse engravings of Napoleon's generals and battles. Above them were placed, under a laurel crown, two portraits of Murat, as general, and as king. "Have you ever served in France?" asked the prince. "Yes, sir," answered his host, not without embarrassment.—"Where, and under whom?" "In Italy, under General Murat." The son of the solder-king held out his hand to his father's old comrade. "Your name, my brave fellow?" "Claude Gerard: might I ask, sir———" "I am Achille Murat." "It is true then, and my eyes did not deceive me! You are the son of my general, of my king, of my saviour? If I am now alive, if I have a wife and children, I owe it to him, and to him alone;" and thereupon the old soldier told the story we have sketched above, often interrupting it with blessings and exclamations of gratitude.

The prince, whose singular character and aversion to society led him to avoid the city and wander about in the country, never while he remained in America found any roof more welcome, and visited none oftener than that which covered the poor and humble abode of his father's old companion in arms.—New Y. Mirror.

IN the flourishing town of Putnam has on hand 40 or 50 SADDLES ready for sale, of different qualities, comprising nearly all the varieties in fashion in our Buckeye State: a good assortment of Bridles and Martingales: riding and driving whips: between 180 & 200 carriage and heavy draft Collars, which will compare and weat with any others made here or elsewhere. Also fine York, Dearborn, heavy team and common farming Harness. A lot of first rate carriage and buggy Harness, (brass and silver plated.)

Trunks, vallises, saddle-bags, and double covered wagon whips, varying in quality and price to suit purchasers.

The only recommendation he now offers for his work, is the testimony and long experience of his old customers and friends. He is still anxious to please and accommodate those who may call on him, and hopes to share so much of the public patronage as his attention to his business shall merit.

Important to Rail Road Companies.

THE subscriber offers to the public a new and improved mode of ascending and descending Inclined Plains on Rail Roads. This improvement supercedes the necessity of horse or stationary power, by giving to the locomotive engine a new wheel, affixed to one of the axles of the motive, which connects with an extra railing laid in the centre of the road, on the plain. As the engine approaches the plain, the pilot wheel on the centre of the axle, falls into gear with the extra railing and propels her onward. The construction and connection of the pilot wheel and extra railing is of such a character that it not only necessarily advances, but advances perfectly smooth, and cannot be impeded by the congealing of ice, the connection of the wheel and railing being on the right and left of the tread.

Rail Road companies or managers wanting further information, will please address the subscriber, at Harrisville, Harrison county, Ohio, or William P. Ellis, Washington city, who has obtained the right of the State of Maryland by purchase, or William C. Pool, of Baltimore, who has the right of Georgia, North and South Carolina on commission.

Important to Farmers.

FARMERS are hereby invited to procure the hitherto unrivalled HULLING MILL.—This machine can be attached to any of the powers now in common use, and is calculated to save a great amount of manual labor. Clover seed can be hulled at the rate of from three to five bushels per hour;—Rice can be hulled at the rate of twenty-five bushels per hour;—Oats, Barley or Spelts, can be hulled at the rate of thirty bushels per hour, ready for flouring;—Corn can be made into hominy at the rate of twenty bushels per hour. Corn, Oats, Rye, Barley, Spelts or Buck-wheat, can be chopped at the rate of fifteen bushels per hour.

A moment's reflection will convince the Farmer of the advantage of possessing such a labor saving machine. Is he a Rice grower?—he can prepare his Rice for the market in one-fourth of the time usually spent, and with one-fourth of the labor. Has he a surplus of Corn?—instead of selling it for twenty-five cents, he can make it into hominy and sell it for two dollars per bushel. Has he a surplus of Barley?—instead of selling it for fifty cents per bushel, he can hull and sell it for six cents per pound, &c. &c. The simplicity, durability, portability, and usefulness of this Mill, recommend it as one of the most desirable and money producing machines of modern invention.

Those wishing to procure this machine in Georgia, North or South Carolina, can address William C. Pool, Baltimore, Maryland; those of the State of Maryland, can address Richard B. Chinoweth. also of Baltimore; in this region of country, can address Lewis Ward, of Zanesville, Levi B. Ball, of Putnam, Abraham Baker, of Mt. Vernon, or Mr. Hanawalt, of Licking county. other sections can address the subscriber at Harrisville, Harrison county, Ohio. The most liberal terms will be given to mechanics who may wish to make, vend and use this Hulling Mill in sections not yet occupied. We invite the public to call and see for themselves.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Western Recorder.

I AM BUT A SOLITARY MAN.

A SKETCH.

While as yet our country was in a colonial ate and had made but few advances in the owledge of the extent, soil and productions of is fertile tract, now known as the valley of the ississippi, the following legend is said to have giginated. Mr. Adamson took a walk in the vening of a beautiful shining May day, and was mpted by the deliciousness of the air, the mu-c of the birds, and the ever varying scenery of e wilderness to penetrate further into its depths an he had designed. Persons reared in large owns and cities have a very faint idea of their cinations. The clear evening sun shone brilantly on the tops of the forest, and the shades f the tall trees waved in harmony beneath, with he substances which produced them. The varities of May flowers were almost boundless, and he gobble of the wild turkey, the drum of the heasant, the whistle of the partridge and the otes of the mocking bird made up a choir more elicious than the piano, more charming than he clarionette.

Mr. Adamson, being naturally of a poetic emperament, was enraptured, both with the fa-inations of the scenery and the melody of the music. As is often the case with such dispositions he fell into a reverie, during which he rep-esents that he was joined in his walk by a gentleman far advanced in life, whose dignified conversation and venerable appearance made a deep and favorable impression upon his mind. The old gentleman's head was white as time could bleach it, and his long and curling beard rested on his aged bosom in graceful tresses. His countenance told of the lapse of years, but seemed rather to have accumulated marks of profound intelligence and an expression of sweetness than to have degenerated into imbecility and apparent acidity by the revolutions of time. He addressed Mr. Adamson, who was then a young man, in the following manner:

"Seest thou yon tall mountain in the far distant and scarcely visible west? Beyond it is a land the fertility of whose soil, the majesty of whose streams and depths of whose shades are far superior to those which you now inhabit. There run the wild deer, the horse and the buffalo.—
You are young and healthy,—your colony and their descendents are deeply interested in the enterprize, why not go forward and possess this land of rivers, lakes and streams,—of flowers, shades and fruits?"

"Alas," replied young Adamson, "I am but a solitary man. The opposite side of those mountains is, no doubt, like this. The wild tribes of untamed savages would overcome me; or should I even escape their thirst for the blood of the white man, I should be subject to the ferocity of the wild animals of the desert. I have but few weapons of defence, and fewer still of husbandry to cultivate the soil."

"Well," said the time-worn genius, "you can at least acquaint your colony of the existence of this land."

"They are feeble," replied the youth, "and could spare but few of their number, and fewer of their means for so great an undertaking."

"Then," rejoined the aged sire, "adopt the following plan, and you can affect much, and in time subdue the country and render all its advantages subservient to your best interests, and tributary to your happiness. The prairies have never yet known the sweep of a scythe. Many of her chrystal springs have never yet been tasted by man, and her forests are unacquainted with the all-conquoring nature of steel. Repose thyself to night upon thy couch, in the morning when thou awakest wash thyself and comb thy locks, take thy repast and repair to thy neighbor's next thee and inform him of this land.—
Call together the wise men of thy colony, and send deputations to the other colonies. Let all be informed of the advantages that will result to all, and all will feel interested."

The voice of the seer was obeyed. United effort was crowned with success. The country was explored and is now densely populated, forming numerous States and Territories. Towns and cities adorn this fertile valley. Institutions of learning and religion are rapidly multiplying.— Schools, academies and colleges are spreading around on every hand. Endless means are at our command to make us all we could desire.—
But there are some formidable impediments in the way. Every one who thinks on the subject is ready to exclaim with young Adamson, "I am but a solitary man." But what can one do to remove so great a difficulty out of the way? I allude to the corrupting influence of the political press of the country on the morals and happiness of the community.

The great mass of our population have caught the political mania which severs mankind and makes implacable enemies even of brothers. Vituperation of the best characters in our land is publicly practiced by the great majority of our newspaper presses and editors; they devour each other's characters and endeavor to sink and defame each other's reputation.

I know it is said by some, let these things alone and they will regulate themselves. So did Noah's flood regulate itself, but it was by the destruction of a whole generation, and thus it may be with the presses of the present day, and with the present race of men. How mortifying to see men of commanding influence and towering talents—of the purest wit and most searching intellect, with such an engine as the press preying upon the morality and happiness of fourteen millions of inhabitants.

To remedy this two plans suggest themselves, each of which might be effectual. The first is to endeavor to conciliate the conductors of public journals, and endeavor to enlist their feelings on the side of virtue and moral reformation. Could they be made to feel the responsible station they occupy, and at present how recreant they are to all the high and exhalted ends which their mighty lever was intended to move, what a herculean power could be arrayed against vice of every description, and what a grand step would be taken towards healing one half the woes to which human life is now subject. But suppose that this cannot be done, but that the present policy be strictly followed out, the next remedy is to urge the people to rally to the reformation of the press.
The people can reform the press. Public sentiment can prevent so useful, so benignant, so powerful a means of doing good from being diverted into the opposite channel, and sacrificing the peace and happiness of a whole nation. We can have county and township meetings for political purposes. We can make men travel from one end of the Union to another to effect some political object. And shall the politicians of the day work by rule and concentrate their efforts and their zeal, and shall the true philantropists manifest less zeal, less fervor in a cause ladened with the destiny of a nation? America groans for deliverance from such flagrant abuses of one of heaven's best gifts. The attention of editors should be aroused to a sense of the lofty pre-eminence which they occupy for acting the philan-throphist, on an extended scale, far beyond that of any other of their fellow citizens. And no one amongst her thousand editors should say, in relation to any work of benevolence towards our species, "I am but a solitary man;" what can I do to arrest the current of abuses?

I have merely made these suggestions in hope that remarks worthy of the magnitude of the subject may thus be elicited from abler pens. May I not hope that congenial spirits will associate together for the purpose of devising ways and means to come at so momentuous a desideratum?

Yours, very respectfully, F.

Zanesville, O., April 3, 1840.

PERSONS OF DIFFERENT OPINIONS & HABITS.

The Lord reveals some truths to all men, and bestows a great many blessings of all kinds, upon all men. Every one is required to use all the truth that he has in doing right, and those who have most truth should do most good. But the Lord leaves men free to believe the truth and use it in doing good, or to disbelieve it and use it in doing evil. Those who live as the Lord teaches them to live are made happy; those who live contrary to this are made miserable.

If we meet one who does not understand and believe as we do, or who does not try to live as we think is right, we should carefully consider which is wrong, whether he or ourselves. If we are wrong, we should reform and be thankful that he helped us to see our error. If we have good reason to think that he is wrong, we should very kindly endeavor to show him his fault. It is not right for us to feel unkindly towards those who think wrong or act wrong. The Lord is kind to the unthankful and the evil; and He desires that they should believe the truth, love it and obey it. We also should desire the same; and should do all we can to show them how to believe right.
But if we cannot do them any good, we must still avoid all unkind thoughts and feelings, words and actions.

If you see a man going the wrong way, you may do, and you ought to do all you can, to show him the right way, and to persuade him to go in it; but you must not try to compel him, nor call him hard names and treat him harshly if he persists in going wrong. Whether he goes wrong or not, you will certainly be in the wrong if you treat him unkindly.

Suppose two men started from the west and designed to go to Boston; and after a great while they meet at Cambridge. There are several roads that go from Cambridge to Boston, and they are all pretty direct. These men explain to each other their intention of going to the city, and after taking a glass of water, (they are both temperate,) and resting a short time at the tavern they started on their way. When they came where the road divides, one said they must keep to the right hand, and the other said they must go straight forward, and so they stopped to reason about it. Each was confident that his opinion was right, and was loud and positive in calling the other wrong. The more they talked the more zealous they became, and their zeal presently turned into anger, and their words into blows.
They would fight a little while and then stop, that each might ask the other whether he was not convinced. Then they would fight again, and then stop to rest. Night came upon them while they were quarrelling, and they were ignorant that the sun had gone down. It was a dark and stormy night, and they could see neither one road nor another. They parted, however, each feeling sure he was right. They wandered about till morning, and then one was found on the way to Lower Canada, and the other to Lake Erie. They were still confident that they were on the direct road to Boston, and had become less willing than before to be told the right way.
I suppose they are still travelling for the same purpose, and that each is continually growing obstinate in his opinion that his own way is the right way. T. C.

CAMBRIDGE, OHIO, MARCH 27, 1840.

Mr. Editor: My last communication was from West Chester. The meeting there continued sometime after I left, and resulted in the admission of about eighty persons to probationary membership, as I have been informed by one of our ministers who labored in that meeting to its close. The Georgetown meeting came next, and was an interesting time. About ten were received on probation—much good feeling prevailed among our people. The circuit, in nearly all its appointments, was rising, and my hope is that Bro. Clancy, though young in the ministry, will, under the divine blessing, succeed in building up the cause of Christ, where he now labors.

On Mt. Pleasant circuit, the meeting I attended was held in Smithfield. The great rains were against our success; but very few attended and only two were added to the church during my stay among them. I have learned from Bro.
Dunlevy, that the quarterly meeting, the week following, resulted favorably. A number were added to the church. Mt. Pleasant is a good circuit, and I trust our good brethren, who labor there, will yet be favored with a revival before the year closes.

On the first Sunday in March, I attended Bro. Burn's second quarterly meeting in Steubenville. It was a pleasant season—some souls were added to the church, and I trust, joined to the Lord. About one hundred and fifty have been received in that station since Conference.
While there, a letter from Bro. Cochran informed me of a glorious work of God in progress on Cleveland circuit, and that one hundred and twenty members had been received on probation, since Conference.

Ill health and knowledge of the fact that my appointment for Mill Creek circuit, March the 8th, did not reach them, caused me to remain at home another Sunday. On the 10th I set out—preached twice in Wheeling. Our friends there are quite feeble and discouraged, yet I trust a better day is coming; they may, at no distant day, re-organize to good advantage, if they bear up under present trials and do not allow themselves to be squandered among other churches.

In the forepart of last winter, I employed Bro. Allen to labor as a missionary, principally in Marshall county, Va. On my way down to Tyler mission, I fell in with him, and learned that he had some sixteen or more appointments, which he filled regularly, and that in three or four neighborhoods, he was about to form respectable classes. Bro. A. seems to be quite in the spirit of a missionary, and I trust, will be able to give a good account of his labors, at our next Conference. Several classes have been formed by Bro. DeGarmo on the Tyler mission, and the way appears to be opening for others to be organized soon. I trust these missionaries will make no off-hand efforts to organize classes, lest worthless materials come rushing in upon them and the cause be disgraced. In all cases where an organization is contemplated, those who are expected to join us, should be visited; their names obtained, to be read out publicly, as going into the organization; thus a respectable nucleus can be formed, through whose agency and consent others can be received. Our cause is sometimes put down to rise no more, for want of due caution in the outset.

I next came to Woodsfield circuit. The meeting was at the Leatherwood Temple. Nothing special of the revival kind occurred. Bro. Caddy and his colleague are much beloved, but not well supported. It is said this is owing to the pressure of the times. But provisions are plenty, I hope they will furnish them food to eat—aye, and clothes to wear, if the produce of the earth will bring them.

Mr. Editor, my heart has been greatly delighted with the manifest improvement in our ministry; to their advancement in knowledge, moral energy, piety and punctuality in meeting their appointments, may, I think, under the blessing of Almighty God, be attributed the success which has so signally attended their labors this year. I hope in God, that they will be sustained in their arduous toils in the vineyard of the Lord, by our people and a generous public. I have no time just now to say more—indeed I have much more to say, my heart rejoices in the assurance of abundant success in the church here on earth and final glory in heaven, if we are faithful to God and to one another.

Yours, truly, GEO. BROWN.

LEVINA FARM, MARCH 16, 1840.

Brother Springer: I have just returned from hearing a sermon preached from Proverbs 24th, and the 1st clause of the 16th verse, which has brought many things to my recollection; some of which, I have thought I would send you, at the same time leaving it with yourself, whether they appear in print or otherwise. In the first place, you know, we left a good society in West Middletown, Pa., when we removed to this State, just five years ago. When we settled here, the nearest Methodist Protestant Society we knew of, was at Bro. Waddle's, ten miles distant. The ground seemed to be so completely occupied by Episcopal Methodists, Covenanters, Seceders, Presbyterians and those by some called Campbellites, that it was thought there could be no Methodist Protestant Society established in this place. Under those circumstances, some of my friends in the M. E. Church advised me to unite with them, at what is called "McCoy's meeting house," and at a protracted meeting, the matter was pressed so hard, that I told my friend before that step was taken I wished to have an interview with the preacher in charge, Bro. Battelle.
Immediately he was at my side. I told him of the solicitation of my friend—that I had formerly been a member of the M. P. Church, and that if I should unite with them, it would be by certificate. He then inquired if ever I had belonged to the M. E. Church; I told him I had. He then told me, "if I liked the Reformers better than I did them, to stay with them." I remarked to him, that circumstances sometimes altered cases, and that I was now out of the bounds of the M. P. Society. To this, he replied as above,
"if you like them best, stay with them." This was what I expected; but I thought it best to let my friend see that I had some ground for not uniting with and sustaining such arbitrary power. My friend did see, and was so confounded that the matter of union was never after mentioned.

In the meantime, I felt as a stranger in a strange land, without preaching as well as class and prayer meetings. In this situation, my mind was carried back to West Middletown, to our former privileges—our prayer and class meetings —our sunrise meetings,—and last, but not least,—our old Sabbath School, where I used to spend so many precious Sabbath mornings, in striving to point the youth to the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world. But, alas! thought I, those good times, or times like those, I shall never see again. My mind began to despond, and on Sabbath mornings I used to retire to the woods and pour out my complaint to God, and give relief to my troubled heart, in a flood of tears.

But, glory to God! the scene has changed.— Toward the close of Bro. Palfreeman's year we obtained preaching at our house. In the winter of the following year, we organized a class of five members, and on the Saturday and Sabbath preceding the Conference in Wheeling, we held a meeting in our barn, and bless the Lord, He once more appeared, if not in a manger, He did in the barn. The congregation seemed to melt before the power of His grace. Five more were added to the society. Some two or three others have been added at intervals, which brings me up to last winter, when brothers Baldwin and Fairchild concluded to preach a few evenings in succession, at which time the Lord attended the word with power, and eleven more were added to our little society, principally heads of families. About a year ago, it was resolved to establish a Sabbath School, in which I have been much blessed, and I trust much good done.

Three weeks back, Bro. McConnel, with two of our local brethren, held a meeting in this place, at which, nine more were added; three or four of whom were Sabbath School scholars. Last Thursday evening, another brother united with us, whose case is somewhat singular. He is a man, probably fifty years of age, whose conscience the Lord got hold of at the meeting in the barn.
But yet he did not yield. However, the Spirit followed him, time after time, and prayer was made without ceasing, on his behalf. At the time Bro. McConnel was with us, he became very much affected; two of his children had united with us as well as his two sons'-in-law, and their wives, his own companion and one of his own sons had belonged for some time. The old man determined that he would not go to Methodist meeting any more, and that his wife and children should not go, or if they did, they should not return to their homes. He finally concluded he would go to Londondary and get completely drunk, as he termed it. Away he went, called for whiskey, took one dram, but could drink no more. He then had his bottle filled and concluded that he would get drunk at home. But the Lord would not let him. In the meantime, he came well nigh loosing his life by an accident. He then thought if God had called him to eternity in his present condition, his soul must have been lost. He then began to think he must have religion—got his Bible—called his family for worship, and glory to God! what a time of rejoicing. And now the father, mother, son and daughters, I trust, are on the full stretch for the New Jerusalem. Now, my brother, I am at home once more; to God be all the glory. I feel like saying to all that may be placed under similar circumstances, be faithful, trust in God, and the language of the Poet will be verified:

"Ye fearful souls, fresh courage take,
The clouds you so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head."

Yours, in Christ,
JOHN CAREY, JR.

PLEASANT HILL CIRCUIT, OHIO, March 16, 1840.

Mr. Editor: We believe no subject is more cheering to the christian than to hear of the progress of practical religion; therefore, we wish to communicate a few particulars respecting the work of God in this circuit, since our last communication.

At High-Hill meeting house, God has revived
His work; sinners have been converted, backsliders healed and the old professors greatly revived.

Bro. R. Richardson held a quarterly meeting in West Chester,—the result was glorious.
EIGHTY-FOUR were received into the church and many truly converted to God. A goodly number of my circuit caught the heavenly fire. At High-Hill meeting house, since Conference, SIX-TEEN have been added to the society. At Bro.
John Parker's clas SIX members, and the best of all is, I think that God has converted their souls.
At Hartwood meeting house, SIX members have been added. Our second quarterly meeting commenced at Hopewell M. H., March 7th.— Bro. R. Richardson and Bro. McConnell was in attendance, but were under the necessity of leaving us on the third day; Bro. Edmund Smith remained. We had good times, but nothing extraordinary occurred until Wednesday the 11th, at our prayer meeting, when the power of the Lord descended in a very abundant manner.
The cries of mourners and the rejoicing of happy souls for the space of one hour, struck me with astonishment and wonder. The Lord carried on His own blessed work. THIRTEEN professed to be converted to God that night. NINETEEN in all, professed to get religion in this place. Our society consists of seventeen, the old brethren had a society of nearly the same number. The two classes joined in the meeting, and a number of episcopal brethren assisted us.

I opened the church door and gave the new converts their choice which of the two churches to join. The result was, twelve attached themselves to our church, and six to the Methodist Episcopal Church. At Bro. John Carey's, the Lord has revived His work abundantly. We have received, in all, since Conference, SEVENTY-EIGHT members.

Our next quarterly meeting is to be held at Pleasant Hill meeting house, May the 10th. I have an appointment for Bro. Brown at Hopewell meeting house, two miles from Bermingham, on Friday the 8th of May, at 11 o'clock. Ministerial and Lay brethren are affectionately invited to attend. Yours, truly,

THOMAS FOSTER.

PENNSVILLE, O., MARCH 25, 1840.

Bro. Springer: We have had five revivals on this circuit this year, although not so extensive as some I have read of in your useful paper, still they were alarming to the sinner, comforting to the mourner, and joyous to the real friend of religion. At Pennsville, on the 1st of March, we had our last revival. The meeting lasted only five days and twenty-two joined the church, making in all received since Conference ninety-six. This is the Lord's doings, and it is marvellous in our eyes. Oh that God would revive his work universally!

I am yours in the bonds of a peaceful gospel, D. Y. OSTROM, Sup't. Pennsville circuit.

MARCH 2, 1840.

Mr. Editor: I am called upon by Bro.
Bassett, of Indiana, to give an explanation of the phrase, "the devil's humbug."
My friend knows this is an expression which has came into very common use recently, especially among political writers.
Humbuggery, with them, means attempts at imposition and deception. So, when the devil deceives christians about little matters, and sets families and churches at variance, he may be said to humbug them, and these trifling things may be called "the devil's humbugs." When a large church or neighborhood is thrown into bitter and ruinous strife about a goose or a goslin, the devil has fairly humbugged them. Not that we have had any goslin scrapes, but we state the case in the abstract for the purpose of illustration.

I am yours, &c., C. WOODRUFF.

A CURE FOR THE CROUP.—Take one tea spoonful of pulverized allum and the white of one egg, and two tea spoonfuls of honey—beat them all together, and give one tea spoonful every hour to a child two years of age, and so on accordingly.
Before the above is administered give the child one tea spoonful of castor oil and half a tea spoonful of the spirits of turpentine, and in fifteen minutes its benefits will be seen. MARY OSTROM.

ADVENTURE IN THE CUMBERLAND MOUNT-AINS.—Some years ago some men went on a hunting excursion to the Cumberland mountains, which divide Virginia from Kentucky. They established their camp in a wild, secluded valley—and made preparation for a week's capital sport. But on the first day's diversion, Capt. Stanwood, a brave and athletic officer in the army, strayed away from his companions in quest of game, and after wandering about for some hours, was obliged to entertain the very unwelcome opinion that he had lost his way. But accustomed to a backwoods life, and armed with a good rifle, a tomahawk and a hunting knife, he did not regard the event in so serious a light as many would have done, and, indeed, if he had been provided with provisions, he would not have suffered a moment's uneasiness about the matter.

As the shades of night began to fall, he struck a light with the fire-works he carried in his pocket, built a good fire with the dry wood which he found in abundance around him, placed his arms in such a manner that he could seize them in an instant if necessary, then stretched himself upon the ground, and overcome with the fatigues of the day, slept soundly until morning. He then arose and resumed his attempt to find his way back to the camp. He soon came to a portion of this unexplored wilderness, where the trees were not large, but where there was a dense growth of underwood—and after he had been with much labor striving to make his way through it for an hour, he became aware that some wild animal was following in his footsteps.

He could distinctly hear the crackling of the bushes; and could now and then catch a glimpse of the creature through the bushes at a distance, yet he was unable to ascertain the species of the animal which seemed so kindly determined to cultivate an acquaintance with him. He however looked at the priming of his rifle, loosened his knife in the sheath, and prepared himself to make a desperate struggle if attacked.

It was not long before he emerged from the thick growth of underwood, and found himself on the side of a barren mountain where the rocks were disposed in platforms and shelves, one over the other, and extending apparently to a great distance.
He stepped out on one of these platforms and commenced walking off rapidly, with the intention of putting as much space as possible between him and his prowling enemy, occasionally looking back to see if he followed. He had not gone more than a hundred and forty yards, before he saw creeping out of the thicket, with a stealthy pace, an enormous panther, or catamount, which took the ledge above him, and followed after him, apparently resolved that they should not part company until they had become a little better acquainted with each other's merits.

Capt. Stanwood, although brave and inured to perils by flood and field, well knew the character of his cunning and ferocious companion, and did not feel so much at ease, as if a deer or even a wolf or bear, had come out of the thicket. He knew he could not get rid of the panther until after a combat, which must result in the death of one, and perhaps both. He was a good marksman, but he well knew the consequence of only wounding his antagonist, and resolved not to fire at him until he could be sure of lodging a ball in his heart, otherwise the ferocious animal would spring upon him, and in his rage and agony tear him from limb to limb.

They journeyed onwards in this way,
for two or three miles, whenever Capt.
Stanwood stopped, his enemy on the ledge above him would also stop, and lie down with his huge paws projecting cat-like, from his breast, as if ready for a sudden spring. At length Capt. Stanwood found himself approaching the termination of the rocky ledge, and was very anxious to bring the affair to a crisis, before he entered the wood, where the advantage would be altogether upon the side of his grim adversary. Besides, the panther had been gradually lessening the space between them, and was now within a distance of not more than sixty or seventy yards.

He stopped, the panther also stopped.
Capt. Stanwood looked to his flint and primed his rifle with fresh powder. He also took his hatchet and knife from his side, and placed them on a rock, breast high against which he was standing, that he might seize them at once if his rifle should fail him, and to grapple hand to hand with this fiercest and most dreaded of the inhabitants of the wilderness. He then put the rifle to his eye, and directed it to the white spot upon the panther's breast, which was visible from the spot upon which he stood. It was an anxious moment, and he fanced for a moment that his nerves trembled. He knew that his life, perhaps, depended upon the accuracy of his aim—and he resolved to suspend operations for a minute, for his nerves to acquire their wonted rigidity. He then again coolly raised his rifle—put it to his shoulder, and the sharp report reverberated from the sides of the mountain. He saw through the smoke that the catamount sprung upwards of six or eight feet, and then fell motionless upon the rock. Capt. Stanwood re-loaded his rifle and then ascended the side of the mountain, until he reached a spot above which his enemy lay extended, he fired another shot at his head, but the animal moved not, and he was convinced that it was dead. He then found on examination that the first shot had pierced his thorax, and perforated his heart.

Capt. Stanwood went on his way rejoicing that he had so fortunately escaped. He entered the forest before him, and pursued a direction which he thought would take him to the camp. He was fatigued and hungry, but late in the afternoon a black bear crossed his path, and uttering a half stifled growl, seemed inclined to dispute his farther progress. A bullet from the Captain's rifle, however, put an end to the contest before it had hardly begun, and in a few minutes the bear was flayed, and our adventurer proceeded on, carrying the shaggy skin of the animal and enough of his flesh to serve him for a good supper and breakfast on the following day. He came about sunset to a rocky ledge, in which was a cave, where he had some idea of passing the night, and was about gathering some materials for a fire, when he concluded to proceed on his way as long as the twilight lasted. He soon reached the banks of a small stream, which he could not ford, and which he knew was but a few hours' walk from the camp, and concluded to return to the cave, cook some supper and take up his lodgings for the night, and in the morning resume his journey.

It was quite dark when he reached the cave. He entered it, placed his rifle against the rock, with which the floor of the cave was covered, when to his astonishment and horror, he grasped a man's foot! He sprung back and caught up his rifle, at the same time he heard the individual whose slumbers he had thus unceremoniously interrupted, jumped up and seized his arms. Stanwood yelled out in a voice that must have alarmed all the wild beasts within earshot. "Who is there? Speak quick, or I fire."

The occupant of the cave hastily answered, "A friend! Don't fire! Stanwood, I'm glad I've found you at last."

Stanwood recognized the voice of Captain Wilson, an old friend and companion in arms, who had made one of the hunting party, and who, it appeared, had started that morning alone, in quest of his friend who, he rightly imagined had lost his way. He had hit upon his track in the afternoon, and followed it until he came to the spot where lay the carcass of the bear, and continued on until he came to the cave, where, finding that Stanwood had gone on, Wilson worn out with fatigue, resolved to abide till morning. He had thrown himself down on the leaves, and just fallen into a sound sleep, when he was aroused by Stanwood seizing him by the leg.

The friends struck a light, made a rousing fire, roasted and eat some huge slices of "bear venison," and passed a comfortable night in the cave, and the next morning returned to the camp without meeting with any further adventures.—Boston Mercantile Journal.

Most Extraordinary Case.—For some time past the curiosity of our citizens has been kept on the qui vive concerning an extraordinary physical phenomenon, of which, as yet, no satisfactory explanation has been attempted. The learned and unlearned—medical and non medical—the sceptical and the credulous, have been puzzled by the "Spider Case," as it must par excellence be called, by which soubriquet it still stands acknowledged. These are the principal points of its history, gathered by inquiry from the most authentic sources at which we could arrive.

The patient, while on a visit to a friend in the country, felt, while in bed, an object of some kind fall upon the upper part of the cheek bone, just below the left eye. She brushed it away, and, after a restless night, awoke in the morning suffering its consequence in the form of acute pain, during which time she removed from the eye several fragments of the legs of a spider. Returning to this city a few days afterward, upon complaining to her mother of a similar sensation, an examination was made, when a perfectly formed dead spider, of small size, was removed. A physician being called, all proper investigation was made, in order, if possible, to discover the seat or nidus of the animal, but this proved fruitless. No inquiry has yet been able to detect their seat of empire, and yet they have been continued to be removed from each eye alternately, sometimes from one alone, sometimes from both, for a space of six weeks, to an amount on an average of from two to three every other day.—Portions of what is supposed to be the ovum have been also discharged. Each exit of either animal or web is preceded by acute pain in some portion of the organ, and attention being thus called, the object is easily removed by the attendant. The eyes assume at times much inflammatory irritation and swelling of the lids, with an infected condition of the ball, and copious suffusion of tears.—Charls. Pat.

CONGRESSIONAL.

The United States—Great Britain and the Chinese.—A conversation of some importance recently took place in the House of Representatives. Mr. Cushing alluded to an expression in an English Ministerial journal to the effect that the United States would join heart and hand with the British Government, and endeavor to obtain commercial treaties from the authorities in China.

"Now, said Mr. C., so far as regards myself, I wish to say that this is a great misconception, if it be not a wilful perversion, of what is contemplated here. I have, it is true, thought the present contingency,—when the Americans at Canton, and they almost or quite alone, have manifested a proper respect for the laws and public rights of the Chinese empire, in honorable contrast with the outrageous misconduct of the English there,—and when the Chinese Government, grateful for the upright deportment of the Americans, has manifested the best possible feeling towards them,—I have thought that these circumstances afforded a favorable opportunity to endeavor to put the American trade with China on a just and stable footing for the future. But, God forbid that I should entertain the idea of co-operating with the British Government in the purpose—if purpose it have—of upholding the base cupidity and violence, and high-handed infraction of all law, human and divine, which have characterised the operations of the British, individually and collectively, in the seas of China. I disavow all sympathy with those operations. I denounce them most emphatically. And, though it is not competent for me to speak now of what has been done or is intended in the Committee on Foreign affairs relative to this, yet thus much I may say, that, in that committee, and among all its members, I am confident there is but one spirit,—and that is, to guard the interests and to maintain the honor of the United States. It is due to the Executive, also, that I should say that I have no reason to believe or suspect that the President or his Cabinet entertains any but the most proper views on this subject. At the same time, to close the door at once against all misunderstanding, and set the whole matter in a clear light, in order that the Chinese Government need not be misled into supposing that, while the Americans in Canton profess to act in good faith, and enjoy the benefits of it, any different purpose is entertained here, I put the question to the chairman of the committee on Foreign Affairs—Whether he himself, or, so far as he knows, the Executive of the United States, has any idea of making common cause with Great Britain in reference to the recent events in China?"

Mr. Pickens, in reply, said that, "in reference to himself, it was very far from being the fact that he was disposed to make common cause with England in her designs on China; for the very first moment the subject was referred to the committee and laid before them, that very point was made by himself, and he objected expressly to our appearing before the world (as might be inferred from an expression in the memorial referred to) as acting in concert with the British Government in regard to this matter. So far as the Executive was concerned, he had no authority for speaking; but he was induced to believe that no such fact of intended concert with Great Britain, as the gentleman (Mr. C.) directly referred to, existed. He (Mr. P.) had no intention directly or indirectly, to aid in forcing on the Chinese the odious traffic of opium. He believed that if we could prevail on China to abandon her policy of non-intercourse with the world—if we could prevail on her to enter into any arrangement that might have for its basis commercial relations which would place us on an equal footing with other powers, it would be all that was necessary. But of this he had little hopes; for it was known that China, from time immemorial, had been opposed to all treaties.—Our only object (said Mr. P.) is to place our commerce with China on an equal footing with that of other nations, and to see that no advantage be taken of us.—Surely England does not occupy a position at present to command any sympathy or co-operation from us. He would forbear to touch upon those points that are now at issue between us, which may, in the progress of events, become of the deepest importance. It is not our policy to appear to act under her cover and co-operation. We will act upon our separate and independent interests, and our own views of policy."

Mr. Cushing then said: "I thank the House for its indulgence, and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who has answered my question so satisfactorily; and I trust the idea will no longer be entertained in England, if she choose to persevere in the attempt to coerce the Chinese by force of arms to submit to be poisoned with opium in whole provinces, that she is to receive aid or countenance from the United States in that nefarious enterprise."

We point to these declarations with pleasure. They do honor to the country. The Chinese are endeavoring to rescue their government from a curse worse in its effects, both upon body and mind, than intemperance produced by rum. The British are opposed to this laudable object, inasmuch as it will interfere with their commercial projects. But Heaven forbid that the United States should sustain or participate in a work so unholy.

An intelligent contemporary observes—"The opium trade has long been prohibited by the Emperor of China, but has been extensively carried on by British and other vessels, with a full knowledge of this fact. And now, to strip this question of all its appendages, the Kingdom of Great Britain declares war, because the Chinese Government have taken rigid measures to prohibit this illegal traffic, and suppress this illicit intercourse, because they have determined to put down the smuggling of opium into their country. Would Great Britain tolerate such conduct in her own dominions? Has she no laws against smuggling? Is not this a crime severely punishable by the laws of her statute book? Why then seek to punish a foreign power for the suppression of the very acts, which are made criminal by her own laws? We think this subject should be discussed—it involves a serious and important question in the law of nations, and most deeply effects our own intercourse with the Chinese. But independently of the question of trade—is there not a high moral character attached to this enforcement by the Chinese of their own laws;—and have foreign nations a right to interfere with the domestic rights of an independent government? Great Britain is a mighty and powerful nation—but supposed that the time had gone by—at least in the intercourse of nations—when the old maxim of might makes right—was to be declared the rule by which civilized nations were to be governed. Will our own government tacitly and quietly suffer this war to be carried on under such pretences and on such grounds, without uttering an indignant protest against this infringement of national honor and integrity?"

We hope not. The civilized nations of the earth may be said in the present enlightened period of the world, to constitute a family of nations. When therefore one member of that family is found engaged in a national fraud—an outrage altogether flagrant and unjust, it becomes the duty of the other members of that family, or of such as go for integrity, justice and fair dealing, to raise the voice of remonstrance and rebuke.—Bicknell.

Horrible Conduct of the Chinese towards the British!!!—The Chinese connived for a long time at the smuggling of opium in their country by British traders, but at length took it into their heads to suppress this illicit traffic, and, horrible to relate, actually seized and confiscated an immense quantity of opium that was on the point of being smuggled into their territory, and imprisoned and otherwise maltreated the smugglers!!! This is a matter which calls loudly for the extirpation of the Chinese, by the naval and military forces of the British Government; and it is ardently hoped that a most extensive and a most expensive expedition will be immediately equipped for the purpose of butchering or murdering all the men, women and children of China, that can possibly be got at by any means, whether fair or foul, seeing that if any foreigners smuggle merchandize of any kind into England, and were detected in so doing, the officers of her Majesty's Government would instantly take the said smugglers under their especial protection and custody, and far from confiscating the smuggled articles, would buy them of their owners at a price which would yield them an immense profit!

It is therefore incumbent on her Majesty's Government to cause a series of most bloody massacres to be forthwith perpetrated upon the vile inhabitants of China, and to take care that an enormous amount of burnings, pillage and other christian benefits, be at once conferred upon those atrocious miscreants, and the humane and liberal Government of her most Sacred Majesty, Victoria the First, will immediately cause all this to be done, can hardly be doubted in this civilized community!

P. S. The Chinese eat dogs, wear pigtails, and do not speak English!!! Such monsters of iniquity are unfit to live; and her Majesty's Government should therefore take care that they are immediately exterminated!—London Colonial Gazette.

British Possessions in India.—The existing troubles with China may, or may not, lead to a long and costly war, but it is certain that Russia looks earnestly at every difficulty which may break out in the east as opening a prospect for undermining the British power in India. The war now prosecuting against Circassia, and the assemblage of a formidable Russian squadron in the Black Sea, all tend to the furtherance of the great object which Russia has so much at heart. Indeed it may be said—and it is a singular fact—that war only exists in the east, and great events may grow out of the troubles in India, Egypt and Turkey.—The power of England in India is too formidable to be easily endangered. It is a most remarkable increase of power, influence and territorial limits springing up, it may be said, from a mere commercial company. We hear the glory of England frequently spoken of, but the little island is a very small portion of that glory—the gigantic power is in India. The British Empire in the East Indies now include one hundred millions of people, and extends over 1,250,000 sqr. miles of all climates, from the snow on the mountains of the Gant and Himmelaya, to the burning sands of Hindostan, and 12,000 miles of the navigable rivers Indus, Junga, Sutledge, Ganges and Brahmapootia, with large cities Calcutta, Delhj, Benares, Lucno, Poona, Madras, and Bombay. They hold the Great Mogul and all the reigning princes as their captives, and can bring into the field an army full as large as Russia. Europe cannot, by a combined effort, dislodge England from her vast possessions in the East Indies, and as to the Chinese war, it is evident that if it is protracted, it will be merely to sea fights with the junks and coasters.

A Chinese Map of the World.—It is two feet wide by three and a half high, and is almost covered with China! In the left hand corner, at the top, is a sea, three inches square, in which are delineated as small islands, Europe, England, France, Holland, Portugal and Africa. Holland is as large as all the rest, and Africa is not so big as the end of one's little finger! The northern frontier is Russia, very large. The left corner, at the bottom, is occupied by "the western ocean," as it is called, containing the Malay peninsula pretty well defined.—Along the bottom are Camboja, Cochin China, &c., represented as moderate sized islands, and on the right is Formoso, larger than all the rest put together. Various other countries are shown as small islands. I should have given an engraving of this curious map, but that a true reduction to the size of a page would have left out most of these countries altogether! The surrounding ocean is represented in huge waves, with smooth passages, or highways, branching off to the different countries, or islands, as they represent them. They suppose that ships which keep along these highways go safely: but they, who, through ignorance or stress of weather, diverge, they soon get among these awful billows, and are lost!—Malcolm's Travels.

The British Tampering with the Indians.—The Detroit "Spirit of '76" of the 17th instant, states that information had been received in that city by a member of the Legislature of Michigan, that several letters from the British authorities in Upper Canada to the frontier tribe of Indians, had been intercepted, which offered them inducements to come down "immediately, and enter into arrangements previous to commencing hostilities along the frontiers of the American States." These letters had been placed in the hands of a company of American traders who were going on an expedition for exploration, and for establishing trading posts at some of the remote points on Lake Superior. They were addressed to chiefs known to possess no kind feelings to the people of the United States—this excited some suspicion, and after consultation they determined to place them in the hands of an Indian agent, by whom they were opened.—They were discovered to be from men high in power in the Canadas, inviting the Indians to repair to a certain Island in Lake Huron, and there rendezvous, for purposes that would then and there be known; but urging them to come, and informing them that they would receive valuable presents, "and find employment congenial with their disposition and inclination, along the frontiers of the American States." The letters according to this paper, had been forwarded to Washington, immediately.

The Globe copies the abve statement and prefaces it thus,—

"Letters received yesterday from Detroit, confirm the information contained in the following paragraphs, taken from a paper published in that city on the 19th inst. In the Revolutionary war Lord Chatham denounced, in the most eloquent language, "the horrible barbarity" of employing savages in warfare between civilized and christian nations. He invoked the spirit and humanity of his country, the genius of her constitution, the religion of the land of Bishops, the honor and dignity of the House of Lords, to protect the national character from the shocking cruelty of sending forth the merciless cannibal to lay waste the country of their American brethren, to extirpate their race and name, "by the instrumentality of those horrible hell hounds of war." We fear that all his indignant eloquence, and his vast influence, have failed to humanize the feelings of his countrymen, his descendants, his government, in regard to their modes of warfare."

The Methodist Protracted Meeting which has excited considerable interest in this town, closed on Tuesday evening last.

There has been several preachers of considerable ability, and some of superior endowments, who have exhorted the citizens, and their influence has caused many to drop the tear of repentance at the altar of salvation. Nearly fifty have entered the pale of the church, and have obligated themselves to leave their evil ways, and "walk in the paths of pleasantness and peace."

The powerful and argumentative style of Mr. Turner's preaching has had a salutary effect, and we opine that he has been one of the ablest auxiliaries in the work of regeneration.—Middletown Mail.

Put up your "Franklin's."—The Nashville (Tenn.) S.W.C. Advocate, dated March 28, 1840, says, "A severe thunder storm passed over our city on the night of the 24th, about nine o'clock.—Several houses were stricken. Among others the McKendree (Methodist) church, was visited by a passing bolt. The beautiful Cupola, on the west side, was stricken near the top—the lightning passed down the front wall, jarring the timbers and shivering the windows, doing considerable damage.

"All this might have been prevented by the timely erection of a lightning rod. We understand that a young man in the lower end of the city received a stroke which will probably terminate his life."

Congress.—The Treasury Note Bill passed the House of Representatives, between 10 and 11 o'clock on Friday night. The Globe states that several of the Opposition members voted for the bill.

In the House, several matters not of general interest were discussed—when the New Jersey Election case again came up, and was not disposed of at the expiration of the morning hour. The rest of the day was occupied with private bills.—Bicknell.

Boston Tremont Theatre.—The Zion's Herald says that $60,000 have been offered for the Tremont Theatre, to convert it into a church—but 70,000 are asked.

Since copying the above, we see it stated that the latter sum has been given for the Theatre by the Lowell Institute.

BY THE SHIP STEPHEN WHITNEY.

By the arrival of the new packet ship Stephen Whitney, the editor of the Brother Jonathan has one day later date from Liverpool—to the 2d of March. Of course the news cannot be very important.

The new steamer President, which is to ply between Liverpool and New York, is rigged as a three-masted schooner.—Her stern is ornamented with heraldic designs, which present a combination of the Arms of England and the United States. Her figure-head will be a bust of Washington. It is calculated that she will carry 1000 tons of goods, besides her complement of coal, luggage, &c.

A New African Expedition is contemplated by the British Government. We learn from the London Athenæum that it is intended to establish commercial relations with those African chiefs within whose dominions the internal slave trade is carried on, by which the external trade is supplied with its victims, and to enter into treaties with them, the basis of which is to be the admission into England of the produce of several territories on favorable terms, on condition of the abandonment and absolute prohibition of the slave trade. The proposed expedition is to ascend the Niger, to the point at which several large tributary streams, fall into it from the eastward, and there and elsewhere to establish factories. Three iron steamboats are to be employed; two of these will be of about 440 tons burthen, and to draw four feet nine inches water: the third, a smaller vessel, which will draw only three feet; the former will each have two engines of thirty-five horse power, the latter only one. The engines are all to be constructed on one model, so that the parts of which will fit all the others. The estimated expense of the outfit is £35,000, and the annual cost under £11,000. That the measure will have a beneficial influence on the civilization of Africa we cannot doubt; and if so, it will tend indirectly, as well as directly, to accomplish its purpose, and check that atrocious system which is the disgrace of humanity; and we may venture to hope for some results of great interest in the way of geographical discovery.

A small steamer called the Argyle, left Liverpool on the 1st for New Orleans.—The Liverpool Albion says she intended to ply as a mail boat between New Orleans and Vera Cruz.

According to the latest Paris paper, Thiers finds great difficulty in forming a ministry, and has asked permission to resign the task; but the king urges him to persevere.

The Duke Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg Gatha has signified to the king of the French that he will not withhold the hand of his daughter from the Duke de Nemours on account of the loss of the Dotation bill.

On the 25th Feb. the Queen of the French and the Duke of Orleans set out for Brussels, to make preparations for the marriage of the Duke de Nemours.

A new law has been issued for the organization of municipal councils in Turkey. They are to consist of thirteen members, comprising the president (being the judge,) mufti, police commissionary, the receiver, his two secretaries, the christian bishop (if there be one,) with six more notables who may choose to sit. For these six there will be an election, and an electoral college. The institution seems destined to introduce the commencement of a representative and electoral system into Turkey.

Romanism in England.—We learn from the London Catholic Directory for 1840, that there are 457 chapels in England and Wales in connection with the Catholic Church, and 65 in Scotland, independent of 20 stations where Divine service is celebrated. There are 88 chapels in Lancashire, and 54 in Yorkshire. There are nine colleges in England, viz:—St. Edmund's, Hertfordshire; St. Peter's, Somersetshire; St. Paul's do.; St. Mary's, Staffordshire; Ushaw, Durham: Stonyhurst, Lancashire; Ampleforth, Yorkshire; German, Worcestershire. In Scotland, there is one college, in Kincardineshire. There are 10 convents in England, and one in Scotland. The total number of Catholics in Great Britain is estimated at 2,000,000.

An interesting and novel scene was cently presented in a church in Linc shire, England, in the renouncing at baptismal font, by a family of nine sons belonging to the stiff-necked tr of "the devil and all his works." affair was not made public till it was o or these decendants of Moses would h been honored with a church full of nesses. The cause of the sudden conv sation of this Israelitish family is known; it is not many years since father publicly disputed the utility of Society for Converting Jews to Chri anity, and attempted to prove the imp sibility of such an object ever being tained.

From China—Twenty-two Days ter.—By the arrival of the ship Navi tor, Briggs, and the barque Trent Capt. Hallett, we have dates to the 1st December from the Celestial Empire. The last Canton Press, now printed at M cao, received, is dated November 16, a though there is no positive intelligen received respecting some of the last da of the month, there was, it is said, event of importance. The transhipme of cargoes from British to American other vessels, was, it is stated in the c respondence of the Courier, going on wi great activity, and at high rates, in a ticipation of the reply from Canton. The total suspension of the foreign trac still "apprehended," had not of cour yet occurred: and the Canton Press stat that the trade in opium was already newed, the Mandarin boats taking part it.

On the night of the 13th of Novembe the Chinese batteries at Hong Kong ope ed fire at about midnight upon the En lish merchant fleet lying there, and ke it up with little intermission until da light, but without injuring a single ve sel—not a single ball hitting. The weat er was so calm that the vessels could n move out of the range of the guns. The remained at their anchorage during t next day and night, and then move down to Tungkoo Bay. This remov was determined on previous to the moc cannonade; the commander of H. M. sh Volage having given notice that at Tun koo only would merchant vessels be pr tected. Beyond this affair, there do not apear to be any warlike news.

LATER FROM FRANCE.

Havre dates to the 2d of March ha been received at New York, by the pac et ship Louis Philippe. The Herald fu nishes the following items of intelligence

No French Ministry had been forme —but a warm discussion was going on i the journals on the subject.

Great disorders had occurred at Ma rid, and the civil war had again begu in Spain.

The Ministry.—We understand tha his Majesty will grant an audience to M Thiers to-day, when probably somethin definitive will be settled. It will prob bly be the last, and, in fact, one of thes two things must take place; either th formation of a new Cabinet will be defi nitely agreed upon, or else new combi nations must be attempted without the con currence of M. Thiers. M. Dupin wa summoned yesterday to the Tuilleries b the King, who offered him the post o Minister of Justice, which, however that gentleman positively declined to ac cept. Marshal Soult and M. Humann ha also audiences with his Majesty. It is sai that M. de Remusat has consented to hol office as Minister of the Interior, unde M. Thiers, only on condition of M. Leo de Malleville being appointed under secre tary of state in the department of the In terior, and charged, at the same time with the direction of the personnel an the general police.

A commercial letter from Alexandria, 6th inst., communicated to the Journal du Havre, says:—"The French government has no doubt been informed that the Pacha had declared in full council, that on the 1st of March next, an entire freedom of commerce would be proclaimed throughout Egypt, with the sole exception of the cotton harvest, which for this year was to remain a monopoly. More recent political information having led the Pacha to believe that he had yet to incur the chances of war, his Highness has since announced that the promised freedom of commerce will not be granted until peace is established."

Advices from Barcelona of 20th instant state, that since supplies had been received at Solsona, hostilities have been resumed with new vigor on every point. Accounts from Cellent and Girana, announced that on the 13th, 16th, 17th, and 18th, the sound of cannon was heard in several directions.

We stop the press to announce that a telegraphic dispatch has just reached Government, dated Bayonne, announcing that at the suite of serious disorders in the Cortes, Madrid was declared in a state of siege on the 24th February, and the sittings were suspended. On the departure of the courier, tranquility was re-established.

"The Arabs" says a letter from Algiers "finding the attacks upon Blidah, and the upper and lower camps defeated, have again retired to encampments in the tribe of Beni Salah. Abdel Kader, to secure his rear, is gone to besiege Benignat, an important town, which serves as the basis of the operations of the brother of Tedjini, on the skirts of the Desert. The troops which the Emir has left with his Kalifas, are occupied in destroying or blocking up the road from Medah, which they conceive they have rendered impracticable, having cut it up in many places, and in others, raised redoubts and walls of defence."

THE RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE.

WEDNESDAY, ... APRIL 8, 1840.

We acknowledge the receipt of the April No. of the Lady's Book. Besides its usual amount of interesting matter, it contains a cut of the spring fashions, and a beautiful steel engraving of the "Place of the Tuilleries."

The Registry Bill, now before the Legislature of New York, which makes it necessary for a man to establish his right to vote, a day before the election, instead of at the Polls, is causing great excitement in the city of New York. A certain class talk about the city seceding from the State, &c.

Georgia and Maine.—The Governor of Georgia forwarded the resolutions of the Legislature requesting the action of Congress, on the subject of the difficulty between that State and Maine; but the delegates from Georgia have refused to submit those resolutions to the consideration of Congress, on the ground that it was not a question that belonged to the jurisdiction of that body, but to the United States' Court alone.

We acknowledge the reception of the Third Geological Report of the State of Michigan, by the favor of D. E. Harbaugh, of the House of Representatives. We esteem this a valuable consideration, for which we tender him our thanks. This report contains a map of Wayne county, including the city of Detroit, which is the best delineated of any thing of the kind that we have lately seen.

Great South Western Mail.—The Charleston Mercury names a project that the southern delegation, now in Congress, have in contemplation of establishing a daily mail, by way of Charleston and Augusta, through the Tennessee valley to Memphis, on the Mississippi, and which it is supposed the rail-road improvements, now going on, will greatly facilitate; the people immediately interested are asked to throw in their petitions for this project.

The Charleston, South Carolina, Mercury, says,

"The British Government has made indemnity to the owners only of the slaves liberated from the Comet and Enconium, which were set free before the passage of the West India Emancipation Act—and on the ground that at that time England admitted slavery in her colonies. But they have refused indemnification to the owners of the slaves in the Enterprize, on the ground that when they were forcibly set free, the British Government had abolished slavery in the West Indies."

A Question of Casuistry.—We ask Brother Jonathan to say, which is the most inconsistent with "the Cross," the act of carrying weapons to defend one's self against the murderous assault of a desperado, or to be the conductor of a party political newspaper, especially, at the present time?

We have several times lately met with an account of an attempt to shoot W. G. Brownlow, Esquire, editor of the Elizabethtown (Tenn.) Whig. It was abortive, but the most curious part of the story is, that Mr. Brownlow, who is a clergyman, was provided with pistols in his pockets, to pull out, and fire at his assailants. Such are not the weapons of the Cross.—Bro. Jonathan.

We have been accustomed, from some cause or other, to accord to the New England States, a farther advance in religion and morality, than our southern neighbors. But late indications seem rather against these admissions. The friends of intemperance in Old Massachusetts made an effort, the past winter, and obtained the repeal of the "fifteen gallon" law, and thus obtained a signal triumph. The grog men of Tennessee, at the same time, made a mighty essay to procure the repeal of the "tippling" law of 1838, but came out at the little end of the horn. Thus, while Tennessee has done herself the credit to maintain her integrity, Old Massachusetts has backslidden.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—The General Conference of the M. E. Church commences about the first of May next in the city of Baltimore. This Conference is fraught with importance to the interests of that church. She is now, probably, in a more distracted state than she has been since her organization.

In the first place the whole south gives indications of discontent with the north and west.—The ground work of this dissatisfaction, as near as we can collect, grew out of the doings of the last General Conference, which was held in Cincinnati in 1836. Although that body acted on the great exciting subject of abolition, in passing certain resolutions, so as to suit the views of the south, yet when they came to elect their Bishops, three in number, the north and west united to prevent the election of a slaveholder, and accomplished their purpose. Notwithstanding the abstract decision was favorable to the wishes of the south, yet this practical demonstration was far from being satisfactory.—And some indications have been given since that the south will take care of herself. A late Virginia Conference Journal holds the following language:—"The next General Conference will be, in many respects, the most important meeting ever held by the M. E. Church. Questions affecting the peace and prosperity,—yea, the unity of the church will be agitated."

Secondly;—the abolition discussions which have been going on in the church for some years have produced a state of desperation among the respective parties to that question, that cannot now be compromised. The editor of Zion's Watchman, the leading abolition paper under the patronage of the church, is now charged and will probably be expelled before the meeting of the General Conference, so that his expulsion may be affirmed by that body, and thus the way opened up for the expulsion of abolitionists until that controversy is silenced.

Thirdly;—the attempts on the part of the episcopacy, to put down abolition discussions, has awakened a considerable opposition to their immense prerogatives, which will be carried even beyond the ranks of abolition. And mean time the laity are coming in for snacks. The Lowell "Observer" admits and sustains the claims of the laity to church representation.

Now, to a person acquainted with the Methodist people, and the nature of the iron government of the M. E. Church, it will not be very hard to predict the general result of these pending difficulties. The abolition controversy will be silenced in that church, the claims of the laity will be vetoed, and the power of the episcopacy will be guarded and strengthened. And all this will be done without much loss to the church, except in the north, where the spirit of the old Puritans is not yet entirely extinct.

Whoever is permitted to witness the doings of that body, will see the exhibition of a large amount of human nature, and we are afraid many things which will not be very creditable to christianity.

Maine Boundary Question.—We have read the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Fox, the British Minister, and presented by the President to the Senate of the United States on the 26th ult. The ground of difficulty seems to be that the State of Maine has an armed posse within the bounds of the disputed territory to protect the property from spoliation; to this the British Colonial authorities object as contrary to the existing stipulations between the two governments, and have, as an off-set, paraded a military force within the said territory. The State of Maine denies that this posse is contrary to the arrangements between the two powers. Bicknell, in alluding to this correspondence, says—

"If, as Mr. Fox must admit, the objects of the late agreements were the removal of all military force and the preservation of the property from further spoliations, leaving the possession and jurisdiction as they stood before the State of Maine found itself compelled to act against the trespassers, the President cannot but consider that the conduct of the American local authorities strongly and most favorably contrasts with that of her Majesty's Government. While the one, promptly withdrawing its military force, has confined itself to the use of the small posse, armed as agreed upon, and has done no act not necessary to the accomplishment of the conventional objects, every measure taken or indicated by the other party, is essentially military in its character, and can be justified only by a well founded apprehension that hostilities must ensue.

"With such feelings and convictions, the President could not see, without painful surprise, the attempt of Mr. Fox, under instructions from his government, to give to the existing state of things a character not warranted by the friendly disposition of the United States or the conduct of the authorities and people of Maine—much more is he surprised to find it alleged as a ground for strengthening a military force and preparing for a hostile collision with the unarmed inhabitants of a friendly State, pursuing, within their own borders, their peaceful occupations, or exerting themselves in compliance with their agreements to protect the property in dispute from unauthorized spoliation.

"The President wishes that he could dispel the fear that these dark forebodings can be realized. Unless her Majesty's Government shall forthwith arrest all military interference in the question—unless it shall apply to the subject more determined efforts than has hitherto been made to bring the dispute to a certain and pacific adjustment, the misfortunes predicted by Mr. Fox in the name of his Government may unfortunately happen. But no apprehension of the consequences alluded to by Mr. Fox can be permitted to divert the government and people of the United States from the performance of their duty to the State of Maine.

"Mr. Fox, in reply, under date of the 26th, holds this language:

"It will be the duty of the undersigned immediately to transmit Mr. Forsyth's note to her Majesty's Government in England; and until the statements and propositions which it contains shall have received the due consideration of her Majesty's Government, the undersigned will not deem it right to add any further reply thereto, excepting to refer it to, and repeat, as he now formally and distinctly does, the several declarations which it has from time to time been his duty to make to the Government of the U. States with reference to the existing posture of affairs in the disputed territory, to record his opinion, that an inflexible adherence to the resolutions that have been announced by her Majesty's Government, for the defence of her Majesty's rights pending the negociation of the boundary question, offers to her Majesty's Government the only means of protecting those rights from being in a continually aggravated manner encroached upon and violated."

The correspondence between these two public functionaries is quite tart; the subject seems to be producing some excitement in Congress.

Some unknown person has forwarded to us the "Report of the minority of the Select Committee, to whom was referred the Report of the Directors of the Ohio Lunatic Asylum," which was presented to the House and laid on the table.

This Report calls in question and argues against the ability of Dr. Awl to promote the best interests of the Institution. The principal argument upon which the Report relies to sustain its position, is that drawn from an exhibit of the success of the Ohio Lunatic Asylum, compared with other similar establishments. The following is the exhibit given in the Report before us:

	Recent Cases.	Old Cases.
McLean Asylum, per cent.,	86.	38.
Connecticut Retreat,	91.	26.
Bloomingdale Asylum,	73.
Massachusetts State Hospital,	89.	28.
Western Lunatic Asylum, Va.	83.
Retreat, near York,	70.65	29.19
Dr. Barrow's Private Asylum,	91.32	35.18
*O. L. Asylum, (according to committee's calculation,)	46.51	6.14
In 12 Lunatic Asylums in England, the average per cent. of all cases,		37.2-5
In 14 French Hospitals,		44.9-11
In 4 German do		31.
In 5 U. States, do (Ohio not included,)		41.30
In Ohio Lunatic Asylum,		17.19

In the foregoing results, the rates per cent. upon all cases received into the Institutions for the treatment of insanity, are given. Those of France, occurred between the years 1789 & 1813. England, 1748 and 1820. United States, 1795 and 1832; and the major part, not so late as 1815. Since which time, many important improvements in the establishment of Hospitals for the insane, as well as in the treatment of insanity, have been introduced.

Note.—Recent reports of American Institutions for the treatment of insanity, exhibit a result of above 50 per cent. of cures in all cases, received.

*It is possible the Superintendent did not embrace in his estimate the cases received during the last four months, believing the time insufficient for a fair trial; if so, his results would range between ⅓ and ½ those of other institutions.

This Report hold the following language:

"Is it indispensable to the popularity of the Asylum, that the public prints should be constituted the puffing organs, surreptitiously to procure a character for the Institution, which the skill and ability of its officer must necessarily fail to obtain for it?"

Now, we gave it as our opinion some time past, that Dr. Awl was a suitable person to take charge of this Institution, because he entered into the subject with that enthusiasm which could hardly fail to secure ultimate success; yet we did not design to puff him at the expense of truth. And should facts be against our opinion we are willing to recede. However, though the Report, we are noticing, is written with some ability, we shall receive its doctrines with caution until we hear the other side. As there is such political jealousies between partizan politicians, and as almost every question, or measure, is made political, and as political considerations are esteemed more important than any other, we scarcely know how, or who to trust, where we have no personal information on matters of political controversy. The following remarks from the Bro. Jonathan, are too true:

"Every body has read the story of the unfortunate man who had two wives, and a pepper and salt head. With one of these women it was an object that the husband should appear old; with the other, that he should appear young. In their alternate combings of his head, one plucked out his black hairs, and the other his white, until it fell out, that, between them, all his hair came out, and he was left as bald as a bald eagle.

"Pecisely in this same condition is Uncle Sam; and the jealousy of the two leading parties in the country has made him as bald as the man in the fable. No good measure can originate with one party, but the other to prevent eclat to a rival, must combat it. No matter how good or how necessary any measure may be—no matter how evident its advantages, or how necessary its provisions. It will not answer to let political enemies get the whole benefit of the authorship of any measure which may tell in their favor; and as duty to party, in the politician's creed is paramount to duty to country, the order of tactics, if not direct opposition, is at least such amendment as will convert black to white, and defeat the intent of the original movers."

MARKETS.

Zanesville.—Wheat is 44 cents, which is an advance of four cents since our last.

Philadelphia, Wednesday, March 30.—Flour.—The Flour market continues nearly steady, with a fair demand, though late in the week, owing to the difficulty of obtaining vessels for Europe, and the increased supplies arriving by the canals, prices have slightly declined.—Sales on the Delaware front of the city at $5 for export, and some parcels at 4 87½; on Broad street, sales at 4 87½, and one lot at 4 84—all cash. To-day we quote 4 87½ a 5 00, for fair to good brands.—Bicknell.

Baltimore, March 28.—Flour.—There was no particular variation in the price of Howard street Flour, at which we closed our last report, ($4.81½) until Wednesday, when a parcel of 5000 bbls. was sold by one house, at $4,75, and another parcel of 200 bbls. by another house yesterday, at the same price, both for cash. These were isolated cases, and not the market rates. Holders in general have been firm at $4.81½, which was the closing price last evening; whether they will contiue firm, will depend upon circumstances, there are plenty of buyers at $4.75. The car and wagon price has been steady at 4.62½ per bbl. cash. We note a sale of 300 bbls. City Mills extra, at 5.25, full; and another parcel of standard brand at 5, on a credit of 90 days, without interest. In Susquehanna there have been no operation of any consequence, the small stock is held at 4.81½a4.87½ per bbl. The export demand still continues under restricted conditions, but the sales have been comparatively light since our last report.

Provisions.—We have no variation to note in prices of any description. Small sales of Beef and Pork are making as wanted for ship's stores and city use at quotations. The Transactions in Baltimore cured Bacon amount to about 30,000lbs. at 9 cts. for assorted, and Sides at 9¼.—Hams continue at 11 cts. We quote Lard 8¾ a 9 cents, the latter for prime No. 1, with limited transactions.—Lyford.

OBITUARY.

DIED, at St. Clairsville, on the 26th ultimo, Mr. JOHN R. MULVANY, formerly of this place.

At the residence of Judge Putnam, in Putnan, on Tuesday morning last, the Rev. JOSHUA W. POWERS, of Kingston, Mass., Agent of the American Bible Society.

ITEMS.

The treaty of indemnity for claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico, has been ratified by the Mexican Congress.

There never did, and never will exist anything permanently noble and excellent in a character who is a stranger to self-denial.

The Augusta Age states that the story of the 250 men sent into the disputed territory, from the British Provinces, proves to be incorrect.—We thought it would so turn out.

A lad named Gilbert Dawson, aged 14, died at Schoharie, on the 6th ult., of hydrophobia. His disease arose from a bite in the wrist, by a small dog, early in January last.

The two boys, accused of firing the house of Mr. Scholmeyer in Baltimore, have been discharged honorably, as there was no evidence against them sufficient to justify the charge.

De Witt C. Peabody, an engraver of Ithaca, was arrested on Sunday week, on a charge of counterfeiting, and a large supply of red back bills on the Bank of Warsaw, were found in his room.

The St. Augustine Herald states that the fragments of a vessel supposed to have been burnt at sea, are strewed along the Florida coast from Matanzas to Mosqueto Inlets. There is nothing by which to discover the vessel's name.

Captain Wolfe and crew of the American ship Courier, from Batavia for New York, arrived at Cape Town, January 24th. Their vessel foundered at sea, November 18th. All hands were saved by a Spanish ship.

The New Orleans Bee records the death, by suicide of L H Newton, a jeweller, formerly of Chartres street, late of old Levee. He went to the Israelite burying ground, on the 6th ultimo, and blew out his brains with a pistol.

The Richmond Compiler states that the large barn and stables of Mr. Benjamin W. Green, in Richmond, have been fired by an incendiary, and burned, destroying six valuable horses, for one of which Mr. Green has refused 2000 dolls.

The Apalachicola Gazette of the 7th ultimo, states that the boiler of the steamer Commerce burst, while on her way from that place to Chattahooche, by which two engineers and a passenger named John Burton, were killed. Of course no body was to blame.

A young man named Francis B. Ely, jumped overboard from a steamboat at Salem, Ala., and was drowned. He had previously put in the hands of the Captain some money which he said he had stolen in New Orleans. He was about twenty-two years of age, and was supposed to be a native of Massachusetts.

The New Orleans Times chronicles the passage through that city, of Philo Rawson, the swindling cashier of the Ypsilanti Bank in Michigan. He was on his return from Texas, in charge of a Michigan sheriff, and the receiver of the bank. We take it his sensations were none of the most pleasant.

A paragraph now going the round of the papers kills off all the sons of the signers, except two—Harrison and John Q. Adams. A correspondent of the Boston Centinel says there are fifteen, with the above, still living, making seventeen in all; and of these eight reside in the city of Boston.

Important to Milleners.—A new machine for pressing straw or Tuscan hats is in operation at 57 Chrystie street. It is an immense improvement on the old plan, as the hats are pressed in a very easy and expeditious manner, and with a perfection hitherto unknown.—Bro. Jonathan.

The report that three berths in the British Queen were knocked into one to accommodate the Belgian Giant, is untrue. He only occupied two state rooms—a third having been fitted up for his lady, who, we are told, is an interesting looking woman, rather small in stature. A country editor, we notice, has garbled our former paragraph, by stating that the giant was coming over in two ships!—ib.

Religious fueds are ever the most bitter. The Philadelphia Ledger states that there is a dispute going on in that city, between an Orthodox and Hicksite Society of Friends for the possession of a burial ground. The Orthodox sexton resides on the premises and keeps the enclosure locked, so that when there is a funeral among the Hicksites, the sexton of the latter forces the gate or breaks the lock. On a late occasion, it is stated, something very like a row occurred. Such proceedings, among this peaceable denomination of christians, are very unusual.—ib.

The trial of Wood, the Philadelphia confectioner, for the murder of his daughter, commenced in the Oyer and Terminer Court at Philadelphia, yesterday. Edward Peak, the husband of the deceased, refusing to appear as a witness against his father-in-law, the Court issued an attachment against him, and he was taken into custody. The prisoner, Wood, still continues a silent and melancholy mood, not even taking notice of his wife or surviving children.

Since the above was in type we learn from Bicknell that Wood was acquitted on the ground of insanity. The jury was absent about ten minutes.

Great Fire in Louisville.—This morning's mail brings an account of a most destructive fire at Louisville, Ky., on the morning of the 26th ult. The fairest portion of the city, it would seem, is swept away. Thirty-eight large and heavy business establishments have been burnt out, destroying property to the estimated amount of a million of dollars!—The Louisville City Gazette supposes the fire to have been set by an incendiary.—Ohio State Journal.

State of Trade.—The New York Herald of Monday says, the business at the Custom House has become more animated during the past few days, in consequence of the arrival of many packets from Liverpool with fair cargoes of dry goods. These are not supplies ordered by importers, but are principally sent out by the manufacturers, on their own account. The money market here, however, is such as to prevent this system being pursued, as in former years. The paper of the auctioneers is no longer available as heretofore, and the market of the jobbers in the South and West is destroyed by the derangement of financial affairs.—Lyford.

☞The Legislature of the State of Maryland adjourned sine die on Saturday last, without having taken any action whatever in relation to the Banks or the Currency, and without making any appropriation for the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. An act passed making provision for meeting the demands of the State Treasury, by authorizing the expenditure of the remainder of the surplus revenue, and of the proceeds of the sale of the Bank stocks owned by the state.

The first boat from Galena and Du Buque at St. Louis this season, arrived on the 10th ult. with 2000 pigs of Lead. The river was in fine navigable order.

By an act of the legislature of Virginia, passed immediately previous to its adjournment on the 19th ult., all the Banks of the State were relieved from the forfeitures and penalties incurred by their suspension.

The time of travel from Charleston, S. C. to New York via the Wilmington, N. C. and Welden Rail Road, is only 3 days, the distance is 781 miles.

A Mr. Taylor, with his marine armor, has succeeded in finding the wreck of the unfortunate steamer Lexington, at the depth of 114 feet. He succeeded in raising a part of it.—Lyford.

Dear Sir:—We have recently had another warlike demonstration in our city, the particulars of which have not yet transpired through the press. You know the Friends or Quakers have a split in their society;—one faction is the "Orthodox" and the other the Hicksites. There is a burial ground which belonged to the sect before its division, and of which ground each party claims the exclusive ownership. The Orthodox have possession of the dwelling house on the ground, in which their sexton resides;—this square-coated officer always keeps the gate locked, and when a funeral of the Hicksites takes place, the sexton of that party comes armed with a hammer and cold-chisel, and cuts off the locks or bolts. At the funeral of the lamented Dr. Parrish, the Orthodox sexton, as usual, refused admission. The bolt was cut and the company entered. Application was made to the Orthodox sexton for chairs for the family of the deceased to sit on, but he not only refused them, but refused to admit seats into the yard when they had been brought from the house of a friend in the neighborhood. A number of boards were then brought in by actual force, and a scuffle of brown-coats and broad-brims took place at the gate of the church yard. I have this on undoubted authority.

This, you will say, was natural enough, for the nature of the human heart cannot be altered by wrapping it in brown broadcloth. What I am now about to mention has a little tinge of the super-natural. A tavern keeper near Fairmount Water Works, had been doing a dull business all winter, and cast about in his mind for some plan to make a little sum at the commencement of the spring season. Having concocted his scheme, he wrapped one of his bar-keepers in a white sheet and stationed him in a stone quarry on the side of the hill, with directions to enable him to play the part of a ghost skilfully. He soon attracted attention, and the news of the apparition spread all over the city. Crowds flocked to the spot, and before venturing to take a look at the spirit, each one of the multitude, took a look inside of the bar, where the landlord who originated the scheme, had prepared some enticing gin-toddies, "cobblers" and sundry other preparations which are famous for supplying a courageous disposition. This proved a good speculation. But the ghost, apprehensive of missiles, made himself scarce, and the disappointed mob after waiting several nights in patient expectation, finding the spectre had come the Booth game over them, began to take vengeance on the fixtures of Fairmount, and sacrilegiously destroyed some of the decorations of that beautiful spot.

Wood, the murderer of his daughter, was arraigned yesterday, at the Court of Oyer and Terminer. He looked very pale and exhibited some signs of emotion as he entered the court-room. An ineffectual attempt was made to empanel a jury in this case; and it will probably be a difficult thing to find twelve men in the city who have "not formed or expressed an opinion" in relation to the murder of Mrs. Peak. Yours, ***

From the Methodist Protestant.

THE TWO BRANCHES OF METHODISM.

Traternus Amor Maneto. Heb. xiii—I

Messrs Editors:—Although I am a member and minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was taught to love and reverence all its institutions from the earliest dawn of infancy: and although the name, with all its once hallowed associations, is identified with my earliest recollections, I cannot reconcile to my feelings, the unkind, not to say, unchristian conduct, of many of our members and ministers towards the Methodist Protestant Church. I happened not many months since, to attend, by request of the Presiding Elder, a protracted Quarterly Meeting, in one of our western cities, where, by chance, an old veteran of the cross, happened, who had been twenty-five years in the itinerancy of the M. E. Church; during which time, he had travelled many a tedious mile, shared many a scanty meal, gladdened a thousand desponding hearts, and though he had been changed from circuit to circuit—from station to station, and had filled the office of Presiding Elder for so many as eight years, he had preserved a character for deep piety, and eminent ministerial usefulness, pure and unsullied. Some two years before, he had joined the Methodist Protestant Church from principle, and his moral and religious character never was questioned by any. This old gentleman was a stranger in the city, and introduced to myself, by an acquaintance, as a very eminent minister of the M. P. Church, whom the people would rejoice to hear preach. I, accordingly introduced him to my friend the P. Elder, who, I knew, was already acquainted with his character. No ministers of our church were in attendance, save the P. E. stationed Minister and myself, which circumstance induced me to believe, that the assistance of the venerable Protestant brother would be most kindly received. But in this I was mistaken. I requested that he might preach in my stead on Sabbath; but received in reply, with warmth, "what! that old Radical in your place?" The people sent in a written petition that he might preach, to which was attached, several hundred names; but they were treated with silent contempt. He was not asked to preach, to exhort, to sing, to pray—he was (I blush while I write) denied a ticket to Love Feast!! and all this, merely, because he did honestly prefer a modification in church government. A presbyterian of humble abilities was invited to preach several times, at the meeting above mentioned, though he lived in town, and had preached there for years.

This is only one instance out of perhaps, an hundred, which have fallen under my personal notice. I cannot throw away a minister, especially one who has been pinched by winter's cold, and scorched by summer's heat—one who has grown gray in the service of the church for no other reason, than that of desiring a republican form of government for the church. No never. Do we not fellowship ministers of other churches, whose government—nay whose doctrines are directly opposed to our own? Why then, I ask, as an ambassador for Christ—as a messenger of peace, as a lover of immortal souls, why not fellowship those whose doctrines are the same verbatim—whose forms of worship are the same, and whose government, is at least, as much like our own, as is the policy of the Presbyterian Church?

I love the Methodist Episcopal Church. I reverence her as a parent. I feed on her very memory in poetic raptures—I cling to it—I adore it. But, I love the christian, too, whether he bear her name in full, or in part, or not at all. Brethren, of the Methodist Episcopal, and Methodist Protestant Churches, let us "love our God supremely," but, "let us love each other too." Let brotherly love continue. We are all children of the sainted Wesley—we are all members of the same family—we profess the same pure faith—we travel the same highway of holiness, and may God grant, that we all may gain the same pure, unsullied, unfading and blood-bought heaven.

Amen. A. M. Scott.

The resolutions of the Pleasant Hill circuit in our next.

The publishers of the Methodist Protestant are desired to send their paper to John Fordyce, jr., Senecaville, Guernsey county, Ohio. Bro. F. is as good as the cash.

We call on our agents and friends to forward what cash they may have on hand for us as we shall want to use it. We should like to hear from Cincinnati.

As the publisher of the Western Recorder does not reside immediately in town, any person who may have business with the office, could do it, or have it done, by calling on O. White, No. 104, Main street, Zanesville.

We have complete files of the 3d, 4th and 6th volumes of the Methodist Correspondent, which we are now using for wrapping paper. Any person who may wish one, or all of these, can have them for 25 cents a piece. The 3d volume contains all the legal doings of Pennsylvania, in relation to the Episcopal Methodist property question.

Camp Meeting.—We propose to hold a camp meeting, on the farm of John Walker, 3 miles west of Adamsville, Muskingum county, Ohio, to commence on the 4th of June. We solicit the attendance of Bros. Brown, Springer, Marshall, Wilson, Thrap, Fairchild, Davis, Warren and Stephens. P. Inskeep, Sup.

Pocket Book Found.

A POCKET BOOK was picked up on the Lancaster Road, a few miles west of Zanesville. From the papers it contains we should judge it to belong to a person by the name of Samuel Hamilton. If the owner will call at this office, (south-west corner of Springfield township,) and give satisfactory evidence of his right to the property, he can receive it. It contains some valuable papers. April 8, 1840.

To Editors.

THE office of the Middletown Mail, including a first rate assortment of Job Type, and sufficient of other kinds of type to publish the Mail, will be either rented or sold, on very favorable terms, to a person competent to publish a good weekly paper in this village; the subscription list tolerable, and the job work considerable, and yearly advertisers about thirty. Possession given the first of May, or earlier if desired. Application to be made, post paid, to

THE HISTORIAN.

GREECE AS IT IS.

BY PROFESSOR OLIN.

It is now one month since I arrived upon the shores of Greece. We were six days upon the coast in making the voyage from Corfu, around the Morea, to Athens. I have spent ten days in this city, and have made a journey of fourteen days in the interior, visiting Egina, Epidaunis, Jeron, Nauplia, Tyrius, Argos, Mycene, Nemea, Corinth, Salena, Delphos, Aracoba, Lavidia, Mantinea, Levetra, Platea, Thebes, Oropos, and Marathon. I have to regret that two places of capital interest are beyond my reach —Sparta in the extreme south, and Thermopylæ, in the north. The distance of these places from Athens deters most travellers from extending their excursions so far, and their neighborhoods are just now infested with robbers, so that they cannot be visited without a military escort. The time which I am able to devote to Greece has elapsed, and I embark to day for Alexandria.

I have been disappointed in Greece. With regard to its historical and classical interest and its ancient remains, my expectations have been more than realized. It is on these grounds the precise region which an educated man would desire to see above any other part of the world. It is with regard to its resources and present condition, that the numerous accounts of this country, which have been read with so much avidity in America since the revolt from Turkey, had misled me. I think these accounts have generally been colored by a certain enthusiasm, natural enough, and perhaps allowable in the writers, but not very favorable to the purposes of such readers as seek for precise information.

Greece must be considered, as a whole, to be one of the most sterile regions in Europe, or perhaps in the world. In extent the present kingdom is less than half the size of Georgia or Missouri. Much more than one half of this extent—I think not less than three-fourths—is composed of naked mountains, sheer rocks that defy cultivation, without a tree, and generally destitute of verdure of every kind. A high wall of these bare mountains extends from Corfu, on the west, around the Peloponessus, to Negropont in the east, encompassing the whole country. In the interior of Greece there are valleys of great fertility. The plains of Argos, Corinth, and Lavidia, are of considerable extent. So also are the plains of Attica and Marathon. But the largest tract of arable land is in Boetia.

This is a beautiful agricultural district, smiling with fields of grain. There are other tracts of productive land which I have not seen; but I have enumerated the principal. These are always mentioned by the people when you speak to them of the sterility of their country.—Altogether they may be equal to four or five counties in the United States: Besides these, there are many smaller tracts of arable land; patches at the bases or upon the sides of the mountains.

Greece is dependent upon Odessa for a large part of her bread. Currants are the chief. The imports of the country greatly exceed the exports.* So much for the natural advantages of Greece. It should be added, that the climate is genial—that her commercial position is unrivaled—and that she has many excellent harbors.

Scanty as is the arable land, a large part of it is uncultivated. This is probably the result of several causes, not apparent to a stranger. Some of them, however, are quite upon the surface. More than one half of the land belongs to the government. A part of this immense domain belongs to the Turkish government.—The rest consists of the private property of the Turks, confiscated at the close of the war. Government land is sold by auction, the purchaser paying nine per cent. per annum upon the price for thirty years when the land becomes his own. Of course agriculturalists will buy very sparingly upon terms which leave the perfecting of titles to the next generation. Government land is also offered upon rent; but that of individuals is preferred by tenants, as they grant certain facilities, such as advancing seed corn, and furnishing a part of the stock and implements, which the government does not. These advances are repaid out of the crop but they are important in a country where there is little capital. The result is, that much of the arable land lays waste. A barbarous system of taxation, adopted from the Turks, presses also upon agriculture. The king takes one-tenth of the produce of the land in kind; a mode of revenue oppressive and unequal in the extreme, and directly tending to throw all but land of the best quality out of cultivation. The evil is greatly aggravated by the mode of collection. The taxes of a province are sold to the highest bidder, who collects them himself in kind, and pays the public treasury in cash. He is allowed for this purpose extensive powers, which, all agree are shamefully abused. The farmer may not thrash his wheat at home, but must carry it upon donkeys, for there are no roads to a public thrashing floor, when the tithe is paid. He has then to carry the tenth to the market, if not above a certain distance, without pay, and to transport the straw, chaff, and his part of the grain to his own residence. The tales told of the repacity of these tax farmers are heart rending. To the poor peasant, there is, in fact, no remedy, though the law may have provided one. Nearly the whole revenue of the kingdom is derived from the land. About two millions of drachmas, (a drachma is one sixth of a dollar) arise from a duty of ten per cent. upon imports, and of six per cent. upon exports. Stamps yield a trifle, but the remaining twelve millions arise almost exclusively from the tax on agriculture. The whole revenue is about $2,400,000; the population of Greece is 800,000. This gives about $3 per head for every man, woman, and child. When the extreme poverty of the country is considered, this taxation must be regarded enormous. It falls short of the annual expenses of the government about two millions of drachmas. In the mean time, neither the principal nor interest of a considerable public debt are paid. The army, which is larger in proportion to the population of the country than that of any nation in Europe, with the exception of Prussia, absorbs a large part of the revenue. The king's civil list is $200,000 per annum. He is engaged in building a palace, to cost several million's and larger than Napoleon's at St. Cloud.

In the mean time there are not fifty miles of road in Greece over which it would be practicable to drive a wagon. I do not speak of some plains, where a cart might pass without a road. It was well said to me by an intelligent Greek gentleman, "The Bavarians have placed the huge saddle of a camel upon the back of a poor donkey!"

The government, as I have reason to believe, is generally unpopular. It is absolute though a representative legislature was solemnly promised. It is still expected, and loudly demanded by the Greeks, who have yet a free press, which they do not fail to abuse. I read several articles in papers which are printed in French as well as in Greek. Some ameliorations have been granted. The most of the Bavarian troops and ministers have been succeeded by natives. The king is thought to be well disposed, but to be under decided Russian influence. Persons who have been long in the country speak of decided improvement. Improvement, in a state of peace and some approach to security and property, will generally proceed, in spite of bad government, especially when affairs have arrived already at their worst possible state.

I have mentioned those obstacles which result from physical causes, and some which arise from the evil policy that presides over Greece. I fear there are others that grow out of the character and habits of the people. Certainly the Greeks are in a very low state of civilization. A stranger should speak with caution upon such subjects; but there are facts that press themselves upon his observation. I have said the country has no roads; it has no mails; of course no carriages out of the cities. In Athens there are many. I saw some at Argos, and two at Nauplia.

As a general thing, the houses in the villages, and nine-tenths of them in the towns are wretched hovels, built of sun-dried bricks or loose stones, laid in mud. The vicisitudes of one American winter would demolish them. As to the interior, with a considerable number of exceptions, they are without floor, or fire places, or windows. They have neither tables, beds, nor chairs. The filthy dirt floor, sometimes with a mat of straw, or an old quilt spread upon it, serves for beds, chairs, and table. The fire is kindled upon a sort of hearth, and the smoke finds its way through the roof. In the agricultural villages the oxen and horses commonly occupy the same apartment with the family, which they enter by the same door.

I have dined several times at these places. The habits of the people are disgustingly filthy; and, I speak from painful experience, their inhabitants swarm with vermin. The traveller in the country carries his quilt, his cook, his food, and utensils, and by paying about the price of an elegant bed chamber in Paris, is allowed a place upon the floor in these wretched hovels!

Athens has 19,000 inhabitants, and many good houses. Nauplia, the only town in Greece not destroyed in the revolution, has also many good buildings, with perhaps 4,000 inhabitants. Argos, Lavidia, and Thebes, with each a population of from 4 to 6,000, are built in the meanest style. Patras is a little better. These are the principal places. Corinth has only 1.200 people.

The war against the Turks was certainly the most ferocious and desolating that has been waged in modern times. With the exception of Nauplia, and a few remote mountain villages, every town, and almost every habitation was destroyed.

I at first ascribed the meanness of the houses to their hasty reconstruction; but upon farther examination of the ruined habitations found that they were all built in the same inferior style. The standard of taste and comfort is degraded. No wonder that centuries of oppression should have produced such results, still the flattering accounts which had fallen under my notice had not prepared me for so general a prevalence of degradation and barbarism. Those who look and labor for the regeneration of Greece, and her elevation to the dignity of a civilized country, must have patience. Great changes cannot be wrought hastily. It savors of a schoolboy enthusiasm to expect that because in the days of Pericles and Epaminondas, the Greeks were polished and highly civilized, the present occupants of the country, who are perhaps as nearly allied to many tribes of barbarians who have at different periods, overrun and occupied this classic land, as to the heroes of Marathon and Platea, are to be suddenly invested with the high attributes of moral, social and intellectual excellence which are always of slow growth, and the results of favorable circumstances, accompanied with careful and long culture. In Athens and some other places, the intercourse of trade and commerce, and still more, the settlement of a large number of foreigners may be expected to work a speedy and considerable improvement; but many years, probably generations, will pass away before an effective civilization, such as pervades the masses in the United States, and in one or two of the nations of Europe, can reach the interior and remote parts of Greece.

I do not distrust the power of moral influences. In proportion as these are multiplied and judiciously directed may we hope for the regeneration of this people. Should it please God to revive pure christianity in the Greek Church, all that I have said of obstacles and delay should be greatly modified, or wholly rejected. Unfortunately there is not, so far as I can learn, any very decisive indication of such a revival. With a creed not very remote from the truth as it is in Jesus, this church, to which the people are blindly devoted, has neither intellectual nor spiritual power for great moral achievements.

The foreign agencies are decidedly unequal to the wants of the country; nor have they so far as I can learn, been signalized by any very marked tokens of the divine approbation. The American Board of Foreign Missions has four missionaries here, laboring with a zeal and fidelity for which the agents of that society are every where proverbial. The Rev. Dr. King, the veteran missionary, and the Rev. Mr. Benjamin, are in this city. Dr. K. preaches in Greek, and both are fully engaged in the important work of publishing and circulating good books. For this labor Greece is an open and most promising field and much good may be confidently anticipated from the exertions of these zealous men. Two of their associates are stationed in the southern Morea, laboring with good encouragement. A Baptist missionary is stationed at Patras, also from the United States. I did not know of this circumstance when I was in that city or I should have called on him. The Rev. Mr. Hill and his lady, of the American Episcopal Church, are doing much good in this city, through the instrumentality of a flourishing school, or rather of several schools, containing about six hundred pupils. They exercise an extensive influence. Some instances of conversion Mr. H. thinks have taken place among the pupils, and the cause of education in Greece is greatly indebted to their exertions. There is one Church of England missionary here and two in Sira.

The most favorable indication existing at present among the Greeks is the lively interest they take in the cause of education. The king is understood to be decidedly favorable to the instruction of the people. The towns and larger villages are required to maintain schools, and I was gratified to find them in existence, and apparently flourishing at Patras, Argos, Thebes, and other places.—There is a large and flourishing female school in this city, supported by the Greeks on the voluntary principle. A considerable portion of the people are said to manifest great eagerness to have their children taught, and the children to be apt and fond of learning. The University of Otho considering the state of the country, may be said to be flourishing. It has twenty-seven professors in its seven faculties of letters, science, philosophy, medicine, law and theology.—Most of them perhaps, have some other employment, but the number shows, at least, that the plan is ample. More than two hundred students attend the lectures, which are in modern Greek. They come not only from all parts of Greece, but from Turkey. The same is true of the girls in the female schools. I have heard several anecdotes of the sacrifices and poverty of the students, which indicate a degeee of enterprise and stubborn purpose that would do honor to New England.

I have mentioned the press as free. It is not legally so, but is in fact. The French system is adopted. A publisher must deposit a large sum of money to pay fines, if he shall incur such a penalty, and a responsible editor is answerable to the tribunals for all that appears in his paper. The affair is managed thus. A company raise the money requisite for the deposite; some person who will endure imprisonment for moderate pay, commonly an indigent student, is announced as editor. The paper is conducted in a free and fearless spirit, canvassing public measures without restraint, only avoiding what may be personally offensive to the king. If trouble arises, the vicarious editor is ready to go to jail, where he can still pursue his studies, and make money, and fares better than he does elsewhere. It is said the office is rather coveted. An untrammeled press is a check upon an arbitrary government, and no doubt the best substitute for a representative assembly, to which I think it must ultimately lead, if its freedom be not stifled. I ought to say that many liberal men distrust the fitness of the country for such a government at present, though they think it indispensable as an ultimate arrangement. The excessive corruptibility of the Greeks is the reason given why the boon should be delayed. It is said to be impossible to fill the offices with honest men, so demoralizing has been the influence of Turkish rule. It is almost a matter of course a sort of right, for men in power to take bribes. The lowest officers, the mayors of petty villages, rival, in this respect, a Turkish pasha. Many hope that when a little wealth shall have been diffused men may be found for representatives less exposed to temptations. Now it is thought they would become the minions of royalty.

Labor is better paid for here than in any country in Europe—40 to 50 cents per day. Charges at inns high. I paid for a horse and guide, without keep 48 cents per day; interpreter the same.—I rode with a halter upon a pack saddle, which is a huge frame of wood, not unlike the frame of a cross-legged table.—With quilts and whatever you choose to lay upon it, it is, as to ease, a decided improvement upon the common saddle.—The stirrup was of rope. I was commonly mounted eight or ten hours daily, riding over such places as I could believe it possible to travel with impunity, only because I had passed them unharmed.—This, with sleeping on the ground, or the floor, with no bed but a single quilt, was a good trial of my health. I returned to Athens better than when I left it. It is a journey which a man, having completed it, would rejoice to have undertaken, but which a sensible and sensitive man would not be induced to make again, but in obedience to some imperative call of duty.

*These plains are not, as their name would indicate, mere level tracts of country, but compromise large extents of hill and dale, beautifully diversified with groves of oak and shrubby pine, rich pasture, and open spots of luxuriant herbage, intermixed with low shrubs, and an abundance of wild fruits and flowers.

*Any person acquainted with the laws of commerce knows that this cannot be, only temporily; for when a nation's means are exhausted they can no longer obtain credit abroad.—Ed. R.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

THE LOST CHILD.

BY MRS. TRAIL,

Author of "The Backwoods of Canada.

Among the many casualties and accidents that befall the inhabitants of this forest land, there is none of more frequent recurrence than that of persons being lost in the woods.

The following advertisement, which appeared in the Cobourg Star, dated August the 2d, 1837, excited the interest of all classes of people in the district, but more especially of those persons inhabiting the vicinity of the spot where the child's friends lived:—

"Child Lost! £50 Reward.—Lost on Saturday last, the 29th of July, on the road leading from Bowskill's mills to Foe's Tavern, near the Rice Lake Plains, a child about six years old, the daughter of Mr. Thomas Eyre of Hamilton, near Cobourg. She wore a blue plaided satin frock, and was without her bonnet.—Whoever will give such information as may lead to her discovery, shall receive the above reward. Thomas Eyre."

I shall also copy the accompanying paragraphs, which contains some particulars respecting the child not contained in the advertisement, it is as follows:—

"One of those afflicting accidents which occasionally call forth the sympathy of a whole community, has just transpired in this neighborhood, and is now occupying the attention of all classes. Its nature is briefly told in the above announcement, which informs us that a child has been lost, and is now wandering alone on the Rice Lake Plains, or may be dead.

"On Saturday last, Mr. and Mrs. Eyre, of Hamilton, with a party of friends, went to gather huckle-berries on the plain, and enjoy the pleasures of a pic-nic. Having dined, they proceeded to gather the berries, in which occupation the children participated with all the eagerness and heedless avidity that characterises their age, wandering gaily from bush to bush, thoughtless of any danger; but, alas! one of the little party was destined to pay fearfully for its temerity. On mustering to return home, Mr. Eyre's little daughter, a fine child about six years of age, was missing from the party, and, notwithstandtng an active and immediate search was commenced by the whole party, consisting of not less than thirty persons, and which has since been continued by hundreds of people from this and the adjacent townships, she still remains undiscovered, having been near four nights and three days alone in the wilderness, without food and without shelter, otherwise than what the bushes and trees may have afforded her.

"We hear that nearly a thousand persons humanely assisted the distracted parents in their search for the poor little wanderer yesterday, and that a party of Indians started in quest of her, headed by Captain Pantosh. We sincerely hope before this time some trace of her may have been found.

"In addition to the reward offered by Mr. Eyre for the recovery of his child, we learn that Lieutenant Rowe, his neighbor, has most generously pledged himself to add a further sum to the Indians of 100 dollars, should they succeed in finding her alive. Mr. Rowe has been indefatigable in his personal exertions, having been out night and day since the search begun."

'The Child Found.—Intelligence has just reached us that the child was found this morning (Thursday) near Cold Spring, alive and well, after having wandered in the woods five days and nights.'

I learned the following interesting particulars from a gentleman who was himself one of the active searchers for the child, and who arrived on the spot where the Indians found her a few minutes after the poor thing had been conveyed to the arms of her afflicted parents; thither he followed at full speed, to learn the state in which she was. "I found the poor child," he said, "lying on the same bed with her father, who was completely worn out with grief and fatigue. The child was greatly emaciated, and presented a pitiable spectacle; her poor hands, face, and neck, were blistered and burned with the sun, while her clothes were rent in tatters, and her feet torn with briars. She never complained of hunger though she said she only tasted a few berries from the time she was lost to that very day, but appeared to suffer the most tormenting agonies of thirst. It was thirst in the first instance that led her to absent herself from the rest of the party. She had taken a saucer in her hand to search for drink; a hope she had never lost sight of, for she still retained the saucer in her feeble grasp when found. She said she had wandered a long way in search of water, but found neither creek nor spring. On being questioned if she had heard the voice of the party in search of her the first day, she said, 'Yes, but as she did not hear her papa's voice, she would not answer; she did not see any of her own folks, and she was afraid to speak.' This unaccountable timidity proved the cause of all her own prolonged suffering, and the anguish endured by her distracted parents. Each day, she said, she heard people out in search of her, and she grew more and more alarmed lest she should fall into the hands of strangers, who might take her away; so she hid herself, and once lay down under some logs and bushes when a party were coming near her; but the last day she was so thirsty, and felt so ill, that she thought she would not hide herself; so she climbed up on a high log, and held up her hand, hoping some one would see her, and take her to her papa, and give her a drink. It was fortunate for the poor little wanderer that she came to this resolution before it was too late, for exhausted nature must soon have sunk under the privations she endured. It is remarkable that the spot where she was found was not a mile from the place where she was first missed, and where she must have been discovered very soon after she was missed from the party but for her singular timidity. A few days' careful treatment soon restored the runaway to her former health and spirits; and, young as she is, her adventure on the Rice Lake Plains will not easily be effaced from her mind."*

Children should learn from this to be thankful for their happy homes. They should do all they can to give joy to their parents, whose love to them is so strong. You see, also, that fear often may cause greater suffering than the worst of misfortunes.

How many are there, who wander through the wilderness of sin because they are afraid to cast themselves into the arms of their best Friend who is entreating them to come to him and be saved! Such conduct is infinitely more foolish than that of the child who came very near losing her life by her timidity. O, cast away your fears, and come and be saved in the kind arms of your deliverer before it is too late!—Youth's Cabinet.

A Poet.—A poet often does more and better than he is aware of at the time, and seems at last to know as little about his power as a silkworm knows about the fineness and beauty of the thread.

Important to Rail Road Companies.

THE subscriber offers to the public a new and improved mode of ascending and descending Inclined Plains on Rail Roads. This improvement supercedes the necessity of horse or stationary power, by giving to the locomotive engine a new wheel, affixed to one of the axles of the motive, which connects with an extra railing laid in the centre of the road, on the plain. As the engine approaches the plain, the pilot wheel on the centre of the axle, falls into gear with the extra railing and propels her onward. The construction and connection of the pilot wheel and extra railing is of such a character that it not only necessarily advances, but advances perfectly smooth, and cannot be impeded by the congealing of ice, the connection of the wheel and railing being on the right and left of the tread.

Rail Road companies or managers wanting further information, will please address the subscriber, at Harrisville, Harrison county, Ohio, or William P. Ellis, Washington city, who has obtained the right of the State of Maryland by purchase, or William C. Pool, of Baltimore, who has the right of Georgia, North and South Carolina, on commission.

Important to Farmers.

FARMERS are hereby invited to procure the hitherto unrivalled HULLING MILL.—This machine can be attached to any of the powers now in common use, and is calculated to save a great amount of manual labor. Clover-seed can be hulled at the rate of from three to five bushels per hour;—Rice can be hulled at the rate of twenty-five bushels per hour;—Oats, Barley or Spelts, can be hulled at the rate of thirty bushels per hour, ready for flouring;—Corn can be made into hominy at the rate of twenty bushels per hour. Corn, Oats, Rye, Barley, Spelts, or Buck-wheat, can be chopped at the rate of fifteen bushels per hour.

A moment's reflection will convince the Farmer of the advantage of possessing such a labor-saving machine. Is he a Rice grower?—he can prepare his Rice for the market in one-fourth of the time usually spent, and with one-fourth of the labor. Has he a surplus of Corn?—instead of selling it for twenty-five cents, he can make it into hominy and sell it for two dollars per bushel. Has he a surplus of Barley?—instead of selling it for fifty cents per bushel, he can hull and sell it for six cents per pound, &c. &c. The simplicity, durability, portability, and usefulness of this Mill, recommend it as one of the most desirable and money producing machines of modern invention.

Those wishing to procure this machine in Georgia, North or South Carolina, can address William C. Pool, Baltimore, Maryland; those of the State of Maryland, can address Richard B. Chinoweth, also of Baltimore; in this region of country, can address Lewis Ward, of Zanesville, Levi B. Ball, of Putnam, Abraham Baker, of Mt. Vernon, or Mr. Hanawalt, of Licking county; other sections can address the subscriber at Harrisville, Harrison county, Ohio. The most liberal terms will be given to mechanics who may wish to make, vend and use this Hulling Mill in sections not yet occupied. We invite the public to call and see for themselves.

SUN SETTING.

1. That golden orb has sunk to rest,
Or lost to view in the far west,
And now the loss of silver light,
Relieves our eyes with slumb'ring night.

2. And now, tho' set, the golden sun
Yet he another race will run,
Before another day is born,
Yes, e'er the sun shall wake up morn.

3. The sun! the sun! that orb of fire,
Some like to his Almighty Sire,
Knows not of sleep or balmy rest,
Nor e'er with care is overprest.

4. He scatters wide with genial ray,
Unnumber'd blessings ev'ry day,
Attentive to our little world,
And ev'ry planet round her whirl'd.

5. His rays reach ev'ry blade of grass,
In ev'ry region where they pass,
And in his absence cooling shade,
Revives what had begun to fade.

6. And now let the reflection end,
With Him who did these blessings send,
We see His wisdom here below,
In ev'ry thing where'er we go. V.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

NEW RICHMOND, OHIO, MARCH 25, 1840.

Mr. Editor: I am not one of those persons who is solicitous to furnish communications for publication, but as it is a custom among us, and as it will doubtless be expected by those brethren who have knowledge of what the Lord has done for us, I give you a brief account of our second quarterly meeting, which commenced on the 15th and continued until the 23d instant, at Withamsville. All things taken into consideration, this was one of the most powerful revivals I ever witnessed, though not the most extensive.

The first time I preached at this place, I had three hearers; the audience gradually increased, and was generally attentive and solemn; but still, in general, it was an abandonedly wicked and hardened place. The Baptist and Episcopal brethren had tried without any success, to effect a reformation. Another difficulty is, there is no meeting house in the place, we had our meeting in a small inconvenient school house on Sabbath, and at night and in the day time at the dwelling of sister Smith.

Our President, Bro. Flood and Bro. McGuire, were in attendance, from the beginning of our meeting. As the village was filled with a diversity of sentiments, not even Atheism, Deism and Universalism excepted; in the early part of the meeting, I suggested the propriety of not touching on any controverted point, and am happy to say, that the brethren, in all their preaching and exhortations, brought nothing of a controversial nature into view, and to this, as much as any one other circumstance, I attribute under God, our almost unparalleled success.

On Sabbath, we had a tolerable good meeting, and also at night,—doubtless, deep impressions were made by the forcible manner in which the truth was presented, and the many and powerful appeals made to the audience. On Monday the sacrament of the Lord's supper was administered; during the whole of this morning's meeting the presence of the Lord was graciously and powerfully felt by saints and sinners,—it was a most melting time. At this time, we first began to speak to mourners, many of whom were under deep and pungent conviction. From this our congregation increased, and an increased interest was manifest, even to the conclusion.

On Tuesday morning, Bro. Flood left us, and Bro. McGuire intended leaving on Wednesday, but seeing the great want of ministerial help, he continued with us. On Wednesday, I was informed by an intelligent citizen of the place, that with a few exceptions, all of the inhabitants were under deep concern about their souls' salvation. And a request was also made, that we should preach in a large wagon-maker's shop, which was fitted up for that purpose, and which would contain the congregation. Among the converts and those who have expressed a determination to forsake sin and seek salvation, were the heads and leaders of wickedness. On Friday, Bro. Barnes, of Cincinnati, came to our assistance, and on the following Sabbath, Bro. Evans.

SEVENTEEN joined our church, most of whom professed to have obtained pardon for sin, and all the rest professed to be earnestly engaged in seeking salvation. Many others are under deep conviction, and have expressed to me their determination to seek until they obtain a knowledge of the pardon of their sins and the salvation of their souls. There is one thing connected with this revival that affords me much pleasure, which argues its solidity and genuiness; that is, there was no extravagance; no noise was heard among the seekers at any time throughout the meeting, but weeping and sobbing. The prospect in this place is as promising as it can be, under existing circumstances. On other parts of the circuit, I have reason to believe the same success would attend an efficient protracted meeting, which I could not give the people who want it, for want of ministerial assistance and time. Yours, &c., DAVID CRALL.

LANCASTER, OHIO, APRIL 4, 1840.

Bro. Springer: As it respects our church in this place, we are somewhat encouraged. When Woodward prostrated us, all of the members save five or six, fell off; these few united in prayer meetings and made an effort to live, and we felt some little revived. When Bro. Maynard came on, we doubled our efforts, and soon began to look up.

About two miles from town, there were two families that had once belonged to our church; Bro. Maynard and myself organized a class there of five or six members. At our second quarterly meeting, Bro. Thrap came to our help and a gracious work began. If he could have continued longer, it appeared, that many would have went with us, but the work has gradually continued.

I have no record before me, but at the two classes there has been about fifty-six received as probationers. Our meetings are spiritual, indeed. Yours, &c., JACOB MYERS.

OXAW, CLINTON, ILL., MARCH 17, 1840.

Bro. Springer: Our cause is still on the advance on the Saline circuit. Since my last communication, there has been an accession to the church of TWENTY-THREE members,—eleven in the class at Bro. Hale's, where our first quarterly meeting was held. In this circuit, the members of the old church are beginning to understand their rights, and are joining us. I am induced to believe that there will be an increase of some seventy-five or eighty more members in a few months. As I expect to write to you soon again, I must close my present communication.

Yours in the bonds of a peaceful gospel,
WILLIAM PATTERSON.

LITERATURE.—Dickens and Marryatt.—No one who reads the current miscellaneous literature of the day, can have failed to notice the striking difference between these gentlemen, much to the discredit of the latter. Dickens can never apparently by any chance descend to grossness or indelicacy—Marryatt is as uneasy as a worm out of the mud, if he finds himself by any chance in the act of writing a decent sentence, or expressing a pure thought. One can touch the most unpleasant scenes of real life, with a refinement, which, while it preserves every feature, divests it of all feeling of disgust. He can canonize a fish woman or a valet, and impart dignity and interest to objects and persons the most insignificant. Marryatt, on the contrary, carries the slang of the forecastle and the pot house into the lady's boudoir; and if he had written Milton's Paradise Lost, would have made Gabriel a boatswain with tarry breeches, and given him a whistle instead of a trumpet, without being conscious that the character was unfit for heaven. The last work of his, "Poor Jack," is most richly and deeply imbued with the Captain's peculiar grossness—the smut of Smollet and Fielding, without their wit.—Brother Jonathan.

APPROPRIATE.—The Whigs are preparing badges with a vignette of a log cabin upon them, for the members of the Tippecanoe Clubs. The Democrats, resolving not to be behind their opponents, are getting up a vignette of a cabbage, in opposition.—ib.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

The following extract is from the Paris correspondent of the Brother Jonathan. M. Guizot, of whom it principally treats, has recently been appointed by the French government Minister to the Court of St. James. The extract contains some very sensible and discriminating remarks on the subject of character.—Ed. Recorder.

He was born on the 4th of October, 1787, at Nismes. His father was a distinguished advocate of that place, who was beheaded on the 8th of April, 1794, three days after the bloody victory obtained by Robespierre over Danton, Camille, Desmoulins, and the members of the committee of clemency. The widowed mother, with her two sons, of whom Francois Pierre Guillaume was the eldest, removed to Geneva, where her children were educated. Young Guizot devoted himself to study with so much ardor that, at the end of four years, he was able to read Thucydides, and Cicero, and Dante, and Schiller, and Shakspeare, in their respective idioms. His two last years at college were especially dedicated to historical and philosophical studies. Having finished his academical course with the most brilliant success, he came to Paris in 1805, to prepare himself for the bar. At once poor and proud, austere and ambitious, the young man found himself thrown into a world of intrigue, frivolity and licentiousness, but successfully resisted the contagion. His first year in Paris was one of isolation and sadness. The following one, however, he was made preceptor to the children of M. Stapfer, a former minister from Switzerland to France, at whose hands he experienced almost paternal treatment.—These new relations opened for him the saloons of M. Suard, where the most distinguished wits of the day were wont to assemble; and it was there that he first met the woman who was to exert an influence over his whole life. Born of a noble family, which had been ruined by the revolution, Mademoiselle Pauline de Meulan had found in her talents and attainments the means of supporting herself and her immediate relatives. She was editing a journal called The Publicist, when a grievous malady, brought on by two much work, constrained her to interrupt her labors. She was in despair; when one day she received an anonymous letter, in which she was begged to be of good cheer, and an offer was made of executing her task during the continuance of her sickness. The letter was accompanied by an article admirably composed, the ideas and the style of which were exactly modelled in her manner of writing. She accepted the article, and regularly received a contribution from the same unknown hand, until her health was re-established. Greatly moved by the circumstance, she related it in the saloon of M. Suard, exhausting herself in conjectures as to the friendly individual, without scarcely noticing a pale, serious young man who was among her listeners. At length she besought her benefactor, through the columns of her journal, to make himself known, and that same young man called upon her to receive her thanks. Five years afterwards, M'lle de Meulan became the wife of M. Guizot.

During those five years, M. Guizot's existence was employed in various literary works. In 1809 he published his first book, the Dictionary of Synonymes, the introduction to which, consecrated to a philosophical appreciation of the character of the French language, already revealed that spirit of precision and method by which he is distinguished. Next appeared the Lives of the French Poets, then a translation of Gibbon, enriched with historical notes of the highest interest; and a translation of a work of Rehfus, Spain in 1808.

In 1812 he was attached to the University as adjunct professor of history, and not long afterwards he obtained full possession of that chair of modern history with which his name is so intimately and glorious blended. Now commenced his friendship with the celebrated Royer Collard, at the time professor of the history of philosophy in the same institution.

The events of 1814 found M. Guizot in his native town, where he had gone to visit his mother. On his return, through the kind offices of Royer Collard, he was chosen by the Minister of the Interior, the able de Montesquieu, to fill the place of secretary general in his department. This was M. Guizot's first step in the path of politics. The return of Napoleon from the island of Elba sent him back to his literary occupations. On the second restoration of the Bourbons, he was entrusted with the post of secretary general in the department of Justice, under the Marquis de Barbe Marbois, and did all in his power to arrest the encroachments of the partisans of absolute royalty.—His first political pamphlet, "The Representative Government and the present state of France," published in refutation of a work by M. de Vitrolles, showed him to be a firm adherent to the party of the constitutional royalists. The assassination of the Duke de Berri, however, created such horror in the public mind as to give a complete ascendency for the moment to the ultra legitimists; and their opponents were excluded from power.

From that epoch until the administration of M. de Martignac in 1828, the political life of M. Guizot was a perpetual combat against the Villele ministry.—Whilst the national interests of France were supported by eloquent orators in the Chambers, they were no less materially aided by his writings, which had the greatest success. He was also indefatigable in the prosecution of his professional duties; but the ministry took vengeance on the lecturer for the attacks of the politician, and in 1825 interdicted his course. Thus forced back into private life, he undertook a series of historical works, which will form the surest basis of his fame. The "Collection of memoirs relative to the revolution of England;" the two first volumes of the history of that revolution; the "Collection of memoirs relative to the early history of France;" the [illegible]ays on the history of France," followed one another in rapid succession. At the same time his political pen enriched the literature of his country with a translation of Shakspeare, and historical essays on the great dramatist and the reformer Calvin.

In 1827 he lost his wife, the companion of his labors, whose strength of character and admirable intelligence, had contributed to sustain him amid the agitations of his career. The blow was a severe one; but he bore up against it with characteristic philosophy.

The Villele ministry fell; that of M. de Martignac succeeded, and M. Guizot was restored to his professorship. Some time after the Polognac was formed, M. Guizot was elected a deputy from Lisieux, and took an active and influencial part in opposition. The ordinances of July appeared. M. Guizot drew up the protest of the deputies against them; and in the famous meeting on the 29th at the residence of Laffitte, after the revolution was accomplished, he was the first to rise and insist upon the immediate formation of a municipal committee for the establishment and maintenance of order. On the 30th that body named him provisional minister of public instruction; on the 31st he read to the Chamber the proclamation appointing the Duke of Orleans lieutenant-general of the kingdom. During the period which preceded the ceremonial of the 9th of August, he was busily engaged, having been removed to the then most arduous spot, that of the ministry of the interior, in a general recomposition of the body of administrative functionaries, and in the revision of the charter. In a few days he changed and replaced no less than 76 prefects, 176 sub-prefects, and 38 secretaries-general. He also endeavored, but without success, to introduce into the new charter an article lowering to twenty-five years the age of eligibility to the Chamber of Deputies.

The history of the Laffitte administration is well known. After its overthrow on the 13th of March, the conservative principle, which had been trodden under foot, arose strong and powerful and imperious, in the person of Casimir Perier. For the first time since the revolution, a compact, resolute and durable majority was formed in the chambers. The ministerial army was divided into three distinct corps, manœuvring with unity and concord under the orders of the energetic Premier—the left wing, composed of a large portion of the old liberal opposition to the government of Charles X., which had rallied to the new monarchy, was commanded by M. Thiers; the right wing, formed of constitutional royalists, was under the direction of M. Guizot; and the centre, which was a sort of conglomeration of various recruits from every political banner, owned M. Dupin for its leader. By the aid of this triple phalanx the cabinet was enabled to make head against its opponents in the Chambers to put down insurrection, to force the gates of Ancona, and consolidate the conservative system.

After the death or Casimir Perier, his officers disputed for some time about the command; at length the right and left wings coalesced; M. Thiers and M. Guizot shook hands, and the ministry of the 11th of October, 1832, was formed. M. Guizot was made minister of public instruction. Amongst his acts was one which met with universal applause. The admirable law of the 28th of June, 1833, in regard to primary instruction, conceived, prepared, sustained and executed by him, will always be considered one of the noblest monuments of the age.

After an existence of four years the the cabinet was dissolved, mainly in consequence of the dissensions between M. Guizot and M. Theirs. The administration of Count Mole, which succeeded, found a determined foe in M. Guizot, who was the chief instigator of the coalition by which it was destroyed. Of the present ministry, he has been neither a supporter nor an antagonist. His appointment, however, to the court of St. James, would seem to indicate that they do not consider him against them because he is not for them; or perhaps they are desirious of getting him out of the way.

The following picture is drawn of him by the writer of the memoir from which I have abridged the above narrative:

"M. Guizot may be regarded under four points of view—as a private individual, a writer, a historian, and an orator and politician.

The virtue of the private individual has never been called in question; one of his most violent political enemies speaks thus: 'Why should I not confess that M. Guizot is a man of strict and pure morality, and that he is worthy the esteem of all good men by the excellence of his life and sentiments?'"

As a writer, M. Guizot possesses a style which would be recognized any where. Its march is firm and decided, it goes right to its object, is not free from a species of stiffness, and affects in an especial manner abstract phraseology; the form with which he invests his idea is sometimes a little obscure, but the idea itself is always so clear, so brilliant that it shines through.

As a historian, M. Guizot has rendered eminent services. Every body knows that, together with Thierry, Sismondi and de Barante, he is one of the heads of the modern historical school which has taught us to go out of the present for the purpose of investigating the past, and not to weigh the men and the things of former times in the scales of the day. As an orator, his manner is imposing and severe. Small and fragile in person, he is lofty and dignified in carriage and demeanor; his voice is sonorous and impressive; his eloquence is always refined and chaste; it has more vigor than grace; it convinces rather than moves. When he ascends the tribune, every one, friend and foe, prepares to listen; there is no talking, very little coughing, and nobody goes to sleep.

A good deal has been said about the political versatility of M. Guizot—his sudden changes, his opposition at one time, and his servility at another; but from the language, the writings and the acts of M. Guizot throughout his career, I have derived a profound conviction that, with some trifling exceptions of detail, his general and distinctive trait as a statesman, is consistency—that such as he was when in public life under the ministry of Decazes, and in opposition to that of M. de Villele, he still continues to be. Let me explain myself without flattery or hate.

Providence has imposed upon human societies an eternal problem of which it has reserved the solution. There has always been, and there will always be, a struggle between two opposing principles, privilege and duty, power and liberty. In presence of these hostile elements, which the master spirits of all ages endeavor to conciliate, no man can remain perfectly calm, perfectly impartial. Mathematical truths appertain to the intellect; people do not become inflamed about them; political truths act upon both the head and the heart, and no one can preserve himself from an involuntary attraction or repulsion, according to his turn of mind, his temperament, his individuality. Some are more drawn towards liberty, others towards power; some are for playing the tribune, others the minister; some have the sentiment of independence, others the instinct of authority.—Now, M. Guizot is essentially one of the latter. His is an elevated and progressive intelligence, but domineering by nature, and governmental by conviction. In his eyes, the France of the present day, founded upon two great victories of the principle of liberty, is naturally inclined to abuse its triumph; and of the two elements which are equally requisite for social existence, the weakest at present is power.

Setting out from these premises, M. Guizot wishes to re-establish the equilibrium between the two corner stones of the edifice. It is easy to see, however, in the political pamphlets which he wrote during the period of the restoration, that in the midst of all his attacks upon the agents of power, there is a real sympathy for power itself. Legitimacy was grasping too much. Impelled both by imprudent friends and insidious enemies, the vessel was going full sail upon a rock. M. Guizot saw its perils, rebuked those by whom it was managed, and even when it had struck, was crying out, "Turn the ship!"

The revolution of July discomposed M. Guizot, perhaps, for a moment, but did not discourage him. Thus, from the moment when the principle, which is the object of his solicitude, had fallen beneath the feet of popular indignation, we behold him hastening to raise it little by little, to place it erect, and at length to push it boldly on in the direction which he wished it to take before its disaster.

What then in short, is M. Guizot?

He is a friend of power and strong government, and at the same time the most independent of men; bending beneath the yoke of the principles which he has imposed upon himself, and carrying a high head in all questions affecting persons; a politician of great merit, and valuing himself at his full worth; more sincere than enthusiastic, prouder of the approval of his own conscience than of the homage of the crowd; gifted in a supreme degree with that strength of will and perseverance which make the statesman; a mortal foe of all that resembles disorder, and capable when things are at their worst, of unhesitatingly plunging into the despotism which he does not love, rather than undergo the anarchy which he abhors.

M. Guizot is the acknowledged chief of the party which is known by the name of Doctrinaries. As you may not, perhaps, be acquainted with the origin of the epithet, it may be well to explain its history. It was first used in a political sense during the Decazes administration in 1815. M. Royer Collard had been educated in a college, the professors of which were called doctrinaries or doctrinists; and, as in the debates of the Chamber his logical intellect was wont to present every thing in a dogmatic form, the word doctrine was often upon his lips.—One day, when he had repeated it several times, a facetious member of the royalist majority cried out: "there go the doctrinaries!" The phrase took at once, and stuck as the definition of the party, then directed by Royer Collard, of whom M. Guizot is the undisputed successor. The precise political signification of the epithet is not easily discoverable. It means a man who holds and acts upon certain doctrines; but as all politicians professes to do that, there is nothing very distinctive in the application of the term to a particular class. You may place it therefore in the vocabulary with that beautiful epithet loco-foco, of which the sense is only to be discovered in the realms of Chaos and old night.

M. Guizot's last literary labor—the editorship of the French translation of the Life and Writings of Washington—is one which must make him an object of interest to Americans. As he is in the prime of life, and indefatigable in his intellectual exertions, much is still to be expected from his powerful intellect and immense attainments, which will survive to interest and benefit the world long after the remembrance of his political and diplomatic honors may have sunk beneath the oblivious wave.

LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM CHINA.

The European and American Trade all stopped with China.—By the arrival of the ship Morea, of Boston, we have accounts from Macao to the 12th of November, and from Wampoa to the 3d—being five days later than by the way of England.

The Captain of the Morea was an eyewitness to the battle between the two British sloops of war and the Chinese. The day before he left Macao the news had reached that place that all foreign trade had been stopped, not even excepting that of the Americans.—The Morea passed St. Helena on the 29th of January.

Since the Chinese killed the first Englishman last September, things have been going on from bad to worse. The Chinese have had about a dozen vessels destroyed and over 1000 men killed. The English have not lost a vessel, and only half a dozen men. However, they have 3 or four frigates now on the station, with two or three seventy-fours Canton Bay is to be the principal scene of operations. The first great fight took place at the Hong Kong anchorage, near the Bocca Tigris and an attack was shortly to be made upon Macao.—The whole of the bay was to be blockaded, and if this did not bring the Chinese to terms, part of the fleet was to go round to Pekin and land troops to attack the capital.

What cause of grievance the British originally had, does not so clearly appear. They smuggled opium contrary to law, and the Chinese destroyed it. But China shed the first blood, and England seems determined to make her pay dearly for so doing. An army of 30,000 is to go from Calcutta, Bombay or Madris. They are to take possession of Haiman (a large island S. W. of Macao,) as a depot, then lay Canton under contribution for the amount of the opium taken, and expenses incurred. If necessary to go in force to the Yell Sea—land where Lord Macartney did, and make a dash on Pekin, which is barely 100 miles from the sea, and has a river or canal all the way. In six or seven days the army could reach and lay it under contribution also, for the use of the State.

The captain also reports that a vessel belonging to Macao arrived there just before he sailed, from Hanan Island—that the captain of that vessel reported an American brig had been wrecked at that place—that near the wreck he saw two children in Chinese cloths, whom he took to be Americans, as they spoke English, that had been on board the wrecked brig—that the children pointed them out to the Captain, who had been made a slave and had a collar on his neck.

THE WEATHER SOUTH.—The Norfolk Beacon of Friday says:

Wednesday last will be a memorable day. About three in the afternoon hail fell freely, and was soon succeeded by snow that continued to fall heavily until ten at night. The weather became cold, and yesterday morning presented the unwelcome sight of ice in the streets.—There can hardly be any hope left for the fruit crop. It is gone, we fear, beyond relief.

THE SABBATH.

BY ALEXANDER H. EVERETT.

Of all the subjects that can be presented to the contemplation of the people at large, religion is the one in which they take the deepest interest. Of all the occupations in which they can be engaged, religious exercises are those which habitually produce in their minds the strongest excitement. If it were the object of a lawgiver, independently of any other consideration of expediency and duty, merely to provide the people with the means of agreeable occupation and amusement for a day of rest, he could not do it so well, if at all, in any other way, as by instructing them to devote it to religion.

Religion reveals to us the secret of our higher and better nature, lifts us above the common offices of daily life, into communion with the sublime Spirit, whose word created and whose incomprehensible essence infuses and sustains the universe. It teaches us that we are not, as the bare theories of a detestible sophistry would represent us, merely a different order of the same race of beings with the brutes that surround us, destined like them to pass an ephemeral life, and then to sink into nothing, but that we possess within us the germ of a heavenly nature, for which death is only the opening of a new form of existence, and which will develope its faculties hereafter through countless ages of happiness or misery, accordingly as the opportunities for improvement afforded here have been improved or neglected.

Religion expands the intellect by familiarizing us with the most interesting questions in the philosophy of morals and mind. It enlarges the heart by repressing the selfish and encouraging the social and benevolent feelings. It checks our pride in prosperity and our depression in adversity, by impressing upon us the trifling importance of all our present interests when compared with those which belong to us as candidates for a higher state of existence. It consoles us under the agony of parting from those we love, by the reflection that we shall meet them again in scenes of permanent happiness. In a word, it changes the universe from a chaos of confusion and misery, to a grand and beautiful creation, the fit residence and temple of the high and holy One that inhabiteth eternity.

It is not in nature for those who believe these sublime truths to hear about them or think of them without the strongest excitement. What is there is on the most absorbing affairs, the most exquisite entertainments, that can ever claim in this respect to come into competition with them? What is there, for example, in the fable of the most highly wrought and beautifully written romance, which can be compared, for deep and absorbing interest, with the splendid history of creation and redemption, of which the record is the Bible, the scene, the universe, the time, eternity, God, superior beings and ourselves the subjects? Who ever complained of not being excited by the proceedings in a case at law, in which his property or life were at issue? In the case which is argued every Sabbath in the courts of God, there is more at stake than any earthly property or mortal life, our share in the inheritance of a better world, our happiness or misery throughout all eternity.

The mightiest minds of every age and country have exhausted the resources of language in expressing the delight with which they habitually dwell upon this subject. "I would rather," says Lord Bacon, "believe all the fables of the Talmud and the Alcoran than that this universal Frame is without a Mind."—Schilles in his beautiful hymn to Pleasure, represents her banner as waving on the sun-bright rock of Religion: with the monarch minstrel of Scripture, the being of God is a motive for general exultation and jubilee. "The Lord reigneth: let the earth rejoice." He does not consider it a tiresome and gloomy employment of time to attend public worship. "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go up to the house of the Lord: my soul longeth, yea, fainteth for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh cry out for the living God."

Will it be said that these are high aspirations of superior minds, improved by every accidental advantage, but that they are above the comprehension of the mass of the people, who can only be excited and amused by objects and pleasures of truly a sensual character? Those who entertain this opinion do great injustice to the mass of the people, and have formed a very inadequate conception of the dignity and elevation of the human character, even in its lowest estate. To all who have reflected on the science of government, and arrived at just conclusions, it is known that religion is the chief element which consolidates and holds together the fabric of society. In a great many countries, it is the force ostensibly and formally employed for this purpose: in others, as with us, it operates indirectly: but how would it produce the effect in either way, if the mass of the people were indifferent to try it? It was said by Gibbon that the introduction of christianity was one of the principal causes of the decline of the Roman empire. This was wholly false in fact; and sounder thinkers, reasoning on a directly opposite view of the subject, have agreed that the civilized and consolidating influence of christianity on the rude minds of the barbarian invaders of that empire, was the chief cause which formed the new political creations that grew up out of its ruins. "The kingdom of France," says Montesquieu, "was the work of the bishops," and we know that with the Pope at their head, they governed Europe for several centuries. In all this there was much abuse, but the very extent of the abuse proves the strength of the principle. If the mass of the people were indifferent to religion, how happened it that the whole civilized world was thrown into convulsions for a hundred and fifty years by the religious divisions of the Reformation, convulsions of which the great political revolutions of our own day, are among the indirect results?

Or, to look more nearly at our own people, and the common experience of daily life, what are the books that circulate most widely through all the classes of the community? We know that where the popular works on any other subject are sold by thousands, those that treat of religion are sold by tens and hundreds of thousands. Would this be the case if the people did not feel a deep interest in the subject? It will perhaps be said that difference is in part the effect of exertion. There are Bible Societies, Tract Societies, Missionary Societies, which are all busy in distributing religious books, and this is the reason why they circulate so widely. But why are there no such associations for the distribution of books on history, politics, and the other branches of useful knowledge? There is evidently no other reason excepting that the people take a much deeper interest in religion than they do in any of these subjects, interesting and important as they certainly are.

It is said that public devotional exercises are regarded by the people as gloomy or tiresome? How happens it then that in each of our large cities forty or fifty churches are regularly crowded every Sabbath twice, and often three or four times in the same day? I had the pleasure, not long since, of attending an evening lecture in one of the largest churches in Boston, where every seat up to the top of the pulpit stairs was occupied, and every alley filled with persons standing, all listening with breathless interest to a sermon a full hour long. There were probably very few of this audience who had not attended church twice before on the same day, and not one who was under any obligation or compulsion to attend at all. In the less thickly settled parts of this country where the means of assisting in the public exercises of religion are not supplied in the usual way, the inhabitants of a considerable extent of territory collect together from time to time, and hold a permanent assembly of several days for this purpose, under the name of a camp-meeting. Is it probable that crowds of people would congregate from distances of thirty, forty, or perhaps a hundred miles, and engage by the week together in devotional exercises, if they felt no interest and took no pleasure in them? I mean not to commend in every respect the order or the results of these meetings; but I say that they strongly evince the deep hold which the subject takes of the public mind.

Facts like these sufficiently prove that it is not considered by the public as a gloomy and tiresome employment of the Sabbath to devote it to religious exercises. Where the attention is deeply, without being painfully engaged, the frame of mind is for the time agreeable; and I am far from being certain that any thing would be gained, even on the score of cheerfulness, by substituting a different method of observing the Sabbath, from that which is generally in use in this country. It has been my fortune to witness the celebration of this sacred festival in some of the capitals of Europe, where the greater part of it is regularly devoted to public sports, and where the theatres are open twice as long as on any other day of the week. I have seen the French peasants dancing under the trees on Sunday afternoons, in their holiday dresses; and I can say with perfect truth, that I know no place in which the return of the Sabbath is welcomed with so much interest, and the occupations it brings with it, pursued with so much cheerfulness as in the metropolis of the Pilgrims, where it is wholly devoted to religion. Let any one walk the streets of Boston on a fine Sabbath morning, when the bells are all ringing and the whole population of both sexes in their best attire, repairing to their respective places of worship, and if the scene do not produce upon his mind a more pleasing impression than the tumult of a bull-fight, or the noisy mirth of a rustic dance, I can only say that his mental constitution is different from mine.

THE RETURN.

How often amidst the busy scenes of life will the memory of the peaceful and happy moments of our youth flash across the mind, with all the vividness of the present! By what hidden chain of associations is it brought about, that when the thoughts are taken up and wholly occupied by the matter-of-fact business of our own riper years, these delightful visions of the past will often visit us, accompanied by a train of fond imaginings, and tender recollections.?

There are certain periods in the life of every man on which memory loves to dwell.—Perhaps length of time, like distance, by softening the asperities of the view may heighten its loveliness. The little annoyances and discomforts common to every situation and every period, and which so greatly swell the amount of human misery, are forgotten—the happiness alone is remembered.—We thus seem to look back on a period of perfect bliss and wonder at ourselves that we were not even then more sensible of enjoyment.

It was with these feelings that George Elliott resolved to visit the scenes of his early manhood. Long a wanderer from his native home, he had traversed the burning plains of India and the frozen regions of the north. Wealth, the object of his toils, he had at length acquired; and in such abundance as more than to satisfy his desires—and now, with his locks, once black as the raven, discolored and parched by exposure, his complexion sallowed by the sun of the tropics, with no vestige of the life and vigor which once flashed in every glance of the eye and swelled in every muscle of that form, behold—the wanderer returns to his New England village.

It was summer sunset, such as in August, after the meridian heat so calmly, so holily, closes a day in the country: and never did those setting rays allume so beautiful a landscape. The village with its tasteful mansions, and neat but humble cottages—its rising spires and busy mill, the mountain directly in the back ground crested with a lake, on whose blue waters was discernable a light boat swiftly skimming over the waves: the farm-yard with their lowering herds—together formed a picture of rural quiet and refined elegance perhaps only to be met with in our eastern states.

Travelling without the ostentation to which his wealth might have entitled him, George Elliott alighted from the dusty stage, and entered the principal hotel. It was long since he had heard any tidings from his family, and now as every object brought fresh to memory the scenes of his youth, crowd of happy recollections pressed upon his mind he almost feared to make inquiries after those so deeply endeared to him. There was the same old church, with its slender spire and plain time worn entrance, within these walls he had so often listened to the venerable pastor. The neat and unpretending academy, where his mind had first received the elements of classic lore—the play ground, once the scene of his wild gambols—and afar off, among the trees, the chimney of a house of the better order, but falling gradually to decay—that was once his home. The wanderer pressed his hand to his brow—I thought he brushed a tear from his furrowed cheek.

It is a strange feeling, that which comes across us when after lengthened absence, first re-visiting the scenes of childhood—the abode of all we love—what fears and anxiety crowd on the mind! It seems almost impossible that we can find all we could wish—we pause at the threshold of the beloved home—we fear to enter, lest death or disease may have visited those forms which are all to us—we cannot enquire of strangers—it seems like profanation.

George Elliott left the hotel and walked rapidly towards the well-remembered dwelling. To reach it he was obliged to pass through the principal street of the village, and every object on his way reminded him of by-gone days. But where were the familiar faces he was wont to recognize, where the companions of his youth, where the instructors of his boyhood? All seemed strange; and the wanderer felt alone—at last he reached the parsonage, once the dwelling of the venerable pastor—his well remembered friend. He certainly could no longer be living—for twenty years before the wanderer had left him an aged man. But he had then a child—an only daughter, about ten years old. She might still survive; and an undefinable feeling prompted him to enter. He was received at the door by a fine looking man, apparently between thirty and forty, who requested him to enter with kindness and hospitality. After a few attempts at general conversation, which Elliott felt too deeply agitated to sustain, he proceeded to inquire after the former pastor, and learned that ten years since, he had taken his last leave of earth. He was succeeded by the present clergyman who married the old man's daughter.

"Is there not," said the wanderer, striving to conceal his agitation, "a family of the name of Elliott in your neighborhood?"

"Oh, yes, sir," replied the clergyman, "they live in that old mansion among the trees. Indeed, I am a son of old John Elliott who lives in that house."

"And is he then still living?" eagerly inquired the stranger.

"Yes, sir, but quite advanced in years. You seem interested in the family, sir," continued the clergyman.

The wanderer looked steadily into the pastor's face. "William, my brother! have you forgotten me?"

"Brother—are you my brother? Can you be George?" And in spite of the change of twenty years, the brothers recognized each other and tenderly embraced.

"Who would ever have thought of meeting the lively lad of fifteen, I left twenty years ago, a Reverend pastor and at the head of a family?" said George, smiling affectionately, after the first joy of their recognition.

"Alas! brother, that is a better change than your worn form and sunken cheeks, would show that you have met with."

"Yes, William, I have seen much, and suffered much; but, tell me of my parents, my sisters, are they all living and well?"

"Yes—Heaven has spared them all.—Our parents are in as good health as can be expected at their advanced age. Julia has been married these twelve years; and Mary whom you left an infant is the beauty of the village. She is engaged to a young lawyer, and is to be married within a week. But shall we not go, over to our old home? It will gladden our mother's heart to see you."

The brothers walked in happy silence to their early home. A load was removed from the wanderer's heart by the intelligence he had learned of his relatives; and with a thankful and happy spirit he gained the threshold. They gazed through the open door into the old fashioned parlor, and George Elliott's heart beat with pleasure and affection, as he saw a venerable pair, his father and mother, sitting at their evening meal, and with them a young and beautiful woman, whom family likeness showed to be his youngest sister. They entered, and William, fearing too suddenly to introduce his brother, merely named him as a gentleman from India, a friend of George.

"A friend of George," said old John Elliott; "then he is truly welcome—but is George living? We have not heard from him in ten years—we have lamented him as dead—no! it cannot be!" and the old man drew his hand across his eyes, and resumed his seat.

"But your son George is living and well—I know him to be living," said the wanderer in a soothing voice.

Mrs. Elliott, who till then had remained in silence gazing intently at the stranger, now rushed forward. "That voice! yes—it must be—it is—my own George?" and she fell into the arms of her returning son.

"Sarah, you are right, it is Gerge? God bless you my son," and the tears glistened in the old man's eyes, as he embraced him whom he had mourned as dead. And Mary came forward in maiden loveliness and kissed the worn cheek of her stranger brother. And, after the thousand eager questions and joyful exclamations of fond affection the family, once more united, sat down to partake of the evening repast.

Soon the neighbors, old friends of George's learned the news of his arrival, and crowded in to see him, for he had been much beloved—and it was a happy evening that, for the Elliotts and their friends, George gives his relatives the outline of his adventures since they last heard from him and—how he had been shipwrecked on the Eastern coast of Africa while on a trading voyage, had been, detained by the savage inhabitants as a slave, and, after many years of toil and misery, had effected his escape, how he had returned to India, and collecting together his large property, previously acquired, had taken the first vessel for his native shore. "And now I have returned to my own dear native village, believe me, I shall never leave it. Here I hope to pass the remainder of life in peace, and here to rest my ashes." And the wanderer kept his word; long and happily did he live in his native village, dispensing around him the comforts which his wealth enabled him to bestow.

"My name is Haines."—There are many people in this country who make use of the common expression, "My name is Haines," when they are about leaving a place or party suddenly, yet few know whence the expression is derived. We hear it in Maine and Georgia, in Maryland and Arkansas; it is in the mouths of the old and the young, the grave and the gay—in short, "My name is Haines" enjoys a popularity which no other slang or cant phrase has ever attained.—Having said thus much of the reputation of the phrase, be it our next care to give its origin.

Some 35 years since a gentleman named Haines was travelling on horseback in the vicinity of Mr. Jefferson's residence in Virgihia. Party spirit was running extremely high in those days. Mr. Jefferson was President, and Haines was a rank Federalist, and as a matter of course, a bitter opponent of the then existing Administration and its head. He was not acquainted with Mr. Jefferson, and accidentally coming up with that great gentleman, also travelling on horseback, his party zeal soon led him into a conversation upon the all-absorbing topic. In the course of the conversation, Haines took particular pains to abuse Mr. Jefferson, called him all sorts of hard names, run down every measure of his Administration, poked the non-intercourse and embargo acts at him as most outrageous and ruinous, ridiculed his gun-boat system as preposterous and nonsensical, opposed his purchase of Louisiana as a wild scheme—in short, took up every leading feature of the politics of the day, and descanted upon them and their originator, with the greatest bitterness. Mr. Jefferson, all the while, said but little.

They finally arrived in front of Mr. Jefferson's residence; Haines, of course, not acquainted with the fact. Notwithstanding he had been vilified and abused "like a pick-pocket," to use an old saying, Mr. Jefferson still, with true Virginia hospitality and politeness, invited his travelling companion to alight and partake of some refreshments. Haines was about getting from his horse, when it came into his head that he should ask his companion's name.

"Jefferson," said the President, blandly.

"The d—l! What! Thomas Jefferson?"

"Yes, sir, Thomas Jefferson."

"President Thomas Jefferson?" continued the astonished Federalist.

"The same," rejoined Mr. Jefferson.

"Well, my name is Haines!" and putting spurs to his horse he was out of hearing instantly. This, we have been informed was the origin of the phrase.—Picayune.

VARIETY.

SPECK OF WAR.

We are assured from good authority, that the British have commenced the building of two steam frigates at Chippewa, under the superintendence of an agent from England. We learn also, from the Detroit papers, that barracks nearly opposite that city, are nearly completed, for the accommodation of 2000 men; with block houses, stockades and batteries, sufficient to batter down the city, whenever her Majesty's officers may deem proper. The Fort at Malden has been undergoing repairs all summer, and a series of formidable preparations are going on upon the whole line of the frontier from Mackinaw to Passamaquody. These preparations cannot have a sole reference to the incursion of refugee patriots. They must be made in anticipation of more serious difficulties between the powerful nations who hold jurisdiction on each side of the line.—N. Y. Era.

WARLIKE!—Her Majesty's ship Vestal has arrived at Halifax, where, we understand, other vessels of war are soon expected for the purpose of bringing troops and munitions of war to this Province, in case they should be required.

We learn also that the 23d Fusilers now in garrison at Halifax, instead of being about to proceed to the East Indies, is the first regiment for service in this Province, and has received orders to be ready to move at the shortest notice.

We are further informed on good authority, that the erection of barracks at Woodstock, in this Province, for the accommodation of a large military force, has been determined upon, and the work is to commence immediately.—St. John's (New Brunswick) Courier, 15th ult.

Great Britain wants a fight, though she may not wish it with us. She is fortifying her whole frontier along the lakes, and at points, too, that may seriously annoy us in case of war—at points from which she can command the channel dividing our Province from our territory. She is already fortifying an island at the mouth of the Detroit river, which commands the channel near Fort Malden.—Ohio Statesman.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.—Maj. Noah thinks the language of Mr. Fox, in relation to the Maine business by no means equivocal. He particularly points to that portion of it, in which the British Minister says: "if the people of Maine shall persist in the present system of agression, the British Government will feel it their duty, to make such military arrangements as may be required for the protection of her Majesty's right," and observes.

This is plain language divested of all diplomacy. The territory claimed by Maine as her own, under the treaty of 1783, is no longer a mooted question.—Great Britain in effect says, this is my land—retire from it, or I will drive you off.

The debate on this correspondence in the Senate is equally grave and portentuous. Mr. Webster of Massachusetts, expressed his deep regret "that the two countries were likely to come into collision." Mr. Davis said, "it was evident that we could temporise no longer—we must assert our rights or abandon them." Mr. Williams, of Maine, said that Great Britain had for 25 years expressed the most pacific views on that question, yet the moment it was apparent that the question must be settled, she threatens us with the consequences. He was glad to find that the issue must now be made up. We are not, it is true, in a condition to go to war with England, and she has great advantage in the present large armies collected in the Canadas.—Bicknell.

The War department continues to be agitated. General Scott states in an official letter to the Secretary of War, that the British have TWENTY THOUSAND troops in Canada,—also that they have strengthened all their prominent fortifications on the frontier. We still indulge a hope, however that the affair will blow over. But every thing will depend upon the character of the report of the British Commissioners, Messrs. Mudge and Featherstonhaugh, and the decision of the British Government in receiving that report. If the Commissioners should decide against the claim of the United States, and the British Government should endeavor to maintain that doctrine by force of arms, we shall have war. But, if after such a report, a disposition should be manifested to refer the whole matter to a third power, bloodshed will be avoided.—Bicknell.

LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.—Mr. Bryant, we understand, is making a selection from the writings of the American poets, for Harper's Common School Library. The public will of course look for a better compilation than has yet been published; and though the forth-coming work will be of more modest pretentions, it cannot fail to eclipse the shopkeeper's "Poets of America," issued last summer by Colman.

Mr. Fitz Greene Halleck is preparing, for the same series, a selection from the Poetry from Great Britain. These works will not only be excellent additions to the admirable School Library, but they will, by presenting the best models of poetic writing, improve the public taste and help create a passion for poetry—without which a nation is but half civilized.

PROFESSOR FOLLEN.—We are pleased to notice that the widow of Professor Follen, a lady of fine mind, proposes to publish a memoir of her husband to accompany a selection from his works. The whole will come out in five parts 300 pages each, unbound, and delivered to subscribers at 75 cts. per number. Many manuscripts hitherto unpublished, and some of his already published works, such as Sermons, Lectures, the papers on a Future State, and other of his most important and finished writings are embraced in the plan. The publishers are Messrs. Willard, Gray & Co. of Boston.

PALEY'S NATURAL THEOLOGY.—As the Harper's Family Library increases in number, the worthy publishers seem determined to make each successive volume increase in value upon the last. Numbers ninety-six and seven of the series are Paley's Natural Theology, with illustrative notes by Lord Brougham, and Sir Charles Bell, and preliminary observations and notes by A. Potter, D. D., of Union College. The publication of this work in a cheap and convenient form; and in an edition so valuable for its illustrative notes, will do much to counteract the spirit of false philosophy, and loose and superficial habits of thought. The notes furnish a fund of practical and curious information, which adds much to the interest of the text, and the value of the volumes.—Brother Jonathan.

FROM WASHINGTON.—The business of the week may be summed up in a few words.

Mr. Webster has reported an excellent bill for a General Bankrupt Law, and the prospect of its passage is fair.

The Cumberland Road bill was discussed from day to day, and finally rejected on Friday.

In the House, the New Jersey case was also finally disposed of on Friday. The amendment of Mr. Garland, to print the whole of the testimony, was rejected, and the original resolution confining the printing to that evidence which the Committee had examined before making their report, was adopted.

Nothing of importance on Saturday or yesterday.

FROM HARRISBURG.—The Governor has signed the Bank Bill, which is now a law.

Mr. Snowden's Bank Bill passed the House, and is now before the Senate.—We shall give it at length if adopted in that body, and signed by the Governor. It fixes the resumption of specie payments on the 15th of January, 1841, and in this respect, agrees with the other bill, already adopted.

The Small Note Bill has passed the Senate, and has a favorable prospect in the House.

Both Houses will adjourn to-morrow week.—Bicknell 7th inst.

USEFUL HINTS.—Mr. Editor:—In your last paper (No. 41) I noticed an article under the caption of "Curing a Bad Horse," which reminded me of a circumstance which once transpired within my own observation, and which may be new to some of your readers, and will properly come under the same head. A gentleman in the neighborhood of my residence owned a valuable horse that would, whenever he pleased, (and that was not very seldom, especially if he had been hard drived,) lie down in the harness. Whatever might be the carriage in which he was, whether chaise, wagon, sleigh, or in the plough field, down he who would lie at pleasure, and not all the whipping, coaxing or hiring could induce him to move until he pleased, which would frequently be from two to three hours.

A couple of young blades wishing to take a sleigh ride one day, this being the smartest and handsomest horse in the neighborhood, they hired him. On their return, when about three miles from home, down he went. They worked about half an hour endeavoring to coax him to move, and then applied the lash most thoroughly, but without the least effect. They finally came to the conclusion that if he would not go home with them he should not go without them,—that he should be stabled on the spot for the night; and accordingly they stripped off the harness and with the bridle tied his legs together firmly, and took lodging in the nearest house. Early in the morning they repaired to the spot where they left him, and found by the snow where he lay that he had made a number of ineffectual efforts to get up. They unbound him, and very soon found him upon his feet. They harnessed him and drove him home, and never after was he known to lie down in the harness. Thus, what was done to gratify their spirit of revenge proved to be of much advantage to the owner.

A man attempting to break a yoke of three year old bulls, found that one of them was sullen and would lie down in the yoke. He took the yoke from his neck, and bound him so that he could not get up, and left him for a number of hours, and thereby effectually cured him of his habit of laying down.

This is not a very troublesome way of breaking animals addicted to this habit, and it may be well for those who have occasion, to try it. S.

AMERICAN WOOD SUPERIOR TO MAHOGANY.—We saw standing in the Arcade Hall yesterday, a well made and highly polished Bureau, made by Shaw & Tucker, St. Haul street, Rochester. This sample of the skill of our artisans is not only highly creditable to them, but also to the city in which they live. But aside from the skill manifested in the workinship of the Bureau, it possesses additional interest from the fact that the veering, exhibiting a polish of the highest grade, is the product of the American rest, and prepared to the sculptor's hand the veneering mill of Mr. Whipple in is city. The veneering is of Black Walnut, and was introduced by Mr. hipple as a substitute for Mahogany, out two years since, and though its use of such recent date, it is superseding ahogany wherever it comes in competion with it.

It has already become a general favor- in Canada among those who seek to orn their mansions with the choicest rniture. The Black Walnut is also pidly coming into favor in England, ough its introduction there is of quite cent date. This wood, from which ch rare specimens of art are produced, abundant in the American forests, and ough it has hitherto suffered comparave neglect, it seems destined to a celeity surpassing that of the famed Magany.—New York Paper.

THE RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE.

EDNESDAY, ... APRIL 15, 1840.

We give on the fourth page of to-day's paper, e New Appraisement Law of Ohio. As a large rtion of our readers reside within this State, may be satisfactory to them to see it.

CASKET.—We acknowledge the receipt of the pril number of this valuable Magazine. Its tter is all original. We shall shortly give from is number an article contrasting "New England d Southern Eloquence."

THE JEFFERSONIAN.—This paper took us to task me time since, indicating we were deficient "candor" &c., to which we replied, and quested the Jeffersonian to publish the reply our defence against its attack upon us. We ceived a polite note from its editor, informing that the "reply" should appear in the xt paper. We have since received several mbers of the Jeffersonian, but have not seen y one containing the "reply." Has the paper taining it miscarried? Or has it never been blished? Let us hear, Bro. Cable. We can- t believe that you would enforce a virtue on ers which you would omit to practice yourself.

We call the attention of the reader to the corctness of the following paragraph. Such a view ould make parents more solicitious to impart formation to the minds of their children than leave them in possession of wealth.

SELF MADE MEN.—You may take the whole pulation of any State in this Union, and select m it the fifty men who are most distinguished talents or any description of public usefulss, and I will answer for it, they are all, every e of them, men who began the world without a llar. Look into the public councils, and who they that take the lead there? They are en who made their fortunes—self made men, began with nothing. The rule is universal. pervades our courts, State and Federal, from highest to the lowest. It is true of all the ofessions. It is so now, as it has been so at all mes since I have known the public men of the ate or the nation: it will be so while our prent institutions continue. You must throw man upon his own resources to bring him out. e struggle which is to result in eminence, is o arduous, and must be continued too long to encountered and maintained voluntarily, or less as a matter of life and death. He who has tune to fall back upon, will slacken from its orts and finally retire from the competition.— ith me it is a question whether it is desirable at a parent should be able to leave his son any operty at all.—Falconer.

EDITOR OF ZION'S WATCHMAN.—The editor of e New York Luminary, a neighbor of the atchman, who may be supposed to know all out its editor, and being withal a brother bolitionist, would not be likely to do him instice, in reply to the editor of the Weekly essenger, a Methodist paper, holds the follow- g language:

"Don't try to make any body believe that the litor of the Watchman is favoring PROTESTANT ETHODISM, for the sake of fighting him. It on't do; you can never make any person beeve that LaRoy Sunderland, is any part of a rotestant Methodist. Nay! he loves clerical owers too well for that. No, SIR! you yourself e not more fond of BEING RULED by your VENRATED FATHERS than the Editor of the Watchan is of RULING."

We have known enough of this editor, pernally, to satisfy us of the correctness of this atement. Yet, this is the man that Methodist bolitionists have placed at the head of their ess. He is a great champion for the emancition of the colored man, while in his own urch, he is aiding to school six or eight hunred thousand white men into the doctrine of on-resistance and passive obedience.

CHRISTIAN WITNESS.—This paper of the 2d stant, has taken two small articles from the lections of our 30th number, and after creditg, or charging us with them, which you please, as made half a column of annotations upon em, insinuating that we are both ignorant nd deficient in duty.

Now, what we think unfair in this matter, is, editing the "Western Recorder" with these rticles, and thereby making an impression upon e mind of the reader that we wrote them, hereas they were not found under our editorial ead, but among our selected ITEMS of news, so hat if there should be any errors in them we ould not be held responsible for them.

We say to the WITNESS, that we have not ade the least unfriendly allusion to it; and if t will attend to the eleventh commandment, every man mind his own busines," so will we.

Let us relate an incident appropos to our espective cases. It bears, that in the early ettlement of Kentucky, a Baptist minister was roceeding one Sabbath morning to fill his apointment; on his road, he passed Sam Johnsing oeing his truck patch. The Reverend gentleman stopped and reproved him for breaking the abbath. "O massa!" said Sam, "dis all de ime me got to work, to git something to comfort me poor family." "Yes, but Sam, it is wrong to work on the Sabbath day, can't you trust Providence for these comforts?" "Trust Providence!" exclaimed the other. "Why, Providence got 'nuff to do to hoe he own patch. Yonder he is now" (pointing across the field to a colored man) "working."

Now, we would say to the WITNESS, in the language of Sam Johnsing, that each of us have enough to do to "hoe our respective patches," without troubling ourselves about those of our neighbors.

We must say that we have a little more difficulty in getting along with our Abolition brother editors than any others. The Philanthropist misrepresented us—abused us, and then discontinued its exchange. Zion's Watchman has done the same things. The Emancipator visited us awhile, but latterly, stays at home; and now the Witness is beginning to poke at us a little. We have no very serious objection to what it has said, yet we consider it in error. We make these remarks to indicate the course we think it ought to pursue to promote proper feelings.

OUR CHURCH AFFAIRS.

A letter just received from A. C. Barnes, Sup. Cincinnati station, dated the 7th inst., says:

"The good work of religion is still progressing with us. Something like one hundred and sixty have united in church fellowship, in the Sixth Street Church, and at Bro. Kendall's, near the corporation line of this city, a new church is under consideration. The first effort which was made, at a meeting of the society in that place, three hundred dollars were subscribed. They will probably raise five hundred. We hope to raise one thousand in the city; and if we build brick, we get the lot free. We expect, with the above sum, to commence, and add to it, until we get a church.

"We ask an interest in your prayers."

In addition to the interesting intelligence contained in Bro. D. Crall's letter on the first page, he writes under date of the 6th instant, from New Richmond, Ohio:

"The Sabbath appointments, three in number, are all becoming more lively and interesting since our quarterly meeting. The neighboring appointments seem to have caught the sacred flame. At Withamsville, since my last communication to you, seven have united with us in church fellowship,—making in all, twenty-four, who have united with us in that place, since the commencement of our quarterly meeting. Many others are deeply exercised on the subject of their soul's salvation, and furnish good ground for the expectation, that they also will come out decidedly on the side of the Lord and unite with his people."

MARKETS.

ZANESVILLE.—Wheat raised on Monday to 50 cents, being an advance of 6 cents since our last.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 6.—Flour—The demand has been good for shipment at about last week's prices. Sales of Brandywine Flour at 5 dollars, and Pennsylvania to some extent at 4,87½ per bbl. For city use, fair to common brands have sold at 4,87 a 5 dollars. Until yesterday supplies were kept back by a breach in the canal, but it has since come in pretty freely. The market closes very firm: most holders ask 4,94 a 5 dolls. while buyers offer 4,87½, but decline paying higher, and we presume these offers will be accepted.—Bicknell.

OBITUARY.

Departed this life, on Wednesday morning, the 8th instant, Capt. THOMAS WILLIAMS, of this neighborhood. Mr. Williams was one of the oldest settlers of this country.

Within a few hours of the above, widow COWEN; they were buried about the same time.

Report says, Mrs. FLOWERS, wife of Dr. Flowers, of Brownsville, was buried one day last week.

The papers announce the death, recently, of CHARLES HAMMOND, Esquire, of Cincinnati, Ohio, editor of the "Gazette." The deceased was one of the most able lawyers of the country, and one of the most honest politicians. Thus,

"Time like an ever rolling stream, Bears all its sons away."

The following notice of Mr. HAMMOND'S death is from the Newark, Ohio, Advocate, a paper of opposite politics to those of Mr. H. At the same time it is highly creditable to the candor of the writer, it pays a just tribute to the memory of the deceased. Yes! brother editors, death will one day put a period to your political strifes, and level all your animosities in the dust.

"CHARLES HAMMOND, Esq., editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, died on the 3d inst. at his residence in Cincinnati. He was at the time of his death, one of the oldest members of the corps editorial in the State, having been engaged as editor since the commencement of our late war with Great Britain. During the war, he edited the Ohio Federalist, at St. Clairsville, and subsequently became the editor of the Cincinnati Gazette. Mr. HAMMOND was a most vigorous and able writer—a profound lawyer—a man of independence and talents—and an honest man. He was an early settler in the western country and stands favorably identified with our history, as a writer, legislator, politician, lawyer and an editor. He was in the front rank at the bar, and stood for many years at the head of the newspaper press in the west. With a very extensive personal acquaintance, and having figured long and extensively in Ohio, ever since our first State organization, his loss will be sensibly felt. He was about sixty-one years of age. Few men of more candor and independence have ever lived—few have died, possessing more integrity and honesty than Mr. HAMMOND. Peace to his manes!"

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the New York Spectator.

LATER FROM ENGLAND.

By the arrival of the packet ship Montreal, Captain Griffin, from London, we have received files of English papers to the evening of the 5th of March, being four days later than those bro't by the British Queen.

The principal item of news that we find in a hasty glance at the papers are the formation of a new French Ministry, and the quelling of the disturbances in Madrid.

The Porte has sent a circular to the European embassadors, to complain of the delay in the settlement of the Egyptian question. With other European institutions, Reschid Pacha was about to introduce that of paper money, by issuing government bills to the amount of 60,000,000 piastres.

THE FRENCH MINISTRY.—The Moniteur of Monday publishes the royal ordonnances signed the 1st of March, appointing the new ministry as follows:

M. Thiers, President of the Council and Secretary for Foreign Affairs; M. Vivien, Keeper of the Seals and Minister of Justice; General Despans-Cubieres, Minister of War; Admiral Roussin, Minister of Marine; M. de Remusat, Minister of the Interior; M. Gouin, Minister of Commerce; Count Jaubert, Minister of Public Works; M. Cousin, Minister of Public Instruction; M. Pelet (de la Lozere,) Minister of Finance.

The Moniteur Parisien states that, as has been expected, M. Leon de Malleville would be named Under Secretary for the Interior.

A very considerable rise in the funds followed the official announcement of the re-organization of the Ministry, although reports were circulated that the King only considered the new Ministry as temporary, and that immediately on the close of the session, if not before it, Count Mole would supersede M. Thiers in the Presidency of the Council. During many months the House has not been so animated as on Monday, and those reports were not believed to have any foundation.

From the New York Morning Herald.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

Sunday, 3 o'clock, P. M.

The Columbus, Captain Cropper, arrived this morning early, with dates to the 7th ult. from Liverpool, and the 6th from London—having made the passage in twenty-eight days. Another vessel, the Brooklyn, is below, with probably two days still later, and our commodore has gone after her.

The most interesting news will be found in the extracts giving an account of the religious movements of Great Britain. In Scotland, the old School Presbyterians are doing a large business in nullification, and the new School are opposing them, while in England the Catholics are catching all the convicts and multiplying the churches truly astonishing. The strange growth of modern Catholicity arises from the conception of the over good old Protestant sects, who want another John Kirk to put the spirit into them. It is a most remarkable sign of the times, and prevails in this country as much as in England.

The papers on China are laid before Parliament, but no debate has yet taken place. It is now nearly certain that England will make war in China. The London tory papers are furious against Capt. Elliott and the American merchants in China.

The repeal of the Corn Laws are agitated terribly throughout England. Some descriptions of their effects are horrible.

The Earl of Shrewsbury has begun the erection of a new Roman Catholic chapel and school at Alton Towers.

CHINA.

On the evening of the 6th of March, the papers on the subject of China were laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament. In the House of Commons the following conversation took place:—

Sir James Graham not seeing the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department, or any Hon. Member connected with the Admiralty, in his place, begged to ask the noble Lord, the Secretary for the Colonies, a question relative to the Chinese papers which were laid on the table at a late hour last night. He did not find in those papers any account of some most important transactions mentioned in the last accounts received in England, viz: that a remonstrance had been made on the part of certain American merchants against the blockade of the port of Canton, and also an action, said to have taken place between certain Chinese vessels of war and some of her Majesty's fleet. He wished to know whether her Majesty's Government were in possession of any information with respect to the blockade or the action to which he alluded; and if so, whether it was the intention to lay it upon the table?

Lord J. Russell—No official accounts have been received of the naval actions, or of the transaction to which the Right Hon. Gentleman alludes. Private letters reached this country from Capt. Elliott and Capt. Smith, but when official accounts are received there will be no objection to lay them before the House.

Sir James Graham—I have been informed there is a letter addressed by Capt. Elliott to the late Admiral Maitland, giving an account of the blockade, and that that letter was transmitted by the late Admiral Maitland to the Admiralty. Surely that is an official communication to the Government—(Hear)—and I presume her Majesty's Government would not object to lay that document before the House.—(Hear, from the opposition.)

Lord J. Russell—There are letters of that kind, but they are not letters that contain any narrative of the transaction: and certainly, speaking from memory, I do not think they are letters that could be laid before the House; however, I will not give a positive answer without referring to the letters themselves.

The Chinese army is composed of 1,000,000 of infantry, and 800,000 cavalry—quite enough of them, if they are good for anything.

A Mrs. Macauley died at Philadelphia of the lock-jaw, produced from a beating which her husband had inflicted upon her a few days previous.

The flood of emigration is still pouring into Texas with a wider and deeper flow. It is computed that 100,000 settlers come in since the summer.

The Boston Transcript records the loss of a Portland brig which went ashore on Minot's Ledge, Boston Bay, on Thursday. Vessel and cargo a total loss, and four of the crew drowned.

Incendiaries are keeping the city of Natchez in alarm. Several attempts were made previous to the 9th to fire the city. The whole place was under arms, the armories lighted up at night, and military patroles promenading the streets.

The first cars on the Raleigh, N. C. and Gaston rail road, reached Raleigh on Saturday evening, March 21st. They were received with the ringing of bells, and discharge of a salute of artillery.

The Senate of Pennsylvania, on Saturday last, passed a bill legalizing the suspension of specie payments till the 15th of January, 1841. A clause authorising the issue of small notes was struck out.

The Old Quebec Gazette, alluding to the Northeastern Boundary business, hopes that John Bull and Brother Jonathan will not "frighten each other into a belief of hostile intentions." We hope so, too.

The resumption bill of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives has passed the Senate, with some amendments. Should the House concur, the day for resumption is fixed for the 15th of January next.

THE QUEEN.—The postage taken for letters transmitted by the British Queen was over three thousand dollars. This is the largest mail yet made up by any steamers. The number of passengers was fifty-seven.

The St. Augustine News, states that the wagon train on its way from Post No. 2, to Micanopy for supplies, on the 15th instant, was fired on by the Indians, and two of the escort and one of the teamsters killed.

In England a man is subjected to a fine who is found walking on a rail-road track. In this country to judge from the "rail-road disasters" which are chronicled every day, the penalty is death.

FIRE AT PHILADELPHIA.—The extensive turning and machine shop, in Sterling Alley, Philadelphia, below Fourth street, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday morning. Loss of the occupants, Messrs. McFadden & Baker, ten or eleven thousand dollars.

The body of the wife of Fernando Diez, murdered sometime since in New Orleans, has been discovered where her husband, the murderer, concealed it, mutilated in the most shocking manner. Both legs were cut off at the hips. Diez, who has been awaiting trial, in prison, will have to swing under the accumulation of proof.

The body of a man named Hewin Safford was found in the woods near Shelburne, Vt., last week. He had been missing since the 5th of December last. Wounds on his head showed that he had been murdered—and his body had been robbed of a cloak, boots, hat, watch, a set of spoons, and a few dollars in money.

A lad 18 or 20 years of age has been sentenced to thirteen months imprisonment in the eastern Penitentiary, Penn., for placing obstructions across a railroad. He did it to "see fun," and no damages resulted from it, as the speed of the locomotive was lessened, at the point where the obstructions were placed.

The British Queen has a clock attached to her machinery, by which has been ascertained the exact number of strokes the engine makes in a voyage from Portsmouth to New York. During the last voyage, the number of revolutions of the paddle wheels were 291,848; diameter of the wheels, 31 feet.

The Philadephia Ledger states in reference to that dispute about a burial ground in Philadelphia, which we mentioned the other day, that the dispute has continued so many years, that the locks broken by the Hicksites to get into the ground, amount to nearly a bushel!—Brother Jonathan.

The splendid church, belonging to the German Lutherans, and situated on North Gay street, Baltimore, was burned down on Monday. The fire was communicated to this building by its wooden cornices, which took from a cabinet maker's shop, adjoining. The whole wood work was destroyed.

WRECK OF THE LEXINGTON.—We learn by a letter from Capt. Fuller, of the sloop Unity, who went in search of the wreck of the Lexington, that in consequence of the weather he has been obliged to give over the search for the present. Only one fragment of the wreck had been discovered, viz: a large piece of her hull, from eight to ten feet long.

MELANCHOLLY ACCIDENT.—The only daughter of Gen. Evans, of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, was drowned in the river at Harrisburgh, on Saturday, Her body was almost immediately recovered, but all attempts at resuscitation proved unavailing. The House adjourned out of respect to the grief of the afflicted father.

The crew of a schooner supposed to be the Thomas H. Jenks, bound from North Carolina to the West Indies, were taken off the wreck, and carried to Liverpoos, by the Jupiter, Capt. Carter, on her recent passage out from Charleston. The men were in the last stage of destitution, having nothing but a little salt beef and water to live upon.

It is rather a curious incident that when the American Congress sent Dr. Franklin, a printer, as Minister to France, the Court of Versailles sent M. Gerard, a book-binder, as Minister to the United State. When Dr. Franklin was told of it he exclaimed, "Well, I'll PRINT the Independence of America, and M. Gerard will BIND it."

The Tennessee Legislature has passed a resolution by a majority of one in each house, removing the seat of Government of that State from Nashville to Murfreesborough.

The enormous elephant shark captured by the Provincetown whalers off Cape Ann, last summer, is being exhibited at Boston.—This skeleton will, probably, be secured for the museum of some of our natural history societies.

AN IMPROBABLE RUMOR.—We heard a rumour on Saturday night that the President had determined to issue a proclamation for 25,000 volunteers, as a measure of precaution in relation to apprehended trouble with Great Britain.

Bicknell.

On the fence.—This phrase is a very common one, and originated as follows: Gen. Washington once asked a negro belonging to Judge Imlay, of New Jersey, whether his master was a whig or a tory? "Massa on de fence; him want to know which de strongest party."

When coal was extremely dear, a gentleman meeting a coal merchant, accosted him with "Well, my good sir, how is coal?" "Indeed, sir," he replied, "coal is coal now." "I am glad to hear it," returned the gentleman, "for the last you sent me was more than half slate."

SINGLE WOMEN.—Chamber's Journal says it is among the most vulgar of errors to consider women useless because they are single. Only look round your acquaintance—who is the one universally useful, one applied to in every time of difficulty and trial? The single sister of the family.

THE BLOOD-HOUNDS.—The Tallahassee Floridian says, "We regret that Mr. Poinsett has taken the course he has about the dogs. He is mistaken. They were intended by the people, at whose instance Gov. Call imported them, to "worry," to "hunt," to "bite," to "tear to pieces," all the red devils they can catch."

LOSS OF THE SEA-GULL.—We learn from the New York Courier and Enquirer, that there is too much reason to apprehend that the pilot boat Sea-Gull attached to the Exploring Expedition, as tender to the U. S. sloop-of-war Vincennes, has been lost, and that all on board have perished. She has not been heard of since the month of June last.

GREAT SPEED.—Several travellers who passed over the line of the Wilmington and Weldon rail-road, a few days ago: reached New York in seven days from Cuba! They had four days' passage from Havanna to Charleston, and three from Charleston to New York, on the Wilmington and Weldon road.—Saturday Chronicle.

ANECDOTE.—An old gentleman of eighty four having taken to the altar a young damsel of about sixteen, the clergyman said to him—"The font is at the other end of the church." "What do I want with the font?" said the old gentleman. "I beg your pardon" said the clerical wit. "I thought you had brought this child to be christened."

ABSENCE OF MIND.—A steam-boat started from one of the landings, a few days since, leaving one of the passengers on shore. The cry was immediately raised, "Passenger behind—passenger left!" A gentleman, who had been asleep in his state room, came out, rubbing his eyes, and bawling—"Who's left? it aint me, is it?"

A DEFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.—A son of Galen who was very angry when any joke was passed on physicians, once defended himself from raillery by saying—"I defy any person whom I ever attended, to accuse me of ignorance or neglect."

"That you may do safely," replied the wag; "for you know, doctor, dead men tell no tales."

A beggar went into a store in this city, a few days since, and asked for money. The merchant, by way of experiment, offered the beggar his choice between a good salted codfish and two cents in money down. The beggar at once chose the currency. Two cents would pass rapidly at the next grog-shop; the fish was only food.—Philadelphia North American.

A shoemaker's shop was on fire in the town of Lynn, Massachusetts, and an apprentice boy was observed bringing out a lap stone from the midst of the flames. A gentleman present asked him why he did not rather save the lasts, which would burn, rather than the lap-stone which would not. "I don't know," said he, "only the lapstone is my own, and the lasts are my boss's."

SHEEP AND DANDIES.—The following is from a humorous report made by the committee on sheep by the Worcester, Massachusetts cattle show. 'Tis too good to be lost.

"A sheep should be judged like a dandy, by the fineness of his coat. We beg pardon of the sheep for the comparison—but it is so apt! In both cases the coat is the important part of the animal.—What is a sheep good for without a fleece—and what is a dandy good for without a coat?"

MURDERERS TAKEN.—We learn from the Illinoian, that two young men named Todd, suspected to be the murderers of the unfortunate youth, whose corpse was found a few weeks since, near the stage road leading from Springfield to Carlinville, have been apprehended in the State of Indiana, by some citizens of Morgan county who pursued them immediately after the discovery of the murder. They are said to be cousins of the deceased; and a desire to possess themselves of a small sum of money which he had in his possession, is supposed to have been the motive which led them to the perpetration of the atrocious deed.

ARREST OF THE MAIL ROBBERS.—An endorsement on the Hagerstown Post Office way-bill has the following mention of the arrest of the parties concerned in the late mail robbery in Ohio.

"News has just been received here, that two of the mail robbers have been taken; their names are Bostwick and Shanley. Report says, that B. was the driver of the mail stage at the time it was robbed. Five thousand dollars were found upon his person. He has turned State's evidence. This news was brought by one of the western drivers."—Baltimore American.

A LONG HORSE.—A traveller who rode a horse of large size, and especially of uncommon length, lately stopped at a public house in the western part of Massachusetts. and ordered his steed to be put in the stable. Feeling anxious for the comfort of his four footed companion, he afterwards inquired of the hostler if he had put up his horse as he directed.

"Why, yes," said Currycomb, "I've put up one eend of him."

"One end of him!" exclaimed the traveller, "and what have you done with the other eend as you call it?"

"Why, hang me," said the hostler, "if I could get the whole of him into the stable, so I left the other eend in the orchard."

ASPECT OF MONEY AFFAIRS IN NEW YORK.—"Money," says the Express, "continues most abundant, but apparently out of the reach of the public. The Banks are full, and deposites are constantly increasing, yet the great body of the mercantile community have not the means to get hold of it, for they have nothing to give. Every description of property is depreciated; goods are unsold, and business notes are not in existence. Government have just passed a law for the issue of five millions of Treasury Notes, which, it is stated, are to bear a high rate of interest. If they should bear six or seven per cent. they will be taken by capitalists and banks, and be hoarded up. The difficulty of obtaining good notes, and stocks, on which to invest in, has obliged many capitalists to turn their attention to bonds and morigages, and loans of this description have been readily taken."

A HINT TO SUBSCRIBERS.—When a man tells another to put down his name as a subscriber he is as legally bound to take it as though he had signed his own name; and when he has thus signed he is bound to pay for the paper according to its terms, whether he takes it from the office or place where he subscribed to have it left or not. When the six or 12 months, or whatever may be the time of subscription, have expired, he must remember that if he wishes to stop the paper, he should pay up. He cannot expect that a publisher will stop the paper except at his own discretion, unless arrearages are paid. If he pays and orders it stopped, and it should continue to come, he should not take it from the Post Office—as the taking it from the office is in the law a tacit assent to continue a subscriber.—But if he is a subscriber, and has not paid according to the terms of subscription, his refusing to take it from the office will not screen him from payment.—Northern Statesman.

POETRY.

For the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: I would be glad if some of your readers could give an explanation of the following puzzle; in that event I should be much gratified.

A SUBSCRIBER.

PUZZLE.

It is as high as all the stars,
No well was ever dug so low;
It is in age five thousand years,
But was not made an hour ago.
It is as wet as water is,
No red hot iron e'er was drier;
As dark as night, as cold as ice,
Shines like the sun and burns like fire.
No soul nor body to consume,
No fox more cunning, dunce more dull;
'Tis not on earth, 'tis in this room,
Hard as a stone, as soft as wool.
'Tis of no color, but of snow,
Outside and inside black as ink;
All red, all yellow, green and blue,
This moment you upon it think.
In every noise, this strikes your ear,
'Twill soon expire, 'twill near decay;
Does always in the light appear,
And yet was never seen by day.
Than the whole earth it bigger is,
Than a small pin's point, it is less;
I'll tell you ten times what it is,
Yet after all you shall not guess.
'Tis in your mouth, 'twas never nigh, Where'er you look, you see it still;
'Twill make you laugh, 'twill make you cry,
You feel it plain touch what you will.

LAW OF OHIO.

NEW APPRAISEMENT LAW.

AN ACT

To provide for the re-valuation of real property in the State.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the court of common pleas of each and every organized county in this State, shall at their first term after the passage of this act, appoint some suitable person, resident in such county, as appraiser of the real estate in such county; and if a vacancy shall at any time happen in the office of appraiser as aforesaid, for any cause whatever, before the duties required of such appraiser shall be fully completed, then and in that case the said court, at any regular session or at any special session thereof, shall fill such vacancy, and the appraiser so appointed shall hold his office until the first day of March, 1841, if he shall so long behave well: PROVIDED, That nothing in this section shall prevent the court of common pleas of any county from appointing such assistants to the appraisers as they may think proper.

Sec. 2. That the appraiser so appointed, shall previous to entering on the duties of his said office, enter into bond with at least two good and sufficient securities, such as shall be approved by the commissioners of such county, in the penal sum of two thousand dollars, which bond shall be made payable to the State of Ohio, conditioned that said appraiser shall do and perform all the duties of his office agreeably to law, which bond shall be deposited with the county auditor; and said appraiser shall moreover take and subscribe an oath or affirmation, to be endorsed on his bond, that he will faithfully and impartially perform the duties of his said office to the best of his skill and ability.

Sec. 3. That if any person appointed appraiser as aforesaid, shall not within ten days after his appointment give bond and security, or shall not take the oath or affirmation as required in the preceding section, the said office shall be considered vacant, and the court of common pleas shall proceed to fill the same as in other cases.

Sec. 4. That the county auditor of each county shall, on or before the first day of April next, prepare a copy of the list of all lands and town lots entered on the duplicate of the preceding year, noting thereon all transfers which may have been made subsequent to the making out of such duplicate, and shall also enter thereon all new entries and other lands and town lots lying within his county, which may come to his knowledge, and not previously entered for taxation, which shall be delivered to the appraiser on application, together with a map of each township and a plat of each town in the county, of such form and size as may be necessary to enable such appraiser to discharge his duties in the manner prescribed in this act.

Sec. 5. That the appraiser shall, immediately after the first day of April, and before the 25th day of September next, proceed to list and appraise all real estate in his county, subject to taxation by "an act pointing out the mode of levying taxes," passed March 14, 1831, at its fair cash value, in the following manner:

1. All lands shall be valued at their true value in money, taking into consideration the fertility and quality of the soil, the general improvements of the county, the vicinity of the same to public roads, towns, villages, navigable rivers, water privileges on the same, or location of canals, or other public improvements, with any other local advantages of situation, having no reference to the value of the improvements upon each particular farm, upon actual view of the premises:

2. In-lots and out-lots in all towns and villages shall be valued at their true value in money, taking into consideration all the local advantages of the situation, having no reference to the value of improvements, upon actual view of the premises:

3. All dwelling houses, warehouses, storehouses, shops, offices and livery stables, over the value of two hundred dollars, returning only the excess for taxation, shall be valued at their true value in money, all local advantages of situation considered, upon actual view of the premises:

4. All grist-mills, oil-mills, saw-mills, paper-mills, fulling-mills and carding machines, over the value of 200 dollars, returning only the excess for taxation, shall be valued at the true value thereof in money, taking into consideration their advantages of sites, location, amount of power and actual business, upon view of the premises, and the best means of information.

5. All distilleries, breweries and tanneries, all manufactories of cloth, carpets, cotton yarns, iron, glass, clocks and nails, all iron, brass and copper founderies, over the value of two hundred dollars, returning only the excess for taxation, shall be valued at the true value thereof in money, taking into consideration their advantages of site, location and actual amount of capital invested and employed, from a view of the premises, and the best means of information.

Sec. 6. That the appraiser shall call upon each and every person resident in his county, for a list of all lands or town in-lots and out-lots, owned by such person or persons, lying within his county, which may be subject to taxation, which list shall particularly set forth the names of the owner or owners, the number of acres of land on each particular tract, lot, section or subdivision thereof, the range, township, section, quarter section, tract, lot or part thereof, or the number of entry, location, or survey and water course, as the nature of the general or particular survey may require, so as to designate and identify the same, and in the Virginia military district shall set forth the quantity of land contained in the original survey, of which the tract listed is a part, subject to the provisions of the eighth section of this act, the number of entry, water course, and name of the original proprietor; also, all in-lots and out-lots, owned or held as aforesaid, with the number thereof, as described on the recorded plat of said town, or part thereof, if it has been subdivided; also, all buildings and other improvements entered on or affixed to school and college lands, or on lands granted for religious purposes; also, all buildings and other improvements in like manner, erected upon, or affixed to any town lots laid out on school and college lands, or lands granted by Congress for religious purposes; also, the number of buildings, of the value of two hundred dollars and upwards, made taxable by the fifth section of this act.

Sec. 7. That if the owner or owners of any property required to be listed and appraised by the preceding sections of this act, shall be absent or unable to give in a list thereof when called upon by the appraiser, or if the owner or owners thereof shall not reside within the county, or shall fail to deliver to such appraiser a list of his or their property as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of said appraiser to make a list thereof, according to the best information he can obtain, subject to the provisions of the eighth section of this act, in the name of the owner, if known, or in the name of the person to whom the same is now listed; but if it be not listed, and the owner's name be unknown, then it shall be noted that the owner is unknown, in the column of names.

Sec. 8. That the appraiser in ascertaining or determining the quantity of land in the several tracts within his county, shall be governed by the following rules: whenever the owner or the person in whose name it is listed, shall hold, by virtue of a deed from another party, or from the State of Ohio, or by patent from the United States for Congress lands, such deed or patent, if the quantity be therein stated, shall be taken and received as the evidence of the quantity in the tract described; if the owner or person in whose name any lands are listed within the Virginia military district, shall hold, under an original entry or survey with or without the patent thereon, it shall be the duty of the appraiser to require said owners or holders to cause the same to be surveyed by the county surveyor, or some other competent person, and to return the quantity under the certificate of said surveyor, attested by an oath or affirmation within sixty days after said owners or holders shall have been called upon to list their lands for taxation; and if any such owner or holder shall refuse or neglect to survey and list his lands as herein provided, or if he or they be a non-resident of the county, then it shall be the duty of the appraiser to cause such lands to be surveyed and returned to himself; the expenses of which survey shall be paid from the county treasury and to be by the county auditor assessed against such lands in the succeeding year, and collected in the same manner as taxes are collected thereon: PROVIDED, That if any owner or holder of lands has had the same previously surveyed, and shall produce to the appraiser a certificate of survey other than that under the original entry of said lands, such survey shall be taken by the appraiser as if the same had been made under the provisions of this act, or if the appraiser shall be satisfied from other competent evidence adduced to him, under oath, that the quantity returned is correct and that no surplus exists in the original survey, he shall enter and return the same without further survey for taxation.

Sec. 9. That the appraiser shall, in listing and valuing the lands in his county, mark distinctly on his maps the name or the initials of the name of the person in whose name the same is listed, and the quantity thereof; and on the return of said list by the appraiser to the county auditor's office, it shall be the duty of the appraiser and auditor diligently to compare the maps with the lists returned by the appraiser, and ascertain so far as may be in their power, that all the lands in their county, subject to taxation, are entered on said lists.

Sec. 10. That the appraiser shall complete his list, taken as before provided, by placing on the same, opposite to each tract of land listed, the value, and opposite to each town lot or part of lot, the value of such lot or part of lot appraised, in conformity with the provisions of this act, also the value of all buildings and other improvements erected upon, or affixed to school and college lands, or on lands granted for religious purposes, or upon any town lots laid out upon such lands, and also the value of all buildings made taxable by the fifth section of this act, and over the value of two hundred dollars, setting down only the excess over the value of two hundred dollars of the buildings, made taxable by said fifth section.

Sec. 11. That the appraiser shall, at the time of making the appraisement and taking the lists required by the preceding sections of this act, inform the owner or owners, his, her, or their agent or representative, if residing within the county, or shall leave a memorandum at his, her or their place of residence of the amount at which their property has been appraised respectively, and of the time when the special board of equalization for the county will meet for the purpose of hearing and determining grievances and to equalize taxes within the same.

Sec. 12. That the appraiser shall, on or before the first Monday of November next, make out from the list and appraisements taken and made as hereinbefore provided, a fair and correct abstract thereof, by townships, which abstract said appraiser shall deliver to the county auditor, which shall be kept at the office of the said county auditor for the inspection of any owner of property contained on such abstract, until the third Monday of November aforesaid; and it shall be the duty of the county auditor to give four weeks public notice by advertisement, in a newspaper, if one be printed in the county, or if no newspaper be printed in the county, by advertisement set upon the door of the court house, and at some public place in each township, of the time and place, when and where the special board of equalization for each county will meet for the purpose of hearing and determining grievances and to equalize taxes thereon.

Sec. 13. That the county commissioners, county auditor and appraiser or appraisers, of each county in this state, shall constitute a special board of equalization, for such county, who shall meet at the seat of justice for such county, on the third Monday of November next, and the county auditor shall produce to said board the abstract returned to him by the appraiser; and said board, or a majority of them shall have power to hear and determine the complaint of any owner or owners, his, her or their agent or representative of any property contained on said abstract, which may have been listed and appraised by such appraiser, relative to the listing and appraisal thereof, and to correct the same, as right and justice may require; and said board of equalization shall moreover have power to equalize the valuations made by such appraiser as hereinbefore provided, either by adding to or deducting from any valuation made as aforesaid, such sum as to them, or a majority of them, shall appear just and equitable.

Sec. 14. That the county auditors of the several counties shall correct the said abstract, agreeably to the orders and determinations of the board of equalization for their respective counties, and said county auditor shall make, from such corrected abstract, a general abstract of all property contained therein, and insert the corrected valuation in the proper column; which general abstract, said auditor shall certify and forward to the auditor of state, by the county treasurer of his county, at the time he is required by law to make his annual settlement with the state treasurer, or by some suitable person, on or before the fifteenth day of January, 1841.

Sec. 15. There shall be appointed by joint resolution of both houses, during the present session of the general assembly, one person resident of each senatorial district, who together with the auditor of state shall constitute a board of equalization for the State, which board shall assemble at Columbus, on the fourth Monday of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one; and when so met shall have power to equalize the valuation of the real estate in the several counties throughout the State, which they shall do by adding to, or deducting from the valuation thereof, made by the appraiser, and corrected by the county board of equalization as herein before provided for, by adding to, or deducting from such per centum as to them shall appear just and reasonable: Provided, Said board shall not lessen the aggregate valuation of the State.

Sec. 16. That the auditor of state shall make a record of the per centum, to be added to, or deducted from the valuation of the real property in the several counties of this state, in conformity with the orders of the state board of equalization, and shall transmit to the county auditors of the several counties in this state, the per centum so ordered, to be added to, or deducted from the valuation of real property therein, as aforesaid; and the several county auditors in whose counties additions or deductions shall have been made by the state board of equalization, shall correct the valuation of real property therein, in conformity therewith: Provided, That said county auditors, in correcting the valuations aforesaid, shall set down no fraction of a dollar; but if a fraction occurs of fifty cents and upwards, such fraction shall be increased to one dollar, and if such fraction shall be less than fifty cents, it shall be omitted.

Sec. 17. That the county auditors of the several counties within this state, in making out duplicates and charging taxes thereon, for the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, and annually thereafter, shall make out and charge the same from the general abstracts as herein before provided.

Sec. 18. That the county commissioners, county auditor and county assessors, shall constitute a county board of equalization in their respective counties, and they or a majority of them shall meet on the first Monday of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, and annually thereafter, for the purpose of hearing complaints and equalizing the assessments and revaluation of all real and personal property within such county; Provided, That said board shall in no case reduce the aggregate value of real property within such county, as originally assessed by the state board of equalization.

Sec. 19. That the appraiser in each county, appointed in conformity with this act, shall receive for each day he shall be employed in performing the duties herein required of him, the sum of two dollars, and the members of the special board of equalization for the several counties shall receive the sum of two dollars for each day they may be necessarily employed in the discharge of the duties required of them by this act, to be paid out of the respective county treasuries; the members of the state board of equalization shall receive the sum of two dollars for each day they shall respectively be employed in the discharge of the duties required of them by this act, and also the sum of two dollars for every twenty-five miles travel, to and from the seat of government, to be certified by the governor and paid out of the state treasury on the order of the auditor of state.

Sec. 20. That the act entitled "An act to provide for the revaluation of real property within this State," passed February, 1834, be and the same is hereby repealed.

MURDER WILL OUT.—Amos G. Thomas, who was acquitted before the Superior Court at Middletown, Conn. a few days since, on the charge of murdering Mr. Jared Burr, of Haddam, and robbing him of a considerable sum of money, we learn from the New Haven Herald, has since been arrested and committed to prison for a highway robbery. The money robbed of Mr. Burr was found on his person, concealed in his coat collar, and it is stated that he has confessed the crime of which he was acquitted, and given the particulars attending the tragical affair, which were of the most outrageous and barbarous character.

CHARLESTON A NAVAL STATION.—We learn from the Southern Patriot, that the Navy Department have determined to make Charleston a naval station, and have appointed Capt. Edward R. Shubrick the first, and Lieut. Knight the second officer on the station.

It is also intimated that Charleston is to be made a navy yard for the repairing of small vessels, or such sloops of war as can come into its waters. This, as the Patriot remarks, the Department can do, without an application to Congress.—And it expresses the opinion that "a little more exertion will procure for Charleston the advantage of a navy yard for construction."—Bicknell.

HOLINESS.—We cannot begin to lead a holy life, until we look to Christ for the pardon of sin. He that hath the strongest faith, he that believes in the strongest degree the promise of pardon and the remission of sin, has the holiest heart the holiest life. Duties are ours, events are the Lord's. To be holy is to put on Christ; to resemble Him in spirit and conduct, as one man resembles another, who follows his example. Nothing less, than the renewal of the image of God in our souls, will make us holy, according to the Gospel. Morality is not holiness; it does not change our nature. Holiness is that habitual principle of spiritual life and power, which render us more and more conformed to the image of God. Sincerity, in a man's professing and acting his real sentiments, may be commended, but it can never take away the guilt of his not conforming his sentiments to the mind of the spirit and will of God. On every action of the disciples of Christ should be inscribed, Holiness to the Lord. They should walk among men as the sons of God and inheritors of the kingdom of Heaven.

SILK CULTURE OF FRANCE.—It appears from the Essay of a correspondent of the National Intelligencer, that this great business was introduced into France chiefly by the exertion of Henry IV—a monarch as distinguished in the arts of peace as in those of war. In 1835, the value of silk manufactured in France, amounted to one hundred and forty millions of francs; fifty millions, or more than one-third of the whole, being sold to the United States.

Since Henry's time, the silk culture in France has been steadily increasing.—But she still finds herself unable to supply her manufactories from her own soil, and is obliged to import, annually, more than sixty millions of francs ($12,000,000) worth of raw silk from Italy, Turkey, India, and China.

This business is immensely important to France, Dr. Ure informs us, in his valuable treatise upon the silk branch of industry, that notwithstanding the great increase in the amount of raw silk annually produced in the principal silk districts in France, the price has raised of late years some 30 or 40 per cent., such is the continually increasing demand.—It is stated, that many of the old mulberry trees which served to introduce the culture into France are still standing, and the services they have rendered are acknowledge by the veneration in which they are held. Dr. Gilbert observes that near Monetelimart he has seen enormous mulberry trees, five or six metres in circumference (about 17 or 20 English feet.) which are regarded as of the primitive stock. The most remarkable one is that of Allan, which M. de la Tour du Pin de la Chaux, the present owner of the soil, has had surrounded with a wall to protect its hollow trunk, and afford support to its three enormous limbs. These, though dry at their tops, are still furnished with branches that annually produce both leaves and fruit. There is a tradition that this tree was brought from the east by the Lord of Allen, during one of the last Crusades.

RESOLUTIONS OF PLEASANT HILL CIRCUIT QUARTERLY CONFERENCE.

Whereas, by a vote of the last General Conference the subject of slavery was left with the people in their primary assemblies and Annual Conferences, for the purpose of full and free inquiry preparatory to action at the next meeting of the General Conference—Therefore,

Resolved 1st. That the great safeguard of the christian church is the propagation and maintenance of christian holiness and a firm, determined and unceasing resistance to all moral evil.

Resolved 2d. That in the opinion of this conference the practice of buying and selling men, women and children, or the holding them in slavery, as they are held in these United States, is inconsistent with the morality of the Holy Scriptures, and ought, therefore, to be repented of and abandoned immediately.

Resolved 3d. That the attempts made by certain divines to justify the system of American Slavery and amalgamate it with the pure principles of christianity, are altogether inconsistent with the character of a christian ministry, a disgrace to and prostitution of the holy office.

Resolved 4th. That in the opinion of this conference the holding church fellowship and communion with those who barter the image of God and the souls for whom Christ died for money is a great evil, one which it is our duty, both as a church and as individuals, to abandon.

Resolved 5th. That the church ought to adopt measures to purify herself from the enormous sin of slaveholding.

Resolved 6th. That the course pursued by many professed christians, (while they admit slaveholding to be a moral evil, yet at the same time will not use their influence to do it away lest they disturb the peace of the church,) is nothing more nor less than doing evil that good may come.

Resolved 7th. That we most earnestly, affectionately, and in the fear of God, call on all our brethern to unite with us in bearing their solemn and decided testimony against the cruel and unjust system of American Slavery, and to adopt efficient measures for the entire banishment of it from the church.

Resolved 8th. That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forwarded to the Western Recorder, Zanesville, and Christian Witness, Pittsburgh, and that all other papers friendly to the foregoing resolutions copy the same.

ORTHERN AND SOUTHERN HEMISPHERES.

If a travelling philosopher from Jupi- or Saturn, were to land upon our earth d become acquainted with all its vari- s languages, amongst the diversity of enomena that would attract his atten- n, would be the amazing physical and llectual desparity between the man of e northern and southern hemispheres. The fact of the physical and intellect- l superiority of the north over the th has been admitted by observing n from the most remote antiquity, but yet, few have attempted to assign any ysical cause for this apparent phenom- on. It has been customary to attribute e imbecility of the south to the despo- m of her chieftains and the tyranny of r priesthood. But this will not do.— arning flourished under the reign of uis the 14th. The absolute monarchy Russia has myriads of learned men. ain was never free, yet she had liter- re, and Quevedo lived and wrote under r iron despotism.

The honor of assigning to this phe- menon its true physical cause, was served for the very learned Dr. Lakey, our own country. These causes are e greater obliquity of the sun's rays ded to the immense surface of ocean ing in the Southern Hemisphere. The an of the north enjoys about eight days re annual sun, than his brother of the uth; which, allowing six thousand years r the age of the world, make an aggre- te of one hundred and thirty-one years. very astronomer knows that the sun avels from the Equator to Capricorn, d thence back to the Equator in a orter space of time than from the quator to Cancer and back to the Equa- r. The earth being in her perihelion December and in her aphelion in June. he sun being in the lower focus of the rth's orbit gives more of his vertical ys to the north than to the south.

It is also a fact well known to geogra- hers, that about five-sixths of the land the globe lies in the northern hemis- here.

It is a familiar truth in Philosophy, hat a cause however small, steadily and ncessantly operating for ages must pro- uce stupendous effects. These causes aving existed ever since the creation, e have only to look at the men who in- abit their respective sides of the Equator o see their visible effects.

The Spaniards, at the commencement f the 16th century, found the Mexicans arther advanced in the arts than the eruvians. Cortez had fewer foes to ncounter than those who fell beneath he sword of the illiterate Pizarro; three undred years have elapsed and the con- rast still remains.

North Africa has produced a Hanabal, Jugertha, a Syphax, a Cyprian, a Euc- id and a host of distinguished charac- ers. But what of South Africa? History has not recorded, nor romance feigned the existance of any author, historian, poet, philosopher, statesman or hero in Southern Africa. Yes, we assert that the entire southern hemisphere has never produced one individual distinguished in the arts of peace or war, who was not the issue of northern parentage. The North Africans have degenerated, the South Africans have not, for they have ever been savages. No ruins of ancient cities show that civilization ever existed south of the line till introduced by Europeans; no writ of ejectment could ever reach or affect a houseless pauper.

The descendents of the Dutch and English, evidently degenerated, when transplanted to the southern zones, as John Newton observes, from white men to negroes, not in color, but in disposition. Are the inhabitants of the southern hemisphere destined to remain forever a prey to ignorance and barbarism? They may advance, but their physical positions will ever keep them at an immeasurable distance behind their brethren of the north.

Empires have arisen and fallen in Europe and Asia. Whole nations have become extinct. "Where now the Romans? the Greeks? They stalk an empty name, though half our learning is their epitaph." But the south has never degenerated; and why? because they were never civilized. They had nothing to degenerate from. Having had no grandeur, they have had no decadence. If at a future period, some powerful nation should arise in the southern zone, and become to it what France and Great Britain have been and still continue to be to the north, then Dr. Lakey's theory must be abandoned. But, if on the contrary, the northern zones should continue to hold their immeasurable and unquestionable preponderance, the fact of the inferiority of the south will be too firmly established to be shaken.

The effect of physical causes will be understood and asserted by statesmen and have weight with all commercial nations in planting colonies. Time will show what kind of men are to inhabit Australia. Those savages have large heads, which in shape, resembles that of the ourang-outang; their very limited intellects, their hairy bodies, their habitual agility in climbing trees, their narrow, low, retreating foreheads, flat noses, thick lips, strong maxilliary bones and teeth, seem to bring them near the monkey character. These then are the New Hollanders, and where can we find the counter part of this humbling description? Such degraded and imbecile beings are not to be found in the entire northern hemisphere.

Learning has flourished to some extent, near the verge of the northern frigid zone. Iceland and Lapland have had their learned men. The immortal Linneus is reckoned among the hyperborean learned; but who ever heard of the Australian learned? Who ever heard of the Polynesian learned, or of any learning between Capricorn and the South Pole?

The degeneracy of man in every degree of longitude in the southern hemisphere, is too uniform and general to be the result of mere accidental or moral causes.

DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL.

Jesus Christ after his resurrection and immediately before his ascension, addressing his disciples, said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." He assured them that He would be with them always, even to the end of world. But the presence of Christ with His apostles and all His ministers in after times, was upon the condition of their obedience to His command—if they obeyed Him, He would be with them. Without enlarging on the necessity of Christ's presence with His ministers in order to their success,—and the necessity of their obedience to Him in order to secure His presence, I would direct the minds of my readers, first, to the Duties, and secondly, to the Responsibilities of ministers of the gospel.

I. Their Duties. 1st. The qualification requisite in order to the discharge of their official duties. The cultivation of their moral powers is a matter of vast importance. He who would recommend the sublime virtues of the religion of Jesus, must have his own mind imbued with the spirit and power of that religion. The mind must be trained to habits of cross-bearing and self-denial. A rigid prohibition must be put upon every passion, emotion, propensity, and desire, which is not in strict accordance with the spirit of the gospel, which is love and good will to man. He also must enter into the practice of every virtue. He must cultivate that meekness of spirit, that humbleness of mind, and those holy affections which the gospel inculcates. He must have all the power of his soul brought under the transforming power of grace and kept under it.

The cultivation of the intellectual powers must not be neglected. He who would present the truths of God to others in a strong and clear light, must have that light in himself. It is impossible for any man who has indistinct views on any subject to lead others further than he goes himself; if he has clear views he must accustom himself to think, to reflect, to weigh and decide. He must give himself to reading. In a word, he must be trained to mental labor if he would be a workman that needeth not to be ashamed.—Science and literature tend powerfully to expand and strengthen the intellectual powers. Every minister should have a mind trained to intellectual exercise.

The minister who would take the whole armor must be intimately acquainted with the Scriptures. He must read them often, candidly, carefully and prayerfully. He must meditate upon them by day and by night. He must give himself wholly to the study of the truths contained in the Bible; any thing that is not directly or indirectly connected with the truths of God's word should be dispensed with. However much we may be interested and edified by reading other religious books and writings, it will not do to dispense with reading and studying the Bible. Reading and studying the Bible, like every other religious duty, the more we read and study the Bible, the better we will like it. Those who have been most accustomed to reading and studying the Bible, have loved it most, and have been most happy when they were most familiar with the sacred oracles.

Another duty is secret prayer. The man who would preach the gospel successfully must spend much of his time in secret prayer. Neglecting this duty he will be dry and husky in his public discourses. It is in secret devotion he gets his soul bathed with the reviving influence of the Holy Spirit. A minister may try to preach and pray publicly with zeal, he may be sincere and honest in those efforts, but unless he pray in secret, he has not the promise of being rewarded openly; but when a man lives much on his knees; when his heart is in that humble, dependent, confidential frame, which is only acquired at the Throne of Grace, then his public prayers and sermons will be attended by the melting influence of the Holy Spirit.

To sum up all, on this head, a minister should have a mind cultivated in every moral and virtuous sentiment and feeling—cultivated and trained in mental exercise—well stored with Scriptural knowledge—and always in the humble, dependent attitude of prayer; then, and not till then, is he prepared for the public duties of his office.

2d. The public duties of a minister.—The duties he owes to the church are of the greatest importance. The Holy Ghost has made him an overseer of the church which Christ purchased with His own blood. He must preach to that church the word of life, which is able to save the soul—he must feed the Lord's sheep. He must visit the sick and the afflicted—bring back the wandering—he must strengthen the weak—he must remove stumbling blocks out of the way that the lame be not turned aside—he must watch over the souls committed to his care, as those who must give account. He must water and replenish the husbandry of God. He must labor incessantly in the vineyard of Christ.

But he must preach the gospel to the unconverted too. He must go and hunt them up, and then proclaim the glad tidings of great joy—that a SAVIOUR was born—that he DIED—that he rose from the dead, and that he ascended on high, and as the intercessor for transgressors ever lives. He must instruct the ignorant in the doctrines of the gospel.—He must warn the wicked—he must reprove the profane—he must encourage the penitent—he must lead the mourner to the fountain of redeeming grace and mercy. In his public walks—in his private intercourse and correspondence with men—in short, by precept and by example, and by the spirit in which all his deeds are done, he should always aim to win souls to Christ. How many labors and privations must he endure. What watchfulness, what vigilance, what patience and meekness is necessary. The world is the field; he must go as far and to as many as possible and preach the glad tidings. A dispensation of the gospel is committed to him; he is Christ's servant; he must be employed in his master's work. The master has said occupy till I come. Blessed is that servant who shall be found watching when his Lord cometh, having his loins girded about with truth, and ready and waiting to give up his charge.

II. The Responsibilities of ministers are next to be considered; and 1st. A dispensation of the gospel is committed to them. If they do not preach that gospel they cannot be saved; yea, woe is to them if they preach not the gospel. They are intrusted with the oversight of God's church, and in a great measure the salvation of the world depends on their efforts; for the gospel is the power of God to every one that believeth. God has committed to them the ministry of reconciliation; they are embassadors for Christ; God beseeches men by them to be reconciled. If they neglect their duties, or disobey Christ, the consequence is God's cause will fall into disrepute among men; that Jehovah will be grieved, for He has no pleasure in the death of him that dieth; He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.—If those whom God has sent and authorised to preach repentance and remission of sins in all the world, do not obey Him, the object will be measurably defeated; but the blood of sinners will Jehovah require at the ministers hands.

2d. The prosperity and safety of the church very much depends on the piety and zeal of the ministry. Like preacher like people is a true adage. Ministers wield a mighty influence. If the light that is in them be darkness, how great is that darkness. How unspeakably important is it then to the welfare of the church that her ministers all be holy, pious and devoted men. Every thing connected with the temporal interests of the church is very much dependent on the piety of her ministers. Behold the weighty interests of Christ's kingdom hanging on the hands of ministers; if they make one improper step how deeply is Zion afflicted. O Lord, grant unto the ministers of thy gospel a lively sense of their responsibilities! Let them see that the cause of God is bleeding under their careless hand!

3d. They are sent as embassadors to treat with sinners. They must warn them of evil coming; if they do this faithfully they shall clear their own skirts, otherwise the blood of lost sinners will be required at their hands. Oh how my heart trembles in view of the weighty responsibilities of the ministerial office. Look! see immortal souls by hundreds and thousands pressing on to ruin!—Brethren of the ministry, are our skirts stained with the blood of any? Are we clear of the blood of all men? Do our consciences feel clear in the sight of God? Oh, let us arise and call upon God for help. Let us go and sound the gospel trumpet—let us cry aloud and spare not—let us teach and warn publicly, and from house to house, night and day, with tears. Oh, that the mantle of Elijah might fall upon the ministers of the gospel of Christ.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

THE BEREAVED SISTER.

BY GEORGE D. PRENTICE.

In the spring of 1824, I contracted an acquaintance in one of the cities of the south, with a gentleman, who had removed from England to this country, with two small children, the one a boy of ten, and the other a girl of nine years of age. These children were the most lovely beings I ever saw. Their extreme beauty, their deep and artless affection, and their frequent bursts of childish and innocent mirth, made them as dear to me as if I had been the companion of their infancy. They were happy in themselves, happy in each other, and in the whole world of life and nature around them. I had known the family but a few months, when my friend was compelled to make a sudden and unexpected voyage to South America. His feelings were embittered by the thought of leaving his motherless children behind him, and as I was on the point of embarking for Liverpool, I promised to take them to their relations.

My departure was delayed two weeks. During that period I lived under the same roof with the little ones that had been consigned to my charge. For a few days they were sad and made frequent inquiries for their absent father, but their sorrows were easily assuaged, and regret for his absence changed into a pleasant anticipation of his return. The ordinary sorrows of childhood are but dews upon the eagle's plumage, which vanish at the moment, when the proud bird springs upward into the air to woo the first beautiful flash of the morning.

The day of our departure at last arrived, and we set sail on a quiet afternoon of summer. It was a scene of beauty, and my heart fluttered as wildly and as joyously as the wing of a young bird in spring time. It seemed in truth, as if 'man's control had stopped with the shore' that was retreating behind us, and left the world of waters to give back the blue of the upper skies as purely and peacefully as at the first holy Sabbath of creation. The distant hills bent their pale blue tops to the waters, and as the great sun, the image of his creator, sunk in the west, successive shadows of gold and crimson, and purple, came floating over the waves, like barks from a fairy land.—My young companions gazed on these things steadily and silently, and when the last tint of the dim shore was melting into shadow, they took each other's hands, and a few natural tears gushed forth as an adieu to the land they loved.

Soon after sunset I persuaded my little friends to let me lead them to the cabin, and then returned again to look out upon the ocean. In about half an hour, as I was standing musingly apart, I felt my hand gently pressed, and on turning round I found the girl had stolen alone to my side. In a few moments the evening star began to twinkle from the edging of a violet cloud. At first it gleamed faintly and at intervals, but anon it came brightly out, and shone like a holy thing upon the brow of evening. The girl at my side gazed upon it, and hailed it with a tone which told that a thought of rapture was at her heart. She inquired, with simplicity and eagerness, whether in the far land to which we were going that same bright star would be visible, and seemed to regard it as another friend that was to be with her in her long and lonely journey.

The first week of our voyage was unattended by any important incident. The sea was at times wild and stormy, but again it would sink to repose, and spread itself out in beauty to the verge of the distant horizon. On the eighth day the boy arose, pale and dejected, and complained of indisposition. On the following morning he was confined by a fever to his bed, and much doubt was expressed as to his fate, by the physician of the vessel. I can never forget the visible agony, the look of utter wo, that appeared upon the face of the little girl, when the conviction of her brother's danger came slowly home upon her thoughts.—She wept not—she complained not—but, hour after hour, she sat by the young sufferer—an image of grief and beautiful affection. The boy became daily more feeble and emaciated. He could not return the long and burning kisses of his sister, and at last the faint heavings of his breast, and a flush, at intervals, upon his wasted cheek like the first violet tint of a morning cloud, was all that told that he had not passed "the first dark day of nothingness."

The twelfth evening of our absence from land was the most beautiful I had ever known, and I persuaded the girl to go for a short time upon deck, that her own fevered brow might be fanned by the twilight breeze. The sun had gone down in glory, and the traces of his blood-red setting were still visible upon the western waters. Slowly, but brilliantly the many stars were gathering themselves together above, and another sky swelled out in softened beauty beneath, and the foam upon the crests of the waves was lighted up like the wreaths of snow. There was music in every wave, in its wild sweet tones came floating down from the fluttering pennon above us like the sound of a gentle wind amid a cypress grove.—But neither music nor beauty had a spell for the heart of my little friend. I talked to her of the glories of the sky and sea—I pointed out to her the star on which she had always loved to look—but her only answer was a sigh, and I returned with her to the bedside of her brother. I perceived instantly that he was dying.—There was no visible struggle—but a film was creeping over his eye, and the hectic flush of his cheek was fast deepening into purple. I know not whether at first his sister perceived the change in his appearance. She took her seat at his side, and then as usual let her melancholy eye rest fixedly upon his countenance. Suddenly his looks brightened for a moment, and he spoke his sister's name. She replied with a passionate caress and looked up into my face as if to implore encouragement. I knew that her hopes were but a mockery. A moment more and a convulsive quiver passed over the lips of the dying boy—a slight shudder ran thro' his frame—and all was still. The girl knew as if intuitively, that her brother was dead. She sat in tearless silence—but I saw that the waters of bitterness were gathering fearfully at their fountain. At last she raised her hands with a sudden effort, and pressing them upon her forehead wept with the uncontrolable agony of despair.

On the next day the corpse of the dead boy was to be committed to the ocean.—The little girl knew that it must be so, but she strove to drive the thought away, as if it had been a terrible and unreal vision. When the appointed hour was at hand she came and begged me, with a tone that seemed less like a human voice than the low cadence of a disembodied spirit, to go and look upon her brother and see if he were indeed dead. I could not resist her entreaties, but went with her to gaze upon the sleeping dust, to which all the tendrils of her life seemed bound. She paused at the bed-side, and I almost deemed that her very existence would pass off in that long and fixed gaze. She moved not—spoke not—till the form she loved was taken away to be let down into the ocean. Then indeed, she rose and followed her lifeless brother with a calmness that might have been from heaven. The body sank slowly and solemnly beneath the blue waves—a few long bright ringlets streamed out upon the waters—a single white and beautiful glimpse came dimly up through the glancing billows, and all that had once been joy and beauty vanished forever.

During the short residue of our voyage the bereaved sister seemed fading away as calmly and beautifully as a cloud in the summer zenith. Her heart had lost its communion with nature, and she would look down into the sea and murmer incoherently of its cold and solitary depths and call her brother's name, and weep herself into calmness. Soon afterwards I left her with her friends. I know not whether she is still a blossom of the earth, or whether she has long since gone to be nurtured in a holier realm. But I love the memory of that beautiful and stricken one. Her loveliness, her innocence, her deep and holy feeling, still come back to me in their glory and quietude, like a rainbow on a summer cloud, that has showered and passed off forever.

JOAN D'ARC.—One of the most singular persons that ever figured on the stage of human actions, was Joan d'Arc. In her youth she seemed not so much a breathing existence as a fairy creation of the poet's brain. She was the spirit of innocence, and beauty, and purity, and holiness, embodied in the "human form divine." While yet a mere child she delighted to be alone, musing beneath the shade of some sequestered tree, in her own beloved Dormitory, or paying her devotions at the shrine of the Virgin Mary. There was something truly saint-like in her demeanor, even while indulging in the prattle of infancy; and when about thirteen years of age, she had all the religious zeal and christian grace of the matron saint of three score years.—She is said to have been so gentle and dove-like that, while tending her father's flocks, the birds would light upon her, and feed from her hand. Though she possessed all the bashfulness and modesty of her sex, yet as she grew up to womanhood, she became robust in her constitution, and exceedingly masculine. Being skilled in horsemanship, she was accustomed to engage in imaginary exploits of knighthood. One of her greatest amusements was to tilt at trees and whatever objects came in her way. In this manner she gained the Herculean strength for which she was afterwards so noted.—Who can realize that this maid of Orleans, who was so sylph-like when a child, was the same being that in after years, headed, in male attire, the armies of France, led them to victory over the English, and crowned, with her own hands, the Dauphin, King at Rheims? Truly her course was a marvel, and her very existence a mystery. Who can wonder that multitudes at sight of her, were led to exclaim, "She is a creature of God!" Believing that she was commissioned by Heaven to raise the siege of Orleans, and deliver her country, her soul seemed inspired with more than mortal zeal; and her burning enthusiasm running from breast to breast among her faithful and devoted soldiery, their very glance appeared to quail the stout hearts of the English, and cause them to flee as from the presence of powers from above.

At length—her mission fulfilled,—that wand which she had swayed with so much influence, suddenly lost its power. The mist of superstition still shrouding the minds of the people, she was at length regarded as a witch, and as such she was burnt at the stake. Such was the final doom of the Maiden, who was for a time the admiration of France, and the wonder of the world. She seems to have shot forth like an unexpected meteor, blazing for a moment, and with her ignis-fatuus light frightening away the enemies of her country, then suddenly vanishing, without leaving the faintest trail of light behind to mark the course of her disappearing.—Lowell Souvenir.

A FISH STORY.—An Arkansas paper tells a story of a Cat Fish, which is a leetle the toughest of any thing we have seen lately. According to this paper, a few weeks since, three boys, 7 or 8 years old, were swimming in the Arkansas, but a short distance from the agency, when one of them suddenly disappeared. The neighborhood was rallied, and search was made for the lost boy, but in vain. Some three or four days after, two men were walking down the opposite side of the river, when several "carrion crows" were observed to fly up at a short distance from them. Curiosity attracted them to the spot, where they observed a cat fish, of enormous size, lying in shoal water on the bar, partially eaten by the crows, with the legs of the lost boy protruding from its mouth. On examination it was found that the head had passed into the stomach of the fish, but he being unable to swallow it further, or to close its jaws, was strangled, and floated to the place where he was found.

Solon enacted that children, who did not maintain their parents in old age, when in want, should be branded with infamy, and lose the privilege of citizens. He however excepted from the rule those children whom their parents had taught no trade, nor provided with other means of procuring a livelihood.

NEW ENGLAND AND SOUTHERN ELOQUENCE.

The character of a nation is no where more strikingly portrayed than in those individuals who stand out as its prominent orators. In every age in which eloquence has flourished it has received its tone from the temperament of the people among whom it was cultivated, the peculiarities of the soil in which it was implanted, and from the circumstances which called it into action. Before Athens had made any considerable advances in civilization and the arts—when she was as yet untutored in the refinements of taste and in the investigations of science, her citizens were contented with an oratory which sympathized with their rude condition. But when learning had dissipated the mists of barbarism and ignorance; when philosophy had been taught in her groves, and engaged the attention of her sons; when genius had reared her classic structures and chiselled her matchless statues, such eloquence became powerless. A grace and beauty of delivery, a strength and polish of expression, a depth and raciness of thought and an elegance of taste harmonizing with the progress they had achieved were alone effectual in kindling the deep emotions of the soul, and breathing the spirit of the orator into the hearts of the people. Turning to the histories of eloquence in all nations, we every where find it to be an unerring index of the manner and habits of the people, of their improvement or of their degradation.

The prominent traits of character in the different sections of our own country are clearly exemplified by the peculiarities of manner which distinguished the various forms of American oratory. In New England, so proverbial for its calculation and coolness, so remarkable for its provident forecast, where the rule of "loss and gain" enters very largely into every consideration, where every proposition is carefully weighed in the balances of reason and deliberation, and no enterprize is embarked in which the mind has not again and again revolved, where in short the judgment asserts and maintains its sway over every other faculty; here we discover an eloquence marked by sober, dispassionate thought, by wise discrimination, by mature reflection, and by its practical adaptation to the various uses of life. In the south, on the other hand, proverbial for its chivalry, where the reason is not always sufficient to restrain the fury of the possions, where the sordid desire of gain is tempered by the gentle amenities and benevolent sympathies of elevated intercourse, where a spirit of fearless courage and daring impetuosity, is cherished in many bosoms, the orators are celebrated for a potency of feeling, a warmth and ardor of soul, a fervid glow of argument and an impassioned declamation in every respect peculiar to themselves. The eloquence of New England has been developed most favorably in periods of prosperity, when no cloud obscured the political horizon, and peace was shedding over the land her benignant smile. The eloquence of the south has shone with the brightest lustre in the darkest hour of our country's history, when the face of the heavens was covered with blackness, when all was anxiety and fear and ruin, and devastation threatened to engulf the nation. The flowers of New England eloquence bloom in a garden of unbroken sunshine, watered by the dews of heaven, fanned by the breath of zephyrs. The flowers of southern eloquence bloom upon the jutting cliff, watered by the ocean's spray, nurtured amidst the tempest and the hurricane.

It was in those early days of doubt and gloom when the hearts of an oppressed people were faint and desponding, and slavery and disgrace seemed inevitable that the powerful energies of the illustrious Henry were called into action. It was the thrilling tones that broke from his lips which animated our forefathers in that hour of extremest peril—which infused a spirit of implacable hostility to a foreign oppressor—that bore down every obstacle—which revived the shattered energies of his countrymen—which waked to intense and noble action every principle of patriotism that throbbed in the American bosom, and nerved every arm for that stern conflict by which was achieved the triumph of Liberty.

Less troublesome times have given birth to New England's greatest orator. When the storm had subsided and the clouds were all dispersed, then was the most brilliant luminary of the north seen peering forth with refulgent lustre, surpassing all his predecessors in the splendor of his oratorical fame, possessing in an eminent degree every qualification requisite for an American statesman—a gigantic intellect, a sound and vigorous judgment, and an incorruptible patriotism. Webster appears pre-eminently the most eloquent of the sons of the north. In his oratory we discover those traits to which we have already adverted as distinguishing the New England character. When he rises to speak his manner is calm and dignified. A single glance and his whole audience is hushed into silence and attention. His full, solid tones are well fitted to sustain the dignity of his address. Each sentence as it falls from his lips is loaded with deep, well digested thought. He possess that vast power of comprehension which enables him to grasp the whole of a subject at once. He sees it in all the variety and extent of its bearings, penetrates its most intrinsic mazes, and evolves beauty and order from the wildest chaos of facts. Distinguished alike for the solid and the splendid, for argument and for taste, for judgment and for imagination, his reasoning is always developed with perfect symmetry. We find nothing superfluous and nothing deficient. No position is left which is not amply sustained, and like a well fortified castle impervious to every attack.

Mr. Calhoun at the present day undoubtedly stands forth as the most conspicuous orator of the south. Without any reference to his political creed and the peculiar tenets which he maintains, one may be permitted to say that he possesses an acuteness of perception, a vigor of intellect, and a power of mind, second to none of his illustrious cotemporaries. He, too, in his style of speaking illustrates the character of the south. His thoughts flow out with a rapidity as if bursting from some fountain which had long been repressed, and was now just breaking through the barriers which restrained it. Whenever he speaks, he throws his whole power into whatever subject he is discussing, and kindles up into a feeling of passionate earnestness. Every resource of thought, every ray of intellect, every emotion of his soul are centred into one glowing focus of the most intense interest, and there he fuses the most refractory arguments of his antagonist, or moulds his own at pleasure. Every muscle of his face, the flash of his keen, penetrating eye, the commanding vehemence of expression, are all summoned to his assistance, and like the charge of a well disciplined soldiery, he bears down his opponent with an overwhelming energy.

In power of generalization the Senator from the south is inferior to his illustrious rival of the north. In power of concentration, of bending his collected energies to a single point, he is superior. When Mr. Webster produces an argument it is perfect in every part. Mr. Calhoun is striking and powerful only at times. The eloquence of the former swells into sublimity, like a stately dome, every part developed in the most beautiful and harmonious proportion—that of the latter shoots up like the jagged turrets of some Gothic pile—fantastic, yet imposing. The one is the mountain torrent, rushing with impetuous violence down some craggy height—the other is the uniform flow of the majestic river, silent but deep.

Such are a few of the characteristics of New England and of southern eloquence, as exhibited in two of the foremost of the great orators produced by their different sections of our country. Happy it is that by the union of these States there are brought to the halls of our national councils, temperaments thus diverse, and minds trained to their different habits of thought and action. The native exuberance of the south is moderated by the wisdom and discretion of the north, the energies of the latter are invigorated and expanded by the ardor of the former, and the affections and associations of both are gathered around the altar of one common country. Long, long, may this glorious brotherhood prosper! Far distant be that day when its members shall forget their mutual dependence;—when the south shall cease to appreciate the genius of the north, or when the north shall withhold from the south her proper meed of praise. METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.—On Saturday evening about half past 5 o'clock, a fire was discovered breaking out of the Southwest corner room of the fourth story of those extensive buildings known as the Methodist Book Concern. The room is what is termed the "drying room," and contained a quantity of sheets from the press hung up to dry. The room had been examined at 6 o'clock, and the iron window shutters closed. At this time there was no appearance of any fire. Indeed there had been no fire of any kind in the room for years. All the drying is done by steam conveyed in pipes passing through the various rooms, from the steam machine, which is far beneath the surface of the ground.

The first knowledge of the fire was by the persons in the next room below observing smoke in the room, and the smell of burning paper. On going to the upper room door, the smoke was too great to admit of a person going into the room.

The door was instantly closed, and the alarm of fire given. The fire department was directly on the spot, and placing ladders to the front, the firemen were enabled to burst off the shutters, when the flames came out. A powerful stream of water was poured in and the fire soon extinguished—the water we believe doing as much damage as the fire.

We perceive the loss to be variously stated from $1000 to $6000. An examination will be made to-day by the proper authorities, when the loss will be correctly known.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

A murderous affray took place at Bellview, Iowa, two miles below Galena, on Wednesday of last week, between the inhabitants and a gang of counterfeiters, horse-thieves, and other desperadoes, in which several persons lost their lives. It seems that a tavern keeper named W. W. Brown, who was connected with the gang, had in his possession a number of horses which they had stolen. He was accordingly required by the proper authority to deliver them up; but peremptorily refusing to comply, the Sheriff summoned a posse of the citizens to attack the house, which was defended by the thieves. Upon the approach of the former, the latter fired on them from the upper story. The fire was promptly returned; and after a few discharges, the building was forced open by the assailants, who succeeded in capturing several of the inmates, six or 7 of whom were subsequently very severely lynched, and ordered to leave the county. Five or six made their escape.—Of the sheriff's party, three were killed on the spot, two mortally wounded, and several others more or less injured. Of those in the house, two, including Brown, were killed, two supposed to be mortally wounded, and a few others slightly.—The scene in the building, immediately after the battle, is represented as appalling in the highest degree.—Alton Tel. 11th inst.

THE ICE BROKEN IN THE G. T. T. BUSINESS.—The St. Louis Pennant states that James Sanders, Esquire, Sheriff of Washtenaw county, Michigan, passed through that city a few days since on his return home, having in his custody a far-famed banker, named Philo S. Rawson, whom he pursued to the city of Houston, Texas, (a distance of three thousand miles,) where he succeeded in arresting him, a requisition have been made for this individual by the Governor of Michigan.—Mr. Sanders stated that he anticipated much difficulty in bringing the prisoner away, as this course of proceeding was considered, by a certain class in Texas, as altogether too great an innovation on the established customs of their adopted country. A good deal of moving about was evinced by Rawson's friends, with a view of aiding him to escape, but the Sheriff was too quick for them.

This Rawson was Cashier of the Bank Ypsilanti for a short period previous to its failure, and just before leaving the Bank, he testified before the Bank Commissioners that he had burnt up $25,000 in old bills; he now states that said bills were not burnt, but that he was made to give them up to the stockholders, which amount was clear gain to them. The stock notes found in the bank, amounting to $100,000, were forged. This bank swindled the public out of $200,000.—N. Y. Sun.

BRITISH FORCE IN THE CANADAS.—A paragraph is going the rounds in the most of our city papers, in which it is stated that the military force in the Canadas consists of twenty thousand men. It is not so; the calculation is based on the number of regiments stationed in the provinces, as it is found in a late number of the United Service Journal. To make up the twenty thousand, it is estimated that the three regiments of Guards "are one thousand strong," and the foot eight hundred. Not one of the regiments is full, and the entire force in the Canadas, we believe, is not more than thirteen thousand.

The Philadelphia National Gazette, in republishing this paragraph, adds—In this opinion of the New York Commercial Advertiser we fully coincide. Yesterday we published General Scott's report that there are 20,000 regular troops in the British provinces, doubting its correctness at the time, but unwilling to raise a question on his positive assertion. We have reasons for knowning that in the latter part of the year 1838, not more than 6000 troops were in the Canadas, and there is little reason to believe that 14,000 more have been brought over during the past year. The cause of the error, if such, is explained in the paragraph quoted above.

BRITISH FORCE IN THE CANADAS.—The United Service Journal, published in London, enumerates the British troops stationed in the Canadas, on the 1st March, 1840, as follows:

1st regiment Dragoon Guards; 7th do. Hussars; 2d battalion Grenadier Guards; 2d do. Coldstream do.; 2d do. 1st Foot; 8th regiment Foot; 11th do. do.; 22d do. do.; 15th do. do.; 24th do. do.; 23d do. do.; 34th do. do.; 36th do. do.; 37th do. do.; 43d do. do.; 56th do. do.; at Jamaica, ordered to America, 65 do. do.; 66th do. do; 67th do. do.; 69th do. do.; 71st do. do.; 73d do. do.; 83d do. do.; 85th do. do.; 93d do. do. The strength of the regiments of the Guards may be estimated at 1,000 each.

The regiments of Foot, of which there are twenty, are each 800 strong.

This would constitute a force of about 20,000 men.

CONGRESS.—In Senate on Monday, the bill authorizing the President of the United States to raise fifteen hundred men, by enlistment, to serve in the Florida War, was ordered to be engrossed.

In the House, it was petition and resolution day. Among the petitions agreed to were the following:

On motion of Mr. Fillmore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House any information in the possession of the Executive Department, showing the warlike preparations of Great Britain by introducing troops into Canada or New Brunswick, or erecting or repairing fortifications on the Northern or Northeastern boundary, or by preparing naval armaments on any of the great northern lakes or the waters connected therewith; and also, what preparations, if any, have been made by this Government to put the United States, and especially the Northern and Northeastern frontier, in a state of defence.

THE EXPLORING EXPEDITION.—The United States ship Relief, which has lately arrived at New York, sailed from this country with the other vessels of the exploring squadron in 1838. The expedition consisted of the Vincennes, Peacock, Relief, Porpoise, Sea Gull, and Flying Fish, under the command of Lieut. Charles Wilkes. The Relief parted company from the rest of the squadron, whether despatched home by order, or arriving in advance of the rest by reason of her superior swiftness of sailing, we do not see stated. The latest accounts from the other vessels mention the departure of the Vincennes and Porpoise from Otaheite, and that the rest were to follow on the 10th of October. The Relief sailed from Sidney, New South Wales, on the 19th of November last, and was 68 days thence to Rio, from which latter place her course was directly homeward.

THE LOUISVILLE FIRE.—The Louisville Journal publishes the following paragraph, to correct exaggerated statements which have gone forth in reference to the losses by the recent fire in that city:

A great many wrong impressions have gone abroad in regard to the late fire.—We are convinced, that the total loss is little if any over $300,000. As for the insurance offices their strength is but little impaired, and they will pay their losses with the utmost promptness. The heaviest loss sustained by any one of them is stated at $30,000. The merchants burnt out were almost all of them insured in full, and many saved the greater part of their stock. The next day after the fire, contracts were made for rebuilding the burnt houses and the work commenced.

GOING ABROAD TO LEARN.—We understand that Secretary Poinsett, at the head of the War Department, has sent to Europe four officers of the artillery to visit France, England, and other countries for the purpose of studying all the late improvements in that particular line of their profession. They embarked in the British Queen, last week. They will be absent from the country about a year. Last year, several other American officers, belonging, we believe, to the cavalry, travelled to France for a similar purpose, and were received with great distinction by the King of France.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

Mr. Featherstonhaugh and Mr. Mudge have not yet made their report upon their survey of the N. E. Boundary Line.

Lord John Russell has suggested the position of affairs on the Boundary Line as an argument for maintaining the strength of the British army in Canada. Nothing, however, was said of the prospect of a war.

The grain trade is very firm generally, and the tendency of price is upwards rather than otherwise. The duty on foreign wheat continues at 21s. 8d. per quarter.

THE N. E. BOUNDARY.—Lord John Russell, in the course of some remarks upon the estimates and the army, stated—"That the whole difficulty with respect to the boundary question in America, was the failure of his noble friend and the government to make a reply to the ultimatum sent from the United States. His noble friend, in the course of last year, had transmitted a project for the purpose of finally settling this question with the American Government. After the lapse of a considerable period, the American Government sent back a different one, called a counter-project, with various provisions of their own. At the same time that these provisions reached this country, there at the same time arrived gentlemen who had been ordered to make a survey of the part of the country in which the disputed boundary existed. These gentlemen were now employed in making a report of their survey, and as soon as their report was received, an answer would be given to this counter-project of the American Government. That was the state of things at present, which would show honorable gentlemen that there was not the want of any attention in making an answer to the ultimatum, as the honorable member called it, of the American Government.

"There was another question—namely, of claims made by citizens of the State of Maine to parts stated to belong to this country, which had led to proceedings between the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick and the authorities of the State of Maine. That led to some correspondence which had appeared, and it had led to the necessity of protecting the road and the shores by which our troops moved from New Brunswick to Canada, and which it was necessary to provide against, as gangs of persons roved about on parts held not to belong to either party. He would not go now into the general statement which his right honorable friend the Secretary of War would presently make, and he tho't he (Mr. Macaulay) would show that they were not liable to be charged with asking for too great an estimate, if they were to retain the means which were necessary for preserving this great empire in its state of safety, and at the same time of resisting aggressions, from whatever part they might come."

FOUR DAYS LATER.

By the arrival at New York of the ship St. Lawrence, we have (through the Commercial Advertiser) London papers to the 10th of March, and Liverpool to the 11th, both inclusive.

The sheriff, Mr. Evans, was released immediately after the vote to that effect in the House of Commons.

Parliamentary Proceedings, March 6. In the House of Lords, numerous petitions for the repeal of the corn laws were presented.

In the House of Commons ditto. Mr. Hume asked if the office of Chief Justice of Upper Canada was vacant; the gentleman who held the office had been in England a year and a half, and if he was not wanted in Canada the office had better be abolished. Lord John Russell said he had suggested to the Chief Justice the propriety of returning to his post, and had been assured that in April he would leave England.

The debate on the privilege question was resumed and continued at immense length. Finally, it was resolved to liberate the sheriff, without bail, until the 6th of April, by a vote of 118 to 31. The minority voted to discharge him altogether. And Lord John Russell had leave to bring in his bill, giving summary protection to the publishers of Parliamentary papers, by a vote of 203 to 54.

In the House of Commons the Irish corporation bill was passed. Lord John Russell's protection bill had its second reading. The House then went into a long debate on the army estimates.

The Queen, it seems, has exerted her prerogative to bestow upon her husband that precedence which the House of Lords had refused to grant him. An order was gazetted on the 6th March, declaring that Prince Albert, Duke of Saxony, &c. &c. should on all occasions, take place, pre-eminence and precedence next to her Majesty.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.—The London tory papers are trying as hard as any of our journals to raise a breeze of alarm and agitation about the Maine boundary affair—and with about as much reason. The Times is especially solemn and oracular upon the subject.

PORTUGAL.—The Queen is about to present her loving subjects with another scion of royalty.

FRANCE.—The trial of strength for the new ministry was expected to be made on the 9th, when the vote for secret service money was to be proposed. Public confidence in them seemed to be increasing, as the funds had improved, the impression being pretty general that they would be able to carry on the government without a dissolution.

The naval force of France, according to the latest returns, is 350 vessels, carrying 10,090 guns; 46 are ships of the line, 65 frigates, and 36 steam vessels.

STILL LATER.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.—In the House of Commons, March 10, the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved for a select committee to inquire into the effect produced on the circulation by the banks issuing notes payable on demand—which was agreed to.

Mr. Leader's motion for an address to the Queen to pardon Frost and his two companions was lost, only five voting in its favor.

On the 12th Lord Palmerston gave information about China. The reported declaration of war by the Governor was without foundation. The East India Company would have nothing to do with the measures taken by England, except to afford aid, if required. The Governor General had been instructed, however, to make preparations for war.

On the 13th, Lord John Russell submitted a resolution on the subject of the new action bro't by Stockdale against Hansard.

From the New Morning Herald.

TEN DAYS LATER.

WAR BETWEEN ENGLAND AND CHINA—PREPARATIONS IN INDIA AND ENGLAND TO ATTACK CHINA.

By the packet ship South America, Capt. Bailey, we have received highly important intelligence from England to the 20th ult., from Liverpool, and 19th from London, being ten days later than the previous accounts. This news is of the highest importance.

England has now declared war against China, Lord Auckland has received instructions to that effect.

We have now the details of such active preparation of war in British India and in England, as invariably precedes a more open and formal declaration. By an overland mail, received at London from India, the London papers of the 11th ult. publishes accounts from Canton to 15th of December last, and many days later from Calcutta. The news was immediately given to the public, and produced great excitement in London. There is not yet any formal declaration of war by England, but it is well known that such a thing would not be done till the government is ready to make a blow. The preparations in India and England are on a very extensive scale.

DECLARATION OF WAR AGAINST CHINA BY THE BRITISH.—Intelligence reached London on the 11th of March, by the overland mail from India, stating the Governor General of India has, in the name of the British Government, declared war against China. This important news is contained in the despatches from Bombay, dated January 31st, and was brought to Marseilles on the 7th. The most extensive preparations were making in the Indian harbors. His Lordship had advertised for 40,000 tons of shipping, for the transport of the troops to China, 14,000 of which were to be supplied by Calcutta, and the rest by Madras and Bombay.

The expedition was to rendezvous at and sail from Calcutta. Seven regiments quartered in this last presidency had been ordered to prepare for embarkation, and the whole expedition was to consist of 16,000 men. Its destination was not known, but it was deemed probable that it would be directed against Canton, or some other point on the coast, of which forcible possession would be kept until the Chinese Government should be brought to reason.

The last accounts from Canton are dated December 8. The Emperor had addressed to Gov. Linn a decree prohibiting the importation of all British goods for war, and the trade with China was consequently at an end.

The Americans continued to pursue their trade unmolested, and their ships were arriving and departing as usual.

LINN'S NEW CHOP AGAINST THE BRITISH.—Commissioner Linn, by order of the Emperor, had issued an edict putting a stop to the British trade "for ever," and even interdicting the trade recently carried on by British subjects through the Americans. Every article, in fact, from England was prohibited.

BRITISH NAVAL FORCE IN THE EAST.—The naval force at present in the Indian seas is stated to be—The Volage, 28 guns; the Hyacinth, 18; the Cruzier, 18; the Wellesly, 74; the Conway, 28; the Alligator, 28; the Childers, 18; the Larne, 18; the Algerine, 10; and the Druid, 44. Lord Churchill is under orders to proceed to China direct, after landing Captain Hobson, the Governor of New Zealand, at his destination.

It is reported that the National Abolition Convention at Albany, in which six States were represented, have resolved on a separate politi cal organization and action, and that James G Birney was nominated for the Presidency, and Mr. Earl, of Pennsylvania, for the Vice Presi dency.

THE SEASON.—We are favored with a delightful spring. Plenty of rain, and every thing relating to the vegetable kingdom seems promising. The fruit trees are now in full bloom and shedding their fragrance upon the breeze; they promise, at present, a plentiful crop of every variety of fruit. Even the peach trees, upon the lower levels of the country, which do not bear, on an average, of more than once in four or five years, are now full of uninjured bloom.

SPRINGS AND WELLS.—Ever since the commencement of the late drought, about two years since, the springs and wells remained lower than they were ever known to be since the settlement of the country; the rains that fell, during its continuance, seemed to effect them but little. But this spring, just as the frost was escaping from the earth, leaving it open and porus, there fell an abundance of rain, which has filled the wells, and raised the springs; and though there has not a very great quantity fallen since, yet the smaller streams, owing to the circumstances under which the spring rains fell, keep up finely.

CENSUS OF 1840.—By reference to our fourth page, the reader will see an interesting article from "Lyford," in relation to the census to be taken this year. While taking the numerical strength of the nation, Congress is also preparing to give correct statistics of the agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing interests and mineral resources of the country. If each one interested, will look over these questions to be proposed to him, at his leasure, and so far as he is concerned, have them committed to paper, it will greatly facilitate the officer's duty and be more correctly done, because many of the questions will take some reflection and calculation, which if deferred until called upon, by the officer of government, time will not be afforded to give the answers with that correctness with which they ought to be given.

"☞The Norfolk Beacon says, that there can hardly be any hope of the fruit crop in that vicinity, a violent storm of hail and snow succeeded by a hard frost, having occurred."

We would inform the Beacon, that "snow" and "frost" have not so great an agency in the destruction of fruit as the SUN. A slight frost succeeded the next morning by a warm sun has often destroyed an abundant prospect for fruit. We recollect some years since, when the peach trees were in full bloom, there came a rain which closed with a snow—cleared up at night and froze the buds and limbs of the trees stiff with icicles pending some two inches long; yet all this did no injury to the fruit. But it froze the next day, all day in the shade, and nature was some three or four days letting down the temperature of the atmosphere, which was done by such imperceptible degrees, as to save the fruit under these apparently hopeless circumstances.

This year, since the buds have been open, we have had snow and hard freezing which did no injury to the fruit. But the reason is, the weather has kept uniformly cool. The only injury it sustained was from a slight frost the other evening, followed by a warmish sun the following day.

The principle we design to inculcate is illustrated by the member of the body which might happen to get touched with the frost. If you approach the fire with it, it is at once injured. But if you keep in the cool air, or immerse it in cool spring water, the frost is extracted without essential injury to the member.

The editor of the last Letter-Press has the owing language: "We have enjoyed many portunities of conversing with ministers of the E. Church, of northern, southern and western nferences, upon this subject, and have never been so mortifyed as to meet with a man ong them, who was sufficiently ignorant or pudent to deny the right of lay-representa-n."

We are somewhat astonished at this, as our perience has been directly the reverse; we have versed with but few ministers of that church o have had candor enough to admit the claims the Laity to representation. What has be-ne of all the members of the Conference of 28, who made it a matter of conscience to thhold these rights from the Laity? See the port of that body in answer to "Petitions d Memorials" from the Laity. If some of "Observer's" Petitions should reach the eneral Conference in Baltimore, the Letter-ess will soon see whether there are not minis-s in the M. E. Church, who will deny the ht of lay-representation.

O FOR CONSISTENCY!—Many of our readers acquainted, by reputation, with the Rev. obert Boyd, of the M. E. Church. They know, obably, that Saul of Tarsus never profited more the Jewish religion, than he has in the days other times, in the Methodist Episcopal re-ion. When we first organized the Methodist otestant societies in the Monongahela coun-, he was almost in perpetual agony about the ogress of our principles. Moses and Aaron ver had half the trouble with the children of ael that he had with those of his members who ere inclined to favor the extension of the prin-les of church rights. He did every thing he uld consistently, publicly and privately, to event the progress of our cause. He even con-escended to make a public appointment in dgeport, an appendage of Brownsville, Pa., ere we had a little church struggling for ex-tence, to assign his reasons why he could not llowship the Protestant Methodists. But some our readers remember that he was met on is occasion by our Irish Johnny, and so put to ght that the laugh was raised on him over the untry. To defend himself in this matter, was obably the first thing that set him to writing, ce when he has learned the trade.

Now, notwithstanding these things are known many of our readers, it may be known to but v, that this same Robert Boyd has become a alous and uncompromising abolitionist. He ems to have identified his public character tirely with that enterprize. Of course it will inquired, "since Bro. B. has espoused so alously the rights of the colored man, does he w admit the rights of the white man to church presentation?" Take his own words on this bject. In a communication to the Wesleyan bserver, (which admits the claims of the laity representation,) after reproving the editor for nt of courtesy to the episcopacy and verging ward "McCainism," he adds: "my principle ject in troubling you with the present brief ctures, was to evince to my former friends, at my abolitionism has not changed my views reference to what is generally called old ethodism."

Now, "old Methodism," as explained by the neral Conference of 1828, since when, Bro. yd's public character has been formed, asserts e claim of divine right, on the part of the inerant ministry, exclusively, to govern the urch, and it enforces upon the laity and local inistry the doctrine of non-resistance and pas-ve obedience. And true to these principles of ld Methodism," Bro. Boyd once entered a ave complaint against J. A. Shackleford, an d and respectable local minister, to the quar-rly Conference, in substance, for treating in a iendly manner Messrs. Brown and Springer, ose only crime was, they were favoring the use of ecclesiastical emancipation. Notwith-anding the gentleman so zealously advocates e emancipation of the colored man, yet he ill favors the "old" system which fastens the ackles upon the white man. O consistency! ere is thy blush?

We would not, however, be understood to in-cate that we have no confidence in Brother yd's integrity. We believe that he is scru-lously an honest man; and he maintains a nsiderable amount of ministerial dignity. We tribute these ridiculous inconsistencies more a defect in his mental organization, than to y deficiency in his moral principle.

If these strictures should ever pass under the e of Bro. Boyd, and could he give any explan-ion of this subject which would set it in a ore favorable light, our columns will be open to m, should he feel disposed to use them.

MARKETS.

ZANESVILLE.—Wheat 50 cents, Flour $3.

BALTIMORE, APRIL 11.—FLOUR.—At the close of the last and early part of the present week, sales of Howard street flour were made from stores at 4 81½, and occasionally a fraction over was obtained under peculiar circumstances; but on and since Wednesday the prevailing rates have been 4 87½, at which over 3000 bbls. have been taken, and at which it was firmly held yesterday; some holders, however, refused to sell unless at an advance; and although we note a sale of 1 a 200 bbls. at 4 87½ for good common, we record others at 5 00, for a choice of brands. The stocks on hand are represented as being very light, which has induced the improvement, and this may have tended in some measure to produce that effect; but we would remark by the way, that there are at this time four vessels loading for England, besides those for South American, West Indian, and coastwise ports. The car and wagon price been steady, latterly, at 4 75. Previous to Wednesday, about 1500 bbls. Susquehanna sold at 4 81½, but since, considerable sales have been made at 4 87½.—City Mills, to the extent of 3 a 400 bbls. sold yesterday at 5 00, full, which is also an advance of 12½ cts.

Provisions.—There have been no operations in barrelled descriptions which have come to our knowledge; and we have no variation to note in our quotations. Considerable parcels of prime new Bacon have been disposed of, in assorted parcels, at 8½ a 9 cents for western and Baltimore descriptions; sales of fair only, at 8 a 8¼ cents; for hams, sides and shoulders, we quote in order 11, 9 and 8 cents per lb.; old, similar parts, are at 9, 8 a 7 cents for prime qualities. About 190,000 lbs. Bulk Pork sold at 6¼ cents. A sale of 150 kegs Lard, of prime No. 1, has been made at 9½ cents, and a small lot at 9 cents, both cash, which are the two extremes in price of the market. Butter continues quiet.

The Home Market.—The number of Beef Cattle, in market this week, amounted to about one hundred and fifty head, all of which were taken at 6 75 a 7 75, and of Hogs at 5 a 5 25 per 100 lbs.—Lyford.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 13.—FLOUR.—There has been but little change in the Flour Market—and there is a fair export demand, with sales at 4 87½ to 5 dollars per bbl. chiefly at 4 93 to 4 94. Sales for city use at 4 94 a 5 00; on the Schuylkill from boats at 4 87½. The receipts have been quite moderate, and holders to-day are firm at 4 93 to 5 dollars per bbl.

Provisions.—Pork is steady at 15 50 a 16 dollars for Western Mess, per bbl. and Prime 13 50. Bacon has been selling at 10½, 9, and 8 cents per lb. for Hams, Sides and Shoulders. Lard has been in better demand, with fair sales at 9 cents per lb. 4 months; and some fair quality, 8½ cents cash. Butter is dull at former rates, and no sales in kegs of any extent.—Bicknell.

PITTSBURGH, APRIL 10.—Business not having improved, and few or no extensive sales or changes in the market prices since our last, we give a very brief report:

Flour—No change at the river, and out of wagons 2 50 a 2 62½, not inspected and inspected 2 75; from stores 2 75 to 3 00, and for very choice at retail 3 12½ a 3 25 per bbl.

Oats 17 to 18¾ cents per bushel.

Juniatta Blooms—We hear of no late sales.

Pig Metal—A good deal has reached this market from up the Allegheny, but we hear of no new sales for cash or credit, except a small lot of Monongahela at twenty dollars per ton.

Salt—Sales at the river and canal 1 25 a 1 31¼ and from stores 1 37½ a 1 50 per bbl.

Iron and Nails—Flat Bar Iron, common sizes, per lb 3½ a 4; ditto, smaller sizes, 3¾ a 6¼; Lock Iron, 5; Round and Square Iron, 3½ a 5½; Hoop Iron, 4¼a7½; Sheet Iron, 6¼a7¾; Boiler Iron, 4¾ a 5¾; Stove Plates, 5; Nail Rods, 5½; Deck and Spike Rods, 5; Plough Slabs, 4½; do. Wings, 5; 10, 12, 16 and 20d Nails, 4¼; 8 and 9d, 4½; 6 to 7d 5; 3, 3½, 4 & 4½ inch Spikes, 0; 5, 5½, and 6 inch Spikes, 5. A good many moderate sales at the late reduced prices of 3½ to 4½ cents per lb. &c.—Harris.

A correspondent of the Middletown Mail, over the signature of "A Merchant," writes under date "CINCINNATI, APRIL 10," as extracted below:

"Mr. Editor—There has been no improvement since my last letter, in business generally, or money affairs. The price of freight having been lowered within a few days, produce has advanced a shade.

"Flour has been sold at $2 75. But I think this price cannot be maintained, though it would seem as if it ought not to be lower.

"Our Court has adjourned, without taking any definite action, with regard to bank paper, about which so much fuss was made, and as the community are greedy for money of any kind, we shall likely have considerable of an assortment before the year is out!

"The River is falling rapidly, and dull times are setting in in earnest. We shall SEE and FEEL things we never dreamed of before the times get better!

"There is but little city gossip of importance; a CANING match, in high life, came off a day or two since. The hardness of the times was the foundation of it. One of the party received a 'knock down argument' from the other, after which he naturally enough, considered his 'name was Haynes,' and made tracks!

"Our city election is over, and a warm time it was—one party beat the other—but as I don't retail out politics, I leave those most interested to find out who gained the victory! My letters are of necessity short, and I am fearful your dear readers will say of them, like they do of the times, that they are 'very dull.'"

To pronounce a man happy, merely because he is rich, is just as absurd as to call a man healthy because he has enough to eat.

The country bordering on Buchanan county, the northwest portion of the State, is the threatened point. A company of mounted Dragoons has been sent to the relief of the inhabitants.—Ohio State Journal.

At the centenary meeting held in Dublin, Ireland, a short time since, half a crown was found in one of the collection bags, enclosed in a piece of paper, on which was written words to this effect: —"A servant maid desires to thank God, that this money will not be left to buy prayers for her soul after she is dead."

THE LARGE OYSTER.—The large oyster taken by Xavier Francois, while oystering on Monday last was brought up from the wharf on a dray last evening. An oyster measuring three feet one inch in length and twenty three and a half inches across the widest part of it, is a curiosity.—Mobile Chronicle.

THE NAVY.—Among the resolutions passed in the Senate, of the United States, last week was one that the Committee on Naval Affairs he instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving a more perfect organization to the Navy, by creating the rank of Admiral, and limiting, by law, the number of officers in the existing ranks.

A table was prepared not long since by the British Secretary of State, showing the wages of day laborers in various countries. From this it appears that in France, the rate of wages is from 10 to 30 cents a day; in Corsica 22 cents; in Germany from 9 to 14 cents, in Holland and Belgium 10 to 40 cents; Trieste 24 cents; Lombardy 16 to 20 cents; Genoa 10 to 16 cents; Tuscany 12 cents.

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS.—The Buffalo Journal of the 21st ultimo, says:

"On the authority of a gentleman direct from Toronto, we learn that instructions have been given for the immediate erection of a line of block houses, extending from Fort Erie, opposite our city, to Chippewa, a distance of about 20 miles. A cannonading from the Canadian shore will probably awaken our government to a sense of its duty."

GREAT DEFECTION FROM THE CHURCH OF ROME.—The whole Roman Catholic population in Lithuania and White Russia with their bishops and priests, have seceded from the Romish church, and connected themselves with the Russo-Greek Church. We state this fact on the authority of the pope, who bitterly deplores its occurrence in an allocution dated November 22, 1839.—Achill Herald.

A HINT FROM JUDGE LYNCH.—A meeting of the citizens of Natchez, recently held there, for the purpose of devising means to rid the town of the numerous incendiaries which burnt it, the following resolution was passed:—

"Resolved, That the pick-pockets, gamblers, and loafers who have no ostensible mode of making a living, be allowed forty-eight hours to leave the city; and all those remaining after that time, may expect to receive their just dues."

Our whig subscribers in the city cashed their bills for the Olive Branch with an unusual promptness this week—they are so highly pleased with the results of the Connecticut election—while the democrats complain of hard times. We advise the democrats not to be discouraged, for there are ups and downs in politics, as the fox said to the wolf, as there are in the world, when he came up from the well, by the weight of the wolf in the other bucket. The whigs have had hard luck a long time—it is not best to grumble, if they should get their fingers in the money drawer once in a while.—Olive Branch, Boston.

A WOMAN TO PLAY A HOAX.—For they always do it so neatly—there is no masculine clumsiness, or coarseness, about their tricks—they will dupe a man so ingeniously, that he will actually laugh at his own stupidity, and then bless the cause of its developement. But perhaps the close of the last sentence will not hold true in the case we are about to mention, viz:—"A custom officer near the Belgian frontier, would insist on depriving a girl on the road of a basket which was padlocked. The girl went her way, and the officer took the supposed contraband prize to the customs, and an opening it found a blooming baby added to his items of family expenditures.

EXTENSIVE FIRE IN WASHINGTON.—A great fire broke out in the heart of this city between two and three o'clock on Saturday morning. The Printing office of the Madisonian is destroyed, with all the furniture, types, three good presses and a large quantity of paper. Mr. Allen's, (the proprietor) loss is estimated at five thousand dollars, and no insurance. The office and bindery of the Democratic Review were destroyed, including many copies of the Madisonian Papers and the plates. The proprietors have an insurance of six thousand dollars.

The Medical College of the city was also burnt and other buildings. We have heard no estimate of the loss, and hardly know its extent.

THE LAW OF NEWSPAPERS.—We learn from the Boston Courier, that Judge Williams, in a late case before the Common Pleas, laid down the law in relation to a question interesting to editors of newspapers, as follows:

1. Where a subscriber to a newspaper orders it to be discontinued, and it continues to be left at his residence, the presumption is, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that it is left by the subscriber's orders, and upon a promise to pay for it.

2. If a newspaper is left from day to day for a person at his place of business, with his knowledge and consent, though without his express consent, and if he has reason to believe that it is so left under the belief, though a mistaken one, that he is a subscriber, under the expectation that he is to pay for it, in that case he will be bound to pay for it, unless he gives a notice to discontinue it.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.—The people of St. Louis have for a long time been talking about building a bridge across the Mississippi at that city The city council sometime since authorized a Mr. Ellet to examine into the practicability and expense of such a structure. He has made a report, of which the Gazette gives the following as the essence:—

The bridge is to be 3,000 feet long from bank to bank—to be supported by wire cables—to have only three piers, and three arches and to be elevated above low water mark 70 feet, and above high water mark 45 feet, so as to admit of a free passage under the arches for the tallest steamboat. The cables are to be suspended over the two piers from towers, that from the bed of the river, rising to an elevation of 200 feet. The central arch is to be 1,300 feet long—the arches at the ends, 900 feet each. The entire cost is set down at $737,566.

IMPORTANT FROM WASHINGTON.—A letter was received in this city yesterday from a distinguished administration member of the United States Senate, well known to be in the confidence of Mr. Van Buren, stating that should the views of the British government be carried out regarding the North Eastern Boundary Question, as expressed in Mr. Fox's letters, it would unquestionably lead to a collision between the two governments—and the only hope was, that the British Government would not sanction the avowals made through their Minister, of their determination to occupy the disputed territory. The return of the British Queen, which takes out Mr. Forsyth's reply to Mr. Fox, will be looked for with great anxiety—as by her we may expect the reply of her Majesty's Ministers, as well as the report of Mr. Featherstonhaugh and Col. Mudge, her commissioners to examine the boundary lines.—N. Y. Gazette.

CHRISTIAN UNION.—We know not when we were more gratified than in witnessing the kind feeling exhibited between the two Methodist Churches at the late session of the Maryland Annual Conference at Alexandria, D. C. We noticed in the Conference Room, at different times, two of the most influential and conspicuous ministers of our Sister Church; and their deportment towards their Methodist Protestant brethren—as far as appearance is concerned—was certainly in the highest degree respectful and affectionate. Our ministers were also invited to fill their pulpits; and upon more than one occasion, was the interest of our own public meetings increased by a co-operation in the exercises, by Rev. G. G. Cookman, and the presence of other of their ministers.

Upon one occasion, the popular minister and excellent man, to whom we have referred by name, concluded the services after preaching by Brother T. H. Stockton, and offered to a throne of grace one of the most appropriate and touching petitions that could have been made under the circumstances. He alluded delicately to the difference between the two churches—thanking God that the cross of Christ was the rallying point where we might harmoniously co-operate, and praying for the continued success of this younger branch of the Church in the conversion of sinners, and the spread of Gospel truth. —Methodist Protestant.

Our readers will peruse with interest, the following farewell letter from Madame Vespucci. This distinguished lady departs for Europe to-day.—N. O. Bee.

NEW ORLEANS, MARCH 30, 1840.

As I am about to leave the United States and return to Europe, I think it my duty to tender my thanks and farewell to the American people, and I request you to permit me the use of your valuable journal as a medium of communication.

Compelled to fly from my unhappy country, to abandon my family and friends, without support, without protection, my thoughts were naturally directed to America. From infancy I had heard of the glorious country to which one of my ancestors had given his name; I had learned in tender childhood to respect and cherish it, as my second country; I had been constantly told that it was the refuge of misfortune; that all who had suffered for liberty, would find hospitality and protection there. I imagined that it would not refuse to adopt an unhappy exile, a descendant of Amerigo Vespucci, and I came full of confidence, to ask of it an asylum. The title of American citizen, a spot of ground where I might pass a tranquil existence—this was all that I asked from the American people. It was, however, more than the government could constitutionally grant.

But I was told that the nation itself would cheerfully do what Congress had not the power to accomplish; I was informed that the world must not believe America had refused an asylum to the descendant of Amerigo Vespucci. I was advised to apply to the people. The Senate of the United States, through the committee to whom the subject had been referred, encouraged me to make this appeal, and stated that it could not fail to be favorably received. On this occasion the Senate itself set a generous example, and in the course of one of its sittings, a national subscription was opened in my behalf, to which many of the members of that illustrious body contributed munificently. This noble example was imitated in various parts of the Union. In many States, lists of subscription, drawn up by eminent individuals, were filled with the most honorable names in the country, and in a short time, a very considerable amount was obtained.

Although the sum subscribed far exceeded my expectation, I could not deceive myself by accepting as a great national gift, that which had proceeded from the generous impulses of a certain number of individuals. My object in coming to America was not to acquire wealth, but to obtain from the nation itself a spot of ground, where I might find repose from the fatigues of my troubled existence and live in peace. But although the descendant of Amerigo Vespucci would have been proud of a national donation, she cannot accept individual tributes. I have, therefore, determined not to receive the amount of the subscriptions collected in my behalf, and I request, you, sir, to make known my resolution to the public thro' the columns of your journal.

It is my wish that those gentlemen who have been kind enough to undertake the collection of subscriptions, may decline receiving the sums subscribed.—With regard to the amount already collected, it will be reimbursed by the depositories to those who have contributed it.

I cannot terminate this communication without expressing my heartfelt gratitude to all from whom, during my residence in the United States, I have received kindness and attention; I thank them from my inmost soul for the friendship they have displayed for me, and on the soil of Old Europe I shall continually cherish the recollection of their kindness.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my distinguished consideration,

M. E. AMERICA VESPUCCI.

Will Bro. Powelson, of Plainfield, be so good as to return the No. of Brother Jonathan we sent him, as we have a call for it?

As the Post Master General has decided that "a post master may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter, if written by himself," it is the same thing for a subscriber to address his letter, enclosing the pay for his paper to a Post Master who is publisher of a newspapar, in his official capacity by which it will come free.

We therefore wish our subscribers to address their letters containing remitances for us, to "C. Springer, P. M. Meadow Farm, Muskingum O.;" also all letters on the official duties of our office as Post Master in the same way. All letters on other business, or business of a private nature should be addressed to us omitting the official signatures P. M. and we will pay for them.

As the publisher of the Western Recorder does not reside immediately in town, any person who may have business with the office, could do it, or have it done, by calling on O. WHITE, No. 104, Main-Street, Zanesville, Ohio.

We have complete files of the 3d, 4th and 6th volumes of the Methodist Correspondent, which we are now using for wrapping paper. Any person who may wish one, or all of these, can have them for 25 cents a piece. The 3d volume contains all the legal doings of Pennsylvania, in relation to the Episcopal Methodist property question.

CAMP MEETING.—We propose to hold a camp meeting, on the farm of John Walker, 3 miles west of Adamsville, Muskingum county, Ohio, to commence on the 4th of June. We solicit the attendance of Bros. Brown, Springer, Marshall, Wilson, Thrap, Fairchild, Davis, Warren and Stephens. P. INSKEEP, Sup.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE MURDERER'S CELL.

The Editor of the Missouri and Illinois Temperance Herald, in his last paper, gives the following interesting sketch of a visit to Buchanan, who was hanged in St. Louis on the 3d February last.

We were met at the entrance by a good looking man, of some three or four and thirty, attired in the garb, and having the deportment of a gentleman. He set a chair and asked us to be seated. He drew a chair for himself and sat down by our side. As we surveyed his features, and discovered not the least expression of savage malignity, but on the contrary, what we considered the fair index of benevolence and kindness,—we could not but exclaim, "Is this the man that on Friday next is to expiate the guilt of murder, upon the gallows!" He appeared dejected in view of his awful condition, but was communicative.

In answer to our inquiries he stated that he was thirty years old, was a native of Princeton, N. J., where he was brought up. When he was a child, he went to Sunday School for several years, and had faithful teachers. He lived in the family of Judge Bayard, where they worshipped God daily—morning and evening. The ladies of the family would instruct him on Sundays out of the Bible. His mother was a Godly woman, is still living, an aged and deeply afflicted widow. He has not seen her for three years. He showed us letters he had received from her since he had been imprisoned. The following sentence occurred in one of them: "What! O my son could have taken possession of you. You were always a good and kind child to me, and never had the bad habit of drinking. I am afraid you have fallen into bad ways since you left Princeton. I have seen so little of you of late years, that it may be you drink. I can account for this dreadful business in no other way." She also mentioned the fact that a younger son had become insane, since his brother's melancholy fate had been decided.

The prisoner was brought up to the trade of hat making. It injured his health and he was advised by a physician to engage in some light occupation. "I accordingly," said he, "engaged as a barkeeper, in Philadelphia. Until this time, —nine years ago, when I was twenty-five years old, I hardly knew what liquor was. And for three or four years after I commenced the business, I seldom tasted any liquor. It is about five years since I began to drink a little. It grew upon me, until within the last year or two I have kept stimulated most of the time, though I was never what you may say drunk more than once or twice in my life. I took care not to drink so much as to show it. My conscience often checked me while in the business. I never would sell liquor to a man when he was intoxicated; and whenever I could get a chance, I would go to church, but this was seldom, as my business required my attention at home almost constantly."

In April, 1838, he came to St. Louis with Fisher, the keeper of the "Old Dominion." For some time he was steward at the race grounds, till that was broken up. He then spent several months in Illinois—was head steward for a company carrying on the public works in Coles county. Last spring, Fisher wrote to him to return and keep bar for him. He returned on the 15th of June, and kept bar till the 28th of July,—the day he murdered Brown. They had been on good terms. He had nothing against Brown, and did not know that Brown had any thing against him. "It was Sunday. There was more drinking on that day than any other. It was generally our best day. There were six or seven boarders, all but one had been drinking, and were so much intoxicated that when they came to testify they did not know much about it. Brown had had two fights —one below and the other above stairs." Prisoner had parted him from his antagonist both times. He was not in the habit of carrying pistols, but during the fracas, he had picked up the pistols and put them into his pocket, for fear that mischief might be done with them. Brown was angry with prisoner because he had interfered, come up to the counter, drew a knife from his pocket and swore he would kill him. Prisoner instantly drew a pistol from his pocket and shot him.

"I was intoxicated," said he, "but not drunk. If I had'nt been intoxicated, and engaged in that business, I would never have been here. Since I have been a bar-keeper, I have often had serious reflections, and was afraid I should lose my soul. I never attempted to pray, because I knew it would be making a mock of it, till I could give up selling and drinking. No man can be religious to be in that business, because he knows he is injuring his fellow men as well as himself. I knew all the time I was about it that I was injuring my fellow men and making their families miserable. O! I have seen enough of that in my time. I have often had bad feelings when I saw men to whom I sold liquor, going home to their families. But these feelings would soon pass away. From my personal intercourse with liquor sellers, I am satisfied that all know their business does nobody any good, but produces only mischief and misery. But all they care about is the money they get, and they generally have so litttle principle if it was'nt for fear of the law, I don't see why they would'nt steal money just as soon as make it in that way. It would not do people more hurt. Mother often wanted me to leave off my selling liquor, and follow my trade. As I am soon to die, I am anxious to do all I can for those I leave behind. And I should like to warn all liquor sellers against the influence of their business; and I hope my example may be a warning to them. I would warn all young men against drinking. From what I have seen and experienced during the last nine years, I am convinced that no man can sip a little occasionally without becoming a drunkard. I have seen a great many respectable men begin in this way, and not stop till they had ruined their fortunes, and their health, and lost their lives. I have seen a great many families in comfortable circumstances, reduced to poverty, and perfect wretchedness by my business, and now I deeply regret that I have in any degree contributed to it. There is no safety any where but in letting liquor alone entirely. When I lived with Esq. Bayard, I lived happy in those days. O! if I had but attended to the faithful instructions I received while in that Godly family, and in Sabbath School, I might have been a respectable and useful man, and a comfort to my aged mother in her declining years."

The expressions were written down as he uttered them, and read over to him one by one, and he told us they were correct.

He mentioned a fact which shows the influence of this business, in blunting every sensibility of our nature. Since he has been confined, not a single one of the 275 rum-sellers in St. Louis has ever come near him or offered to do any thing for him. Not even Fisher himself, his employer, has visited him but once, and that was on his own business! Further, Buchanan's counsel told us, that Fisher refused to pay the postage on a letter from his mother to him—addressed to his (Fisher's) care; and this too, notwithstanding he had testified under oath at the trial, that the prisoner had been, ever since he knew him, a man of perfectly unexceptionable character! Prisoner's counsel paid the postage himself.

THE BRITISH NAVY.—Great efforts are making by England to largely increase the Navy, which is now, according to their papers, in a very inferior condition to what it was sixty years ago, notwithstanding her increase of territory and commerce. The amount appropriated for the service this year is £5,659,651—or upward of $28,000,000! In Parliament there has been considerable debate upon the subject and the opposition have taken the condition of the navy as a pretext for abusing the ministers. The London correspondent of the Journal of Commerce says that Capt. Marryatt stated that full one half the crew of every American ship were picked English seamen.

Sir Thomas Cochrane, tory member, said that the government could not throw out of its consideration "such countries as Russia and the United States. Let them remember the delicate relations with the United States. Had not the American President stated to Congress that he had entreated the State of Maine to use moderation, but if any acts of aggression were committed they must, at all hazards, go to their assistance! The House knew very well that the insolence of democracies rose in proportion to their knowledge of the weakness of their antagonists; and if they were called on to relinquish one inch of territory which they had claimed, nothing but a complete consciousness that we could in a few weeks send against them some thousands of men, and carry war into the heart of their country, would prevent them from maintaining their claim by force of arms"—and he maintained that the country was not in a condition to go to war. Sir Robert Peel answered that the country never was so efficient as at the present time, and that should a war occur to-morrow, they would be fully able to meet it.

Another of those arithmetical phenomena has recently appeared in Russia.—His name is Ivan Petroff; he is eleven years old, the son of illiterate peasants, and can neither read nor write; yet he solves the most difficult questions of calculation by a process of mind which he cannot explain. The Emperor having witnessed his powers, has given 1000 roubles for his education.

UNITED STATES IN 1839.

From Lyford's Baltimore Commercial Journal.

CENSUS OF 1840.

By an act of Congress, "the enumeration shall commence on the first day of June, in the year 1840, and shall be completed and closed in ten calender months thereafter."

According to the foregoing extract, the Marshals, with their Assistants, will enter upon the duties of their office in less than two months. They will be provided with a particular set of Questions, which they are to propound to the heads of families and principals of establishments, a copy of which we subjoin. These questions are of themselves important; inasmuch as they go to show the wide scope contemplated by the act; and it is with a view of putting our readers in possession of this information, and to enable them seasonably to reflect upon the subject and be prepared with their answers when the questions come officially before them, that we thus anticipate that period.

Interrogatories to be put by the Assistants of the Marshals, in taking the 6th census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, the answers to which will be entered on the printed form No. 4, in the appropriate columns.

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in the city of New York, and devoted to Home and Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by PARK BENJAMIN.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant periodical sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 25.—The situation of New York, and its immense commercial intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intelligence received in our "great metropolis." Availing ourselves of the advantages derived from this source and many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper intended for "our country, our whole country"—warped by no sectional bias—controverting no man's political opinions—unsullied by any thing of an immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of such English works of value as may be conveniently embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of original matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from all the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly, the Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazines; Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, LaBelle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.

We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of three celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which a copyright is not attached.

The editor will especially aim to make The New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full accounts of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to our people; while they omit or neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.

We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which fall under the eye of the municipal police. We can see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No ludicrous accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal violations of social order by the ignorant and imbecile.

With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient, and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.

Price of The New World, THREE DOLLARS per annum, payable in advance.

All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

SACRED SONGS, NO. VII.

JUDGES, CHAPTER V.

aise ye the Lord. Praise His almighty power,
r He avenged His people in that hour:
hen, willing, they submitted to His hand,
d bow'd obedient to His high command.

ear, O ye Princes! Listen, every king, even I, a song of joy will sing;
y loudest anthems to His name I'll raise, nd offer Israel's God my highest praise.

ord, when thou wentedst out of Seir, the day hen thou from Edom's fields marchedst away, arth trembled to its base, the heavens did fall, nd weeping clouds proclaim'd thee Lord of all.

he mountains, melting, bow'd beneath thy nod, nd even proud Sinai own'd thee Israel's God.

n days of Shamgar, Anath's valiant son,
n days of Jael, our highways were o'er run,
'er run with foes, and travellers sought the wood,
nd walk'd the by-ways to preserve their blood.

he busy bustle of our towns did cease,
nd over Israel reign'd a death-like peace, ill Israel's mother, Deborah arose, ill I with mighty arm subdu'd our foes.

hey chose new gods—then war's wild shrieks we heard, hen at our gates the conquering foes appear'd;
hen, 'mong the forty thousand of our land,
ot one was found with a defending hand;
ut I arose, God all my efforts blessed, ur foes have fallen, and Israel is at rest.

ur valiant rulers claim my grateful song, hemselves they gave to Israel's helpless throng—less thou the Lord, my soul, my lips proclaim he awful grandeurs of Jehovah's name.

peak, ye that ride white horses, speak His praise,
e judges, loud your hallelujahs raise;
nd ye who walk the way-side and the bower roclaim aloud Jehovah's wond'rous power.

e who delivered are from the rude shocks
f death-dipp'd arrows, when ye drive your flocks
o watering places, there proclaim His worth, is righteous acts to Israel's towns set forth:
et all God's people to the gates draw near,
n freedom draw and judge without a fear.*

Awake! awake! O Deborah! arise!
Utter thy song, and swell the vaulted skies!
Barak, arise! Abinoam's son, awake!
Vanquish the victors! Captors, captive take!

He that remained then ruled the smiling plain,
The Lord has bow'd the mighty to my reign.

From Ephraim came who Amalek subdu'd;
Then Benjamin, with his people, learned and rude;
From Michar came their rulers—valiant men;
From Zebulon came those who use the pen.

Princes, from Issachar, their aid did yield,
Even Issachar and Barak took the field—
Barak on foot march'd to the vales below,
There with his force to crush the haughty foe,
For Reuben there was sorrowing of heart,

Why from thy folds, O Reuben! did'st not part?
Why love to see thy flocks, and hear them cry?
Our wail for thy divisions rose full high.

Beyond the Jordan, Gilead silent slept;
Safe in his vesssels, Dan his army kept;
Asher sat heedless on the ocean's shore,
Nor listen'd to the battle's dreadful roar.

But valiant Zebulon was join'd in hand
With Naphtali, their fearless patriot band
Rush'd to the battle's midst.

In Taanach's plain
The Kings of Canaan fought, and round their slain, Megiddo's waters turbulently roll'd;
They fought, but not for gain of sordid gold.

They fought from heaven, for e'er the very blaze
Of fiery stars, Sisera did amaze.

At ancient Kishon's waves our foes did frown,
And 'tempt to cross, but Kishon swept them down,
Thou, O my soul, hast trodden down proud strength,
Our foes are fallen and we are free at length!

Then horse hoofs broke beneath each mighty chief,
That proudly pranc'd at Israel's great relief.

Curse Meroz's people, loud the angel said,
Let bitter curses rest upon their head;
Because, when God against the mighty rose,
They did not help to crush His people's foes.

But bless'd be Jael, Heber's valiant wife, Bless'd above women, for she took the life
Of proud Sisera.

Water he did crave,
But in a lordly dish, instead, she gave Both milk and butter.

In her hands a nail,
And hammer too, nor did her brave heart quail,
'Till through his temples she the nail had sped,
And from his body smote the tyrant's head.

And at her feet he bow'd, he fell, and there
He laid him down, he bow'd, he fell and where He laid him down at her proud feet—he died;

Thus fell the Gentiles' chief—their boast—their pride.

His mother from her window oft did say,
"Why do his charriot wheels so long delay."

Her friends replied, yea to herself she said,
"Have they not conquered? Has not Israel fled?
"They share the spoil; a maid or two allot
"To every man, and Sisera has got,
"A spoil of needle work of various dies,
"Meet for the neck of one who wins the prize;
"A spoil of needle work of priceless gain,
"Meet for my son." Mother—that son is slain!

Thus perish, Lord, all who oppose thy way,
But let thy people bask in beamy day;
Let them be like the sun's resplendent power,
When he shines forth in noontide's brilliant hour.

PARODY OF THE FALLEN HERO.

"No sound can awake him to glory again."

THE HERALD* OF THE GOSPEL.

His Master will wake him to glory again.
On that lone barren isle where the loud roaring billow,
Assail the stern rocks while the wild tempests rave,
The herald lies still, and the dew dropping willows,
Like fond weeping mourners bend over his grave.
The sea storm may rage and the hoarse thunder rattle,
He heeds not—he hears not—he's free from all pain;
He sleeps his last sleep, he has fought his last battle—
What sound can awake him to glory again?

O shade of the mighty where now are the legions
That rush'd but to conquer when thou ledst them on?
Full lowly they lie in the far chilly regions,
And all but the fame of their triumphs is gone.
The trumpet may sound and the peal of sin rattle—
They heed not—they hear not—they're free from all pain;
They sleep their last sleep, they have fought their last battle—
And Gabriel shall wake them to glory again.

Yet spirit immortal the tomb cannot bind thee,
For like the swift eagle that soar'd to the sun,
Thou springest from thy bondage and leavest behind thee
Such fame as few mortals before thee had won:
Tho' heralds may combat where sin's thunders rattle,
Thou sleep'st thy last sleep, thou hast fought thy last battle—
Thy Master will wake thee to glory again.

*See Dr. A. Clarke's Notes on Matt. III. 1, and at the end of the chapter.

*It was a custom among the Eastern nations of antiquity, especially the people of God, says a learned writer, to assemble at the gates of their cities, to hear and judge in civil cases. To this custom, which had been long suspended by the internal disturbances of Israel, it is presumed the poet alludes in the text.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

For the Western Recorder.

JACKSONSBURGH, OHIO, APRIL 14, 1840.

Brother Springer: Believing that revival intelligence is read, at least by the religious class of your subscribers, with some interest, I feel it my duty, by your permission, to record in your paper, the operations of divine grace in behalf of perishing sinners, on Twin Creek circuit.

Our second quarterly meeting for this circuit was held at Liberty, Montgomery county, Ohio, commencing, Saturday evening the 22d of February, and was concluded on the evening of the following Tuesday. We were favored with the attendance of brethren C. Fall, J. Dalbey, J. H. Thomas and W. W. Paul, all of whom labored as they who must give an account, and success attended their labor. Believers were edified. Many sinners were convicted, and we think some mourners were comforted. Six united with us in church fellowship.

We have also held two protracted meetings in West Alexandria, Preble county, Ohio, which were attended with very favorable results. At the first of which, we were favored with the attendance and untiring labors of brethren Fall, Thomas and Mummy. This meeting lasted four days, during which, we organized a society of thirteen members.

The latter, was held four weeks, subsequently, and was attended by brethren C. and T. Fall, Thomas, Clemmons and Atkinson, all of whom labored much to profit. The seed that were sown during the former meeting, had by this time, taken root in the hearts of many, which was evinced by their unusual attention to the preaching of the word—flowing tears and ejaculatory prayers. During this meeting, which lasted about five days, we received an addition of nine members, and three since; making the whole number, received at that place TWENTY-FIVE. Three however, were members of other societies on the circuit, and were transferred to that for the sake of convenience.

We have satisfactory evidence to believe that many of those we have received, will be pillars in the church. A goodly number of them are enjoying the life and power of religion, and others are earnestly seeking it.

Notwithstanding we commenced our labor on this circuit this Conference year, under some discouraging circumstances, in consequence of the paucity and scattering condition of the members, we feel much encouraged and hope, through grace, to live as christians and as a church, though our enemies, in order to have us die, continue to announce our death.

Our third quarterly meeting will be held in West Alexandria, Preble county, Ohio; at which, we solicit the aid of brethren Flood, Dobbins, McGuire, Dalbey, Atkinson, Clemmons, Little and the brethren of the circuit, and all others that could make it convenient to attend with us. Yours, with esteem,

R. M. DALBEY.

FREEPORT, SHELBY, IA., MARCH 25, 1840.

Mr. Editor: Seeing communications from various quarters, with regard to the prosperity of our Zion, I presume that some information from the "Hoosier land," will not be altogether unacceptible.

The preacher appointed to this, Sugar Creek circuit, from ill health, not attending to his appointment, Bro. Douthart, from Blue river, came to our assistance and was employed to travel the balance of the year, and thus serves both circuits.

The first quarterly meeting commenced on the 13th instant, on the Brandywine in Hancock county, and continued until the evening of the 22d, with much interest. The work broke out on the 14th and continued until the close. All orders of christians seemed to feel the thrilling efficacy of divine grace. It was a time of much love and christian union. Three professed religion, and ten united with the church. This society is nearly all from the world. The sisters have organized a prayer meeting to be sustained by themselves, which will doubtless prove a blessing. Yours, &c., S. MORRISON.

MISSIONARY.

TEXAS.

The following letter from the South Western Christian Advocate, though evidently written by a man of sanguine temperament, who, to use the old hunter's style, feeds the Texans on potatoes because they fed him on 'possum fat, is nevertheless quite interesting in its facts.—Ed. R.

Bro. Stringfield: Knowing you have had so many communications on physical Texas, and believing that every man that intends emigrating to the country will first "look before he leaps," I will say nothing in reference to the natural advantages which a munificient Providence has showered in such profusion on this fairest portion of the sunny south, but will content myself by giving you some account of the wide spreading gospel field "whitening to the harvest." I know Texas has been represented as the refuge of cut throats and renegadoes; let facts, therefore, be submitted to a candid world to speak for themselves. I entered Texas about the first of last September, and attended a four days' meeting at, or near San Augustine, a flourishing town in eastern Texas. A large congregation, say 1000, convened from day to day, that would compare, without any disparagement, with any congregation you will see in the States in point of intelligence, dress and behaviour; never did I address one more attentive and respectful. Considerable excitement ensued, and many professed to find "the pearl of great price," and joined the church. I also held conversations with many from adjacent neighborhoods, who uttered in melting tones the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us." After the meeting was dismissed, and the great congregation from the country retired, I was prevailed on by the earnest entreaty of many of the citizens of the town to preach that night. The ball room in the third story of Mr. Berry's large Hotel was procured and fitted out; I took my stand on the platform erected for the orchestra, and instead of giving them music after which to run the giddy dance, I told the 'story of the Cross,' which was so attended by Divine influence that many were "cut to the heart" and presented themselves as mourners, and many "shouted for joy." It was a strange exercise and a strange result for one night's meeting in a ball room; four professed religion and six joined the church.

I next attended a camp-meeting at Rutersville. It was the first ever held there. Forty acres of ground have been appropriated by the proprietors of the town to the church as a perpetual camp-ground. It is intended that this place shall be the central rallying point for Methodism in Texas. I had the honor of preaching the first sermon. We had twelve tenters, who were but another name for hospitality,—one of these tenters, a widow lady, came forty miles to camp, and entertained much company. Woman last at the Cross and first at the Tomb, ever has, and ever will be, distinguished for ardent love, and untiring zeal in the cause of Christ, whose word has her affections.—Notwithstanding the weather was unfavorable and the tents uncomfortable, the meeting went on with increasing interest—Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians, were seen mingling together as a band of brothers, and we had truly an era of good feeling; thirty-two professed religion and thirty-five joined the church. On Monday of the meeting we held an anniversary of the Texas Missionary Society. Rev. W. K. Allen, of the Presbyterian Church, and myself, addressed the meeting, and though the congregation did not exceed two hundred persons, we lifted a collection of $700; beat this in the States if you can.

Early in October I reached the city of Austin, the capitol of the Republic, than which the burning eye of day looks not on a more lovely spot in all his journey from the east to the west. It is springing up as by magic and filling with a choice population. The first lot was sold on the 1st of August last, and I presume there are now between three and four hundred houses and one thousand souls. The President's house and many others are fine houses. I had the distinguished honor of sounding the first gathering trump from our church in this city, organized our first society here, small at first, but three more than Noah saved in the Ark; yet, thank God, the number has increased, our march is onward. Liberal appropriations have been made by law to churches and schools.

Congress commenced on the 11th November last; elected two chaplains, and we had preaching thrice on Sabbath in the Senate Chamber, during the session. This land of outlaws has set an example that throws gospel favored Tennessee in a mortifying eclipse on this subject.

Not many of the members of Congress are professors of religion, yet they invoke its influence over the length and breadth of the land. That lone Star that arose amidst the gloom of war and revolution seems destined to wave in triumph and blend its rays with the Star of Bethlehem.

We had an interesting anniversary of the Texas Bible Society. Hon. D. G. Burnett, the Vice President of the Republic, is president of this Society. The President, Hon. John M. Hansford, Rev. C. Richardson and myself, addressed the meeting; some $500 was contributed.

Shortly after this we concluded to organize a Texas Sunday School of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Hon. James Webb, Attorney Gen'l. of the Republic, presided. I addressed the meeting and $150 was raised to buy books. Chief Justice Rusk, and Ex-President Houston became life members.

Just as the meeting was about to adjourn, sine die, Gen. Rusk moved that the meeting adjourned until next Sabbath, that further effort might be made in this laudable enterprise. His motion was seconded by Gen. Houston and prevailed. The next Sabbath we had a crowded house, and Gen. Rusk delivered an able address that breathed the spirit of lofty patriotism and philanthropy. Hear his concluding sentence and be it remembered this is the man that has filled the "measure of his country's glory," clothed his brow with the richest laurels of war, won for himself a civic wreath, and now wears the sacred Ermine that invests him with the highest civil office in the gift of his country. If I had the power I would inscribe it in characters of sunshine across the Heavens that the world might read it,—"I would rather have it said of me, when I have been gathered to the graves of my fathers, that I had thrown my influence into the scale of virtue, and acted as a conservative to the morals and happiness of the rising generation, than have that halo of military glory to settle around my head, that followed a Napoleon to his exile and to his grave."

His able speech was followed by Mr. Reily, a celebrated lawyer, late of Hamilton, Ohio, in which he held forth in flowing numbers the fond recollection of childhood's first impressions—hence the necessity of impressing the truths of the Bible, with its elevated hopes, momentous sanctions and eternal retributions.

He was succeeded by Gen. Houston in his usual happy style, who urged upon every patriot to sustain these schools, for like the temples of grace they were open to the poor as well as to the rich.

Hon. D. S. Koufman, Speaker of the House of Representatives, then introduced a resolution that all persons present should become life members by the payment of $10, which was unanimously adopted.

With these facts, are we obnoxious to the charge so rife against us? Certainly not.—We have a Bible, Missionary, Sunday School, Temperance, and a Philanthrophic and Patriotic Society, and our leading and most talented men found in their advocacy.

Take the population of Texas, in any portion thro' which I have travelled, and seven-tenths will be pronounced good citizens in any country; the remainder are needed here, and have their appropriate place, which they generally fill; they are the pioneers and serve as a cordon of posts for the settlements. All things considered, this is the most inviting gospel field, in my estimation, on earth. Every good seed here sown will germinate in a thousand benevolent actions.

Here is more intelligence and enterprise than can be found in any new country,—in a word, the best materials out of which to organize good society on earth. Nothing is wanting but the moddling hands of a few master spirits, attended with the blessing of Heaven, to make it,

"A land, of every land the pride, Beloved by Heaven, o'er all the world beside."

It is also, the most inviting country in a natural point of view. The fertility and variety of its soil. Its soft, balmy, salubrious atmosphere. Its unequalled and perpetual range. Its minerals. Its navigation and convenience to trade with the world, extensive and unicebound coast, and then the cheapness of her soil, all taken into the account, will certainly make it one of the most desirable countries on earth. Texas is in her infancy, only four years old. But like young Hercules, a giant in her cradle. If so much has been accomplished in four years; what may be expected in ten. MARTIN CLARK.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A lady who was in the habit of spending much of her time in the society of her neighbors, happened one day to be taken suddenly ill, and sent her husband in great haste for the physician.—The husband ran a few rods, but sood returned, exclaiming, "My dear, where shall I find you when I get back?"

ANTIDOTE AGAINST MARRIAGE.—Jog says that if a man feels very much like getting married, yet imagines that he ought not to, the best remedy he knows of is, to help one of his neighbors move a house full of furniture; borrow about nine of his children for three days, and hear them cry. If that fail, build up a fire of damp wood, and when the smoke is the thickest, hire a woman to scold him about four hours. If he can stand all these, he'd better get married the next day—give his wife the pants, and be the 'silent partner' in the great firm of matrimony. We think the remedy is severe, but as every man is liable to those things after he yokes himself, it would do no harm to try it before.

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.—The following beautiful extract is from Gallagher's Hesperian, a monthly publication issued in Cincinnati, Ohio.

"Young womanhood! 'the sweet moon on the horizon's verge,' a thought matured, but not uttered; a conception warm and glowing, yet not embodied—the rich halo which precedes the rising sun—the rosy down that bespeaks the ripening peach—a flower—

"A flower which is not quite a flower, Yet is no more a bud."

Upon this, the Sunday News makes the following capital parody:

"Young womanhood! molasses touched with a little brimstone—spread on bread not buttered—a being all joints and angles not filled out—an unformed form, deformed by stays—a pallid thing that loves the ripening peach—a young woman—

"A woman which is not quite woman, Yet something more, nor gal."

COMMON ABSURDITIES.—To ask a tradesman if the commodity he offers to sell you is of the first quality.

To suppose you please your visiter by showing your infant child to him.

To tell a man of whom you wish to borrow money that you are in want of it.

To suppose that all criticisms are written by critics.

To ask a market woman if her eggs are fresh.

To immure a man in prison who owes you money and has no means of paying it except by his industry.

To suppose the cider which you buy at two dollars a bottle is champaigne.

For a monkey to suppose when he returns from his foreign travels sensible people will take him for a lion.

For an author to denounce the age as illiterate because his book is unsaleable.

To suppose all those who style themselves 'professors' to be learned men.

To commence a dunning letter with 'My dear sir,' and end it with 'Your most obedient, humble servant.'

To occupy the attention of a dinner party with anecdotes relating to yourself.

To advise a self-conceited friend to abandon a foolish undertaking.

To eat four courses in seven minutes and complain of indigestion afterwards.

Telling your wife, when you go home at one o'clock in the morning, that you have been at your office writing.

To suppose a living may be obtained by writing for periodicals.—N. Y. Mir.

SENSIBILITY TO MUSIC.—The published fact of the female who died from hearing too much music, we do not imagine to be well known in this country; we therefore give a sketch of it, taken from the "Surgical Repertory" of Turin; A woman, twenty-eight years of age, who had never left her village or heard a concert, was present at a three days fete in 1834, and dancing was carried on to the sounds of a brilliant orchestra. She entered into the amusement with ardor and was delighted; but the fete once finished she could not get rid of the impression which the music had made on her. Whether she ate, drank, walked, sat still, lay down, she was occupied; the different airs which she had heard were always present, and succeeded each other in the same order as that in which they were executed. Sleep was out of the question and the whole body being deranged in consequence of this, medical art was called in, but nothing availed, and in six months the person died, without having for one moment lost the strange sensation; even in her last moments she heard the great violin give some discordant notes, when holding her head with both hands she cried, "Oh! what a false note—it tears my head." We have heard another instance of this in an aged person, who, from the year 1829, has the greatest difficulty in going to sleep, because he every evening feels an irresistible desire to hear an air which belongs to the mountains of Auvergne. He tried reading aloud, thinking deeply, and several other means, to get rid of it, but it is of no use—he is invariably forced, mechanically, to utter the words in the idiom of Auvergne. We ourselves have seen the most alarming effects produced upon children by music to which they were unaccustomed, and fevers ensue in consequence.

THE END OF GREAT MEN.—Happening to cast my eye upon a printed page of miniature portraits, the personages who occupied the four most conspicuous places were Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar, and Bonaparte, I had seen the same unnumbered times before, but never did the same sensations arise in my bosom as my mind hastily glanced over their several histories.

Alexander, after having climbed the dizzy heights of his ambition, and with his temples bound with chaplets dipped in the blood of countless nations, looked down upon a conquered world, and wept that there was not another one for him to conquer, set a city on fire, and died in a scene of debauch.

Hannibal, after having to the astonishment and consternation of Rome, passed the Alps; after having put to flight the armies of this mistress of the world, and stripped three bushels of gold rings from the fingers of her slaughtered knights, and made her very foundations quake—fled from his country, being hated by those who once exultingly united his name to that of their god, and called him Hannibal—died at last by poison, administered by his own hands, unlamented and unwept, in a foreign land.

Cæsar, after having conquered eight hundred cities, and dyed his garments in the blood of one million of his foes, after having pursued to death the only rival he had on earth, was miserably assassinated by those he considered his nearest friends and in that very place, the attainment of which had been his greatest ambition.

Bonaparte, whose mandate kings and popes obeyed, after having filled the earth with the terror of his name, after having deluged it with tears and blood, and clothed the world with sackcloth, closed his days in lonely banishment, almost literally exiled from the world, yet where he could sometimes see his country's banner waving over the deep, but which could not or would not bring him aid.

Thus four men who, from the peculiar situation of their portraits, seemed to stand as the representatives of all those whom the world calls great; those four, who, each in turn made the earth tremble to its very centre by their simple tread, severally died—one by intoxication; or, as some suppose by poison mingled in his wine—one a suicide—one murdered by his friends—and one in lonely exile. How are the mighty fallen!

POLITENESS.—The following anecdote is related by Mr. Walker in his amusing publication, "The Original," as affording a fine instance of the value of politeness, even in circumstances where it could not be expected to produce a personal advantage:—

"An Englishman, making the grand tour towards the middle of the last century, when travelers were more objects of attention than at present, on arriving at Turin sauntered out to see the place.—He happened to meet a regiment of infantry returning from parade; and taking a position to see it pass, a young captain, evidently desirous to make a display before the stranger, in crossing the numerous water courses with which the city is intersected, missed his footing and in trying to save himself lost his hat. The exhibition was truly unfortunate; the spectators laughed and looked at the Englishman, expecting him to laugh too. On the contrary, he not only retained his composure, but promptly advanced to where the hat had rolled, and taking it up, presented it with an air of unaffected kindness to its confused owner. The officer received it with a blush of surprise and gratitude, and hurried to join his company. There was a murmur of applause, and the stranger passed.

"Though the scene of a moment, and without a word spoken it touched every heart, not with admiration for a mere display of politeness, but a warmer feeling, for a proof of that true charity 'which never faileth.' On the regiment being dismissed, the captain, who was a young man of consideration, in glowing terms related the circumstances to the colonel; who immediately mentioned it to the general in command; and when the Englishman returned to his hotel an aid-de-camp waited to request his company at dinner at head-quarters. In the evening he was carried to court, at that time, as Lord Chesterfield tells us, the most brilliant court in Europe, & was received with particular attention. Of course, during his stay at Turin, he was invited every where and on his departure, he was loaded with letters of introduction to the different States of Italy. Thus, a private gentleman, of moderate means, by a graceful impulse of christian feeling was enable to travel through a foreign country,—then of the highest interest for its society, as well as for the charms it still possesses, with more real distinction and advantages than can be derived from the mere circumstances of birth and fortune, even the most splendid."

WESTERN RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

WEDNESDAY, ... APRIL 29, 1840.

It is known to our readers generally, that an effort was made, on the part of the friends of order, to procure, at the last session of the Legislature of this State, the passage of a Law which would protect, more effectually, the religious community from disturbances, at their public meetings, by a worthless and unprincipled set of hucksters and pedlers. A bill to promote that object passed the House, but was defeated in the Senate. The following is the Report of the Senate's committee, on the subject:

From the Ohio Statesman.

REPORT OF MR. GLOVER.

The select committee, to which was referred the petition of one hundred citizens of Scioto county, asking for the passage of House Bill, No. 123, have had the same under consideration, and now ask leave to make the following report:

The Bill contemplated in the petition, proposes to create a special jurisdiction, over an area of near sixteen square miles, for the protection of religious societies, by fining and imprisoning any person who shall expose or offer for sale any spirituous liquors, cider or beer, or goods, wares or merchandise of any description, whithin the above area or district of country.

The above Bill further proposes, to take from the lawful owner, by forfeiture, all such goods, wares, merchandise or liquors, as may be so exposed for sale, within the above named bounds. These are the prominent features of the Bill as it passed the House; and to this Bill does the following portion of the memorial directly point. "Your memorialists, therefore, pray that the Bill granting further protection to religious societies, which has already passed the House of Representatives, and is now pending before the Senate, may become a law."

The provisions of this Bill differ from the enactment now in force on that subject, mainly in a four fold extension of the bounds of jurisdiction, (reaching from an area of 4 to near 16 miles) and in making a confiscation of all such goods as may be offered for sale.

Your committee is of opinion that there is no country on the face of the globe, where religious liberty is as wide spread and boundless, as in our own happy land.

It was expressly to avoid the tyranny and oppression of the old world that our fathers sought the peace and quiet of the wilderness, where they might feel and know "that all men are born free, equal and independent; and have certain natural, inherent and inalienable rights, amongst which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety." To sustain and carry out these views, it is expressly declared in our first compact, "that all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of conscience; that no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the RIGHTS of conscience; that no man shall be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; and that no preference shall ever be given, by law, to any religious society or mode of worship; and no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office of trust or profit." Add to this the protection granted in the law of 1831, which provides for fine and imprisonment, without presentment or indictment, notwithstanding the sacred pledge, "that the right of trial by jury shall be inviolate," and you have a bulwark of protection, made at the expense of our constitution. Shall we go still farther? Shall that sacred instrument become a dead letter, by engrafting a part of the "blue laws of Connecticut" in our code? (a confiscation of property for certain offences.) Shall we attach the same punishment for selling a glass of cider, that we do for theft or forgery? Shall we incarcerate in prison an American citizen for selling a water-mellon? Are we not told in the constitution, that "when the same undistinguished severity is exerted against all offences, the people are led to forget the real distinction in the crimes themselves, and to commit the most flagrant, with as little compunction as they do the slightest offences. For the same reasons, a multitude of sanguinary laws are both impolitic and unjust; the true design of all punishment being to reform, not to exterminate mankind."

It has been justly remarked, by a great and good man, that "when we undertake to be God's avenger, we become demons;" "driven by the frenzy of religious zeal, we lose all gentler feelings—forget the most sacred precepts of our creed, and become ferocious and unrelenting." A warm friend to our American institutions, has justly remarked, that "in our individual character, we all entertain opinions, and pursue a corresponding practice, upon the subject of religion." However diversified these may be, we all harmonize as citizens, while each is willing that the other shall enjoy the same liberty that he claims for himself. But in our representative character, our individual character is lost. The individual acts for himself—the representative for his constituents. He is chosen to represent their political, not their religious views—to guard the rights of man; not to restrict the rights of conscience.

"The history of the world furnishes the melancholy demonstration, that the disposition of one man, to coerce the religious homage of another, springs from an unchastened ambition, rather than a sincere devotion to any religion. The principles of our government do not recognize in the majority, any authority over the minority, except in matters which regard the conduct of man to his fellow man."

From the earliest period of time, religious teachers have obtained great ascendency over the minds of the people; and in every nation, ancient or modern, whether Pagan, Mahommedan, or Christian, have succeeded in the incorporation of their religious tenents, with the political institutions of their country. The Persian idols, the Grecian oracles, the Roman auguries, and the modern priesthood of Europe, have all, in their turn, been the subjects of popular adulation, and the agents of political deception. If the bill, recommended by the memorial, should be adopted, it would be difficult for human sagacity to foresee, how rapid would be the succession, or how numerous the train of measures which might follow, involving the most sacred rights of all—the rights of conscience.

"Religious zeal enlists the strongest prejudices of the human mind; and when misdirected, excites the worst passions of our nature, under the delusive pretext of doing God's service. Nothing so infuriates the heart, to deeds of rapine and blood; nothing is so incessant in its toils, so presevering in its determinations, so appalling in its course, or so dangerous in its consequences."

"The equality of rights secured by the constitution, may bid defiance to mere political tyrants; but the robe of sanctity too often glitters to deceive."

Your committee adopt the above views with an eye single to the responsibility, and would further add, that "the representative who would violate these principles, would lose his delegated character, and forfeit the confidence of his constituents." There are other reasons which have their due weight with our committee, in opposing the passage of this bill.

The Rev. Wm. Herr, a respectable minister of that church most interested in the passage of this bill, has conversed freely with your committee, on the merits and demerits of the above named bill, and has expressed a desire that it should not become a law. It was inexpedient at this time, and he desired that your committee would oppose it. In furtherance of this object, Mr. Herr wrote the following letter:

"Honorable Senator Tod:

"DEAR SIR:—Since my interview with you, I have had some time to reflect on the provisions of the bill for the protection of religious meetings, and also conversed with an aged friend on the subject, and we both concur in the opinion, that, on the whole, it would be best for the Legislature, at present, to take no further action in the premises. Some of the provisions of the act are exceedingly objectionable, not only to myself, but also, if I know the feelings of the church, must be to the great body of our people. I refer now to the penalty of imprisonment.

"We wish not revenge; nor do we seek to impose degradation on any of our fellow citizens, and unless we can be, as a religious body, protected in some other way, we had rather that a law, embodying such provisions, would not pass. Again, the process by which the offender is to be reached, seems rather tedious, and so far as its execution is concerned, will prove a perfect nullity. Did time and circumstances permit, I might enter into a detail, but let me close by saying, that, as the bill is now on the table, it is preferred that it should remain there. I thank you, sir, for the interest you manifest in behalf of the church, of which I am an unworthy member.

In haste, respectfully yours,

WM. HERR.

Wednesday, March 11, 1840.

Your committee are satisfied that the opinions expressed in the above letter, spring from a good heart, and that the feeling and humane author, in all probability had his attention especially drawn to that part of the bill, which proposes to take from the unsuspecting farmer or tradesman, his wagon and horses for selling a glass of cider or water-mellon. Nothing short of a love for humanity, and respect for the constitution of our country, could have dictated the above sentiments. Your committee is satisfied, that had his constituents examined the bill in detail, as did the Rev. Mr. Herr, they would have arrived at the same conclusion. Being possessed, as he is, of a sound heart and an innate love for the republican institutions of our country.

That the memorial is the offspring of a letter, written by the Rev. Mr. Herr, of Columbus, to the Rev. Mr. Simmons, of Portsmouth, is not a matter for the investigation of this committee; nor is it our duty to analyze the nice difference of feeling that governed the reverend gentleman when writing these several communications. It is enough to know, that when conversing with your committee, he spoke against the passage of the law—when writing to the Senator from Trumbull, he justly repudiated the provisions of the bill, that when the instructions were necessary from Scioto, he must have spoken in favor of it.

After a minute investigation of this subject, your committee is of opinion, that the laws now on this subject, are sufficiently severe; therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

As a general reply to this farrago we will give the statutory provisions of Pennsylvania, protecting religious worships,—a State of much intelligence and longer experience than ours, as taken from a digest of her laws: fifth edition, p. 868.

ACT OF APRIL 2D, 1822. 7. SMITH, P. 650.

An Act to prevent the disturbance of meetings, held for the purpose of religious worship.

5. SECTION I. From and after the passing of this act, it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to erect, place, or have any booth, stall, tent, carriage, boat or vessel, or any other place whatever, for the purpose or use of selling, giving or otherwise disposing of any kind of articles of traffic, spirituous liquors, wine, porter, beer, cider or any other fermented, mixed or strong drink, (excepting as hereinafter excepted) within three miles of any place of religious worship in this State, during the time of holding any meeting for religious worship at such place.

6. SEC. II. If any person or persons shall or do violate this act by erecting, fixing, or having any booth, stall, tent, carriage, boat or vessel, or other place for the purpose or use aforesaid, or by selling, bartering, giving or otherwise disposing of any kind of articles of traffic, spirituous liquors, wine, porter, beer, cider or other fermented, mixed or strong drink, in, at or about any such booth, stall, tent, carriage, boat or vessel, or any place whatever, prepared or used for the purposes aforesaid, within three miles of any place of religious worship, during the time of holding any meeting for religious worship at such place, the person or persons so offending, shall first be informed of his, her or their violation of this act, and shall be warned by any Justice of the Peace, Constable, or two free-holders of the county where the offence is, or shall have been committed, to desist from such offence, and to remove such booth, stall, tent, carriage, boat, vessel or other thing, together with all such articles of traffic, spirituous liquors, wine, porter, beer, cider or other strong drink, belonging to, or in the possession of the person or persons so offending, and if such person or persons, on receiving such information and warning, shall forthwith cease to offend against this act, and shall remove as aforesaid at least three miles from such place of religious worship, then no further proceedings under this act shall be had against such person or persons; but if such person or persons shall refuse or neglect, immediately to remove as aforesaid, when informed and warned as aforesaid, then all the said articles of traffic, spirituous liquors, wine, porter, beer, cider and other fermented, mixed and strong drink, and all the vessels, chests and other things containing the same, together with such booth, stall, tent, carriage, boat or vessel, or other place prepared and used for the purpose aforesaid, shall be, and are hereby declared to be forfeited, and it shall be lawful for any Justice of the Peace and Constable with two free-holders of the county, to seize and take possession of all or any part of the said forfeited articles and liquors, together with such booth, stall, tent and carriage, boat or vessel, and at any time within ten days after, to advertise and sell the same, and after deducting and paying the necessary and lawful expenses of such seizure and sale, the residue of the proceeds of such sale or sales shall be paid to the overseers of the poor in the township for the use of the poor of the county, where the support of the poor is a county charge, and where it is a township charge to the poor of the township where such offence shall have been committed.

7. SEC. III. Nothing in this act shall be taken or construed so as to affect any licensed tavern keeper, in his or her ordinary and lawful business, at his or her usual place of residence, specified in his or her license, nor shall it be so taken and construed as to effect any merchant, shopkeeper, farmer, mechanic or other person in the usual and lawful transactions of his, her or their ordinary concerns and business, in their usual place of doing such business, nor shall it be so taken, construed or understood, as to affect any person or persons who shall have a permit in writing, from the person or persons having the oversight, charge and management of any such meeting, to sell bread and other necessary articles of food for man and beast: Provided, The conduct of persons attending such meeting shall accord with the lawful rules and regulations of such meeting, and the property of such persons attending such meetings be not of the description forbidden by this act.

8. SEC. IV. If any suit or action shall be brought against any person or persons for doing or causing to be done any thing in pursuance of the act according to the provisions thereof, the defendant or defendants may plead the general issue and give the special matter under this act in evidence, and if in such suit or action a verdict and judgment shall be given for the defendant or defendants, or the plaintiff shall become nonsuited or discontinue his action, the defendant or defendants shall have and recover double cost of suit.

SEC. V. [Repeals act of 1st April, 1811. 5, Smith, p. 257.]

9. SEC. VI. From and after the passage of this act, if any person or persons shall be guilty of disturbing any congregation, society or meeting, assembled for the purpose of religious worship, by blowing horns or trumpets, shooting or firing guns, or by any other means, with intent to disturb or interrupt the worship or devotion of said congregation, society or meeting, he or they, on conviction, before any Judge, Justice of the Peace or Alderman of the proper city or county, wherein the offence shall be committed, shall pay a fine not less than one dollar nor more than five dollars, for the use of the poor of the city, borough or township wherein the offence shall be committed, and where there are no poor, it shall be paid to the supervisors of the township for the improvement of the highways.

Act of 15th April, 1835. Pamph. p. 336.

"An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to prevent the disturbance of meetings held for the purpose of religious worship,' passed the second day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two."

"10. SEC. I. If any person or persons convicted under the sixth section of this Act, to which this is a supplement, shall refuse or neglect to satisfy the fine imposed on him, her or them, and goods and chattles cannot be found whereof to levy the same, the said person or persons so convicted shall be committed to the jail of the proper county for a term not exceeding five days."

Now, here is an act "erecting a special jurisdiction over an erea" more than twice as large as that contemplated in the rejected bill, and with provisions as strong, if not much stronger, answering, in its practical operations, to all intents and purposes, the object of its adoption; and, although it has been in existence for 18 years, we have never heard one syllable of complaint about its being made the instrument of oppression or tyranny. Nay, it was never once supposed by any enlightened citizen of Pennsylvania, that these statutes had any resemblance to the "blue laws of Connecticut." It would seem that it takes more discerning men than they, to discover this similarity.

As it respects imprisonment, upon which so much stress is laid in the Report, we are of opinion that the law before us is correct in not requiring it, where there is property to pay the penalty. But how many worthless beings are there, who can blow horns, shoot their guns, or yell like savages, so as to disturb the quietude of the worship of God, and when you fine them, they have not one cent to pay the forfeit, and will just laugh at you and go the next minute and do the same thing over again? Yes, and more important men,—men who have property to hold them responsible to the laws, can hire such worthless wretches as these, for a draught of whiskey, to do any dirty work for them. Dispense with imprisonment and you have no way to check them; but it would be equal to a license to all such to do just as they please. It is worthy of note, as we discover from the dates of the statute and amendment above, that the State of Pennsylvania tried their law for the protection of religious worship, thirteen years before they added the penalty of imprisonment. They found without this, there was a worthless class of the community upon which you could lay no other restraint, whatever. Can these be the men who so wonderfully interest the sympathies of the committee?

O! but says Dr. Glover "shall we attach the same punishment to selling a glass of cider that we do for theft or robbery? Shall we incarcerate in prison an American citizen for selling a water-mellon?" Wonderful tyranny this!—We did not see the bill, rejected by the Senate, in any of its stages. But we take it for granted from the gentleman's reasonings, that it called for a forfeiture of the property on sale, and fine and imprisonment where the fine was not discharged. If this be correct, and if it were the ground of his objection, why did he not so amend the bill as to do away fine and imprisonment, both, when there was a forfeiture of property? Such a law would be, so far as this particular is concerned, like the Pennsylvania law before us, and would doubtless have given general satisfaction. But we are afraid the true secret is, that the Dr. has a great affinity for that class against which the proposed law was designed to operate, and that he is merely seeking excuses to shield his particular friends.

As it respects what the Dr. says about becoming "God's avenger," "one man's" "coercing the religious homage of an other," "religious teachers" "gaining ascendency over the minds of the people," "the Persian idols, the Grecian oracles, the Roman augeries, and the modern priesthood of Europe," &c. &c. all this has about as little to do with the subject as if he had given the history of Sinbad the Sailor, or recited the Sermon of Breckenridge's Scotchman who pracht up and down the Scriptures.

The state of the question is this,—not that the petitioners wish to coerce the religious opinions of the public, to exert an undue influence over the people, or to become God's avengers,—but shall they be protected, while peaceably worshipping their God, from disturbance and oppression on the part of a worthless class of spectators, who make merchandize of the gospel, and promote their private interests at the expense of religion, and the order and morality of the community. This is the question at issue.

All who are in the practice of holding protracted meetings in the grove, are interested in the proposed law. Among whom are the Episcopal and Protestant Methodists, the United Brethren, the Albrights, the Winebreners, the New Lights, so called, and occasionally the Presbyterians; add to these, the Baptist Associations, for want of suitable houses, are often held in the woods, and have frequently been made the subject of this kind of annoyance. The disturbances of which the petitioners complain have existed for more than thirty years, and because of the total inefficacy of the existing laws to suppress them, the aggressors have been annually gaining confidence in their ability to carry on their oppressive speculations with impunity, and are becoming more bold and insolent in their practices. If we add to this the spirit of mobocracy and outlawry which has been the order of the day for some years, which has a tendency to encourage every violation of law, we can account for the fact that latterly these disturbances have become of such an aggravating character as to raise at last the slumbering indignation of these very numerous classes of the community, who are left without adequate protection by law, and is inducing them to call on the Legislature to throw its shield around them.—And instead of there being only one hundred, as the report would seem Jesuitically to indicate, there were thousands, from every part of the State, who sent up their petitions to the last Legislature asking for protection. And we can assure the reader, that there is that kind of feeling abroad, at the present, which will induce legislators ultimately to pay attention to this matter. There is not a class of citizens that have been more imposed on by a worthless set of vagabonds, and who have borne it longer than the petitioners. But there is a certain point beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue and degenerates into meanness. That point is now approached and re-action is taking place.

But the report says,—"after minute investigation of this subject, your committee is of opinion, that the laws now on this subject, are sufficiently severe," &c. When the reader recollects who are the principal disturbers at these protracted meetings, he will be able to see the ability with which this committee have made their "minute investigations." The greatest disturbers, in fact, of these public meetings are the cake and "mellon" men, against whom there is not even the vestige of a law. The cider and grog men, by hard fighting, may by kept a mile distance, but it is usually such a task, from the imbecility of the law, that few will engage in the enterprize. But the victuallers,—the cake and cheese men, who humanely come to accommodate the people, if they can get the privilege of a land holder to erect their booth, which can generally be done, particularly as they never intend any harm.—These will quarter themselves within sight or hearing of the stand, erect their fires, which become a place of resort for the drunken, dissipated and profane. These will go off to the towns, taverns or shanties and get their bottles replenished with spirits, and then return to these victualling establishments, as they are nearest head quarters, and will prowl around all night, cursing, swearing, fighting and howling, in a manner highly offensive to the peaceable worshippers, and greatly injurious to the morals of the community. We have witnessed instances where the managers of such meetings have had the control over the land in the vicinity so as to keep off these cake and "mellon" men, that all the rowdies and ruffians would repair to the grogeries a mile distant and there remain; and though from the scenes frequently exhibited at these places you would suppose you were in the very subburbs of hell, all would be quiet and orderly at the meeting. Besides there is, in reality, notwithstanding all their fair pretensions, not a more faithless and worthless set of villians in the world than these said victuallers. You cannot believe a word they say. They will promise you most faithfully to keep order and sell nothing but eatables, at the same time they will have spirits behind the curtain, and if they could make one dollar by it, they would countenance a disorder that would destroy the meeting. A long and intimate acquaintance with their history enables us to speak advisedly upon this subject. This view shews what confidence is to be put in the report under notice, which professes to have so "minutely" examined the "subject." It does not even seem to know what is the matter.

The report proceeds mainly on the principle of mercy; its author does not seem yet to have learned that even "a God all mercy would be a God unjust," much more a legislative body.—Great lenity is to be shewn the "cider" and "mellon" men. Dear creatures, they are certainly worthy of the fostering care of Dr. Glover. Perhaps it was mainly to those he was indebted for his seat in the halls of legislation, and he wishes to be faithful to his constituents at least.—But these religionists—these fanatics—these camp-meeting enthusiasts are not worthy the attention of this legislative son of Esculapius.—Though they are a law abiding people, and tho' the constitution does guarantee to them the right to peaceably worship God as they think proper. Yet, what of all this? the Dr. might take into his head to go to camp-meeting about election time, and if the weather should be a little warmish, he might wish to refresh himself with a "water-mellon" or a glass of "cider," and it would be entirely out of the question to require him to go two miles for these accommodations.—He would rather have them a little nearer head quarters; and though this might give unconstitutional disturbance to the worshippers of God, what does he care about that? Religion, it may be, is a mere matter of moonshine to him.

But, to us, the most sickening part of this report is the use that is made of the Rev. Wm. Herr. His letter, to the committee, which is paraded in the rear of the report with so much confidence, was evidently sucked out of him, by flattering his vanity, with a view, no doubt, to shield the committee from the indignation of the petitioners. How far it may have this effect we cannot say, for it is probably not generally known, that Mr. Herr is comparatively young and a man of limited powers and experience, whose opinion, in a matter of this kind, is entitled to but little weight. But, to see dignified legislators stooping to such things as this, is humiliating indeed. We cannot even think of it without feeling as though we had within us the contents of an apothecary shop.

Our connexion with these public meetings has given us an opportunity to know what statutory provisions were necessary for their protection. And it is our opinion that the law of Pennsylvania, on that subject, is as perfect as human wisdom can devise. While it strictly guards against every unnecessary severity, imprisoning none but those on whom it could lay no other restraint whatever, it is nevertheless sufficiently energetic to answer the purposes of its enactment, and to preserve morality and good order. In the first place this law forfeits all goods on sale, within three miles of any place of worship, if the owners do not desist from selling, after being warned to do so; without this the practices complained of could never be suppressed, for the owners of the goods could always employ some irresponsible worthless fellows to sell for them, and thus trample on any other law provisions with impunity. But where there are goods to be forfeited there is no imprisonment, neither should there be, because that is itself a sufficient check, which is all any good man should call for. Secondly; it exempts every case that should be exempted, and makes a provision for the supply of food for man and horse in a way that disturbances can be prevented. Thirdly; it imposes a penalty on any one who will commence a vexatious prosecution under its provisions. Fourth and lastly; it provides for imprisonment in such cases only where it can lay no other restraint. Now, if our legislative dignatories were not capable, themselves, of framing a bill which would answer the object of the petitioners, without being too severe,—why did they not go to the Pennsylvania statute book and copy this act? They could not better have suited their memorialists.

Suffer us here to add, though we should wander awhile from the subject, that truth compells us to say, that the more we become acquainted with the institutions of Pennsylvania, the greater is our confidence in the wisdom and integrity of her public functionaries, and the higher she stands in our estimation in a comparison with other States. At the same time she promptly puts her veto on the demands of privileged arrogance, she attends to the wants, and extends her fostering care to her humblest citizens. For example, some eighteen years ago, the Methodists, when comparatively a feeble people, asked her Legislature to protect them from disturbance at their public meetings, and without any hesitancy she gave them the statute before us. Some eight years since, after this church had gained a powerful accession to her strength, her bishops and privileged clergy appear in her courts to demand the surrender, on the part of her citizens, of some 40 or $50,000 worth of meeting house property in the city of Pittsburgh, whose money paid for it, and whom they wished to be dispossessed on the grounds of the claims of their disciplinary TRUST DEED. To whom the court in substance responded—"No, gentlemen! we have examined your DEED and find it conveys an illegal TRUST;—a trust unknown to the laws of Pennsylvania. Your General Conference, to whose control this property is made subject in this deed, is composed of bishops and ministers, residents of other States, and the laws of Pennsylvania do not permit foreigners, by artful conveyances, to wrest away the property of her citizens who may happen to differ from them in subtle points of faith or abstract notions of ecclesiastical polity. The property is with the people whose money paid for it, your deed to the contrary notwithstanding, for the benefit of themselves and their children." After this failure to establish their claims in the courts of Pennsylvania, on the part of the Episcopal Methodist clergy, they paraded a host of petitions asking the Legislature to legalize their claim to the property; but that body reported against the prayer of the petitioners. This report holds the following language:

"The Supreme Court has declared, that the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, is not such a religious society as is recognized by the Act of Assembly of 1730–31; and to incorporate the Conference, composed entirely of the clergy, a great portion of whom do not reside in the State, and to confer on it the whole control of all the churches and grounds in possession of the different congregations, (especially while the members who compose the Methodist society are now divided on this and other subjects,) would be injudicious if not unconstitutional.

But how has our State acted under similar circumstances? In reference to the protection of religious meetings; the Senate respectfully lays the bill for that purpose on the table, leaving a large portion of quiet and peaceable citizens still exposed to the disturbances of a set of unprincipled spectators and ruffians, and then bores the petitioners by politely intimating that what they ask is in substance a re-enactment of the "blue laws of Connecticut." And the Supreme Court of Ohio, with John C. Wright at their head, "in Muskingum, Oct. Term 1831," three of the Judges being on the bench, all agreed in giving such an opinion of the laws as puts the general conference of itinerant preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in possession of all the church property of this State, amounting probably in value at this time to near $1,000,000, and thereby virtually driving out all the laity of the church from the meeting houses and parsonages, erected with their own money, for their own accommodation,—and did actually drive out of a meeting house in this neighborhood the men who principally built it. And we wish the reader to recollect, that the statute passed Jan. 3, 1825, on the enabling provisions of which the court predicated their verdict, is almost a copy of the Pennsylvania law of 1730–31 above alluded to. So that the two courts from similar statutes, arrive at different conclusions. One puts the general conference in possession of all the people's property, the other, notwithstanding a like authority, vetoes the claims of that body.

While we are upon this subject we shall name one matter that we think discreditable to the court in this case. This suit grew out of a controversy in the Methodist Episcopal Church with regard to limiting the powers of the itinerant ministry. When that body saw that their prerogatives, would, in all probability, be wrested from them, if the investigation was not suppressed, they determined to put an end to it by the expelling process; and when they expelled the people held on to their property. In this posture of affairs it became a matter of some moment, to the parties, to know whether the "Methodist E. Church in the United States" could hold property in this State; or in other words, whether the deed in the discipline was a legal trust deed. In order to ascertain this, the defendants surrendered several other chances of success, and on an agreed state of facts submitted this main question to the court, with the understanding that their act was to be reported among the decisions of that tribunal. If it went in favor of the defendants, it having a general bearing, they expected to gain property, if against them they would gain an argument, and be able to appeal to the records for the facts. But no, in some 30 or 40 minutes after the case was brought before the court, involving all these immense interests, its mind was made up—its opinions delivered and pocketed and has never seen the public records that we can find. Thus, in a case, as plain as a sun beam (at least so Pennsylvania considered it) the court sacrifices the principles of justice, and abandons the weak to accommodate itself, it would seem, to a popular party, and then shrinks from the light by keeping its acts in the dark. It cannot say that the case was not of sufficient importance to be reported, for, it is doubtful if ever one involving a greater amount of property, or more important principles, was ever submitted to the consideration of this honorable body.

By reference to the Christian Advocate and Journal for August the 26th, 1831, it will be seen that the Episcopal Methodists, at their college in Augusta, Ky., "conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws" "upon the Hon. John C. Wright, Judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio," and that too at the very time this suit was pending before the Supreme Court. What effect such Jesuistry as this had, we leave the reader to judge. Solomon, however, tells us, "the gift perverteth judgment." But if the court had published their opinion, as we desired, and met their acts like men, in the light of day, we should have held a higher respect for them.

We wish here to call the attention of our democratic brethren to this Methodist Episcopal corporation. They have set about the work of limiting and reforming corporate establishments; whether in this they are doing right or wrong we intend to give no opinion, as our paper is not dedicated to party political questions. But, we ask, why is it that there is not a word said about this privileged order? The itinerant ministers of the M. E. Church have, in the United States, virtually, the absolute control over all church property, amounting, probably, in value from 40 to $50,000,000. By an artful trust deed, which not one of the laity to one hundred understands, they have it so secured that it can be taken from the people at pleasure, where the law does not interfere. Yea, and by the arrangements of the discipline, the ultimate control of all this property is in the bishops, so that if it were conveyed to them in fee simple, it is doubtful if it would any more increase their power and importance than it does under the present arrangement. And the Supreme Court of Ohio, in the case above, has legalized their claims, and thus given to a foreign body the right to wrest away at pleasure the property of the citizens of this State. But whether their decision is in their pocket or elsewhere we cannot say. Now, Dr. Glover appears to be so wonderfully afraid of the influence "of religious teachers," that he cannot grant a law, evidently called for, for the protection of the laity, for fear it would open the door "to a train of measures" which might "involve the sacred rights of all." Yet, he will set by and witness the arrogance of this spiritual corporation,—see it every day adding to its immense wealth, and weaving its net of entanglement around the people, but not a solitary word in opposition. He strains mightily at swallowing the gnat, but down goes the camel without even a wry face. Now if the democrats will will go to work and break loose the iron grasp that these clergy have on the people's property, and disband this corrupting aristocracy, who ever may censure them for so doing we can assure them that we will not.

We regret to be under the necessity of giving such views of the acts of our public functionaries. But as the constitution secures to us the freedom of investigation, we think it, on the whole, right to expose such doings according to the best of our ability. If this course were generally pursued it would tend to put our public officers more on their guard.

We have thrown out these facts and sentiments in haste and have not had time for suitable review; there may therefore be some things not so clearly stated as they ought to be, and consequently liable to mislead. Any thing of this kind we stand ready to correct. But the facts and sentiments here stated, as we design them to be understood, we are prepared to stand by.

The editor of the "Ohio Statesman," in his paper of the 27th ult., in directing our notice to the Report of the select committee of the Senate, holds the following language:

"We call the attention of the Western Recorder to the report of Dr. Glover, in this paper, touching the law to regulate religious meetings. The federalist have also shown the cloven foot in this matter. No one would go further than we would to protect religious societies in the peaceable enjoyment of their worship—we never saw the day that we did not abhor above all things, he that would interrupt any society in its religious duties, but we dislike also all attempts to establish an ecclesiastical despotism, under pretext of protecting the right of the church. In this country we must strike the proper medium."

Now, does our old friend Medary, (in the days of the "Farmer,") intend by this to say that the Methodists, and the friends of the bill are all "federalists?" If so would it not follow that the cake and "mellon" men, and their friends, must be the Democracts? However we are happy to inform our brother that there are two kinds of Methodists, and that we belong to the Democratic Methodists. As he is at the head of the Democratic political press in this State, so are we at the head of the Democratic Methodist press in the western country; and if he will attend to the "federal" party in the State we will try and attend to them in the Methodist church. So we will be co-workers in the good cause.

On the subject of camp meetings, we would remark, so far as we are personally concerned we would not care if they were dispensed with, particularly unless we could be allowed a law, sufficiently energetic to protect them. But a large majority of the Methodist people call for them, and on the principles of republicanism, of course, they are entitled to them. And that they are profitable to many we have no doubt.—Indeed, if it were not for the draw back, because of these disturbances, purely for the want of an efficient law, we should consider them very high sources of en-

ent. Such a large assembly, for the being entirely separate from the l, mingling in the worship of God, fails to excite a larger amount of ional and social feeling than ordina- ircumstances can call forth. We close by calling the attention of the r to the following extract from the of one who had no connexion with Methodists; and shall add that we ear testimony to the fidelity of his ription of the effects of a camp meet- scene.

Western Camp Meeting.—None, one who has seen, can imagine the est excited in a district of country, aps fifty miles in extent, by the ted approach of the time for a camp ing; and none but one who has seen, imagine how profoundly the preach- ave understood what produce effect how well they have practised upon Suppose the scene to be where the extensive excitements and the most uent camp meetings have been, du- the two past years, in one of the itiful and fertile valleys among the ntains of Tennessee. The notice has circulated two or three months. On appointed day, coaches, chaises, wag- carts, people on horseback, and mul- les travelling from a distance on foot, ons with provisions, mattrasses, tents, arrangements for the stay of a week, seen hurrying from every point to- ds the central point. It is in the st of a grove of those beautiful and trees, natural to the valleys of Ten- see, in its deepest verdure, and beside ring branch, for the requisite supply vater. "The ambitious and wealthy there, because in this region opinion ll powerful; and they are there, ei- to extend their influence, or that their ence may not be noted, to diminish it. irants for office are there, to election- and gain popularity. Vast numbers there from simple curiosty, and mere- o enjoy a spectacle. The young and beautiful are there, with mixed mo- s, which it were best not severely to tinize. Children are there, their ng eyes glistening with intense inter- of eager curiosity. The middle aged iers and mothers of families are there, h the sober views of people, whose ns in life are fixed, and waiting calm- to hear. Men and women of hoary rs are there, with such thoughts, it y be hoped as their years invite. Such the congregation consisting of thou- ds.

"A host of preachers of different de- minations are there, some in the earn- vigor and aspiring desires of youth, iting an opportunity for display: oth- , who have proclaimed the gospel, as grims of the cross from the remotest th of our vast country to the shores the Mexican gulf, and ready to utter words, the feelings, the experience, ich they have treasured up in a travel- g ministry for fifty years, and whose ents trembling with age, still more pressively than their words, announce, t they will soon travel and preach no re on earth, are there. Such are the achers.

"The line of tents is pitched: and the igious city grows up in a few hours der the trees, beside the stream.— mps are hung in lines among the nches—and the effect of their glare on the surrounding forest is as of mag-

The scenery of the most brilliant atre in the world is a painting only children compared with it. Mean- ne the multitudes with the highest ex- ement of social feeling added to the neral enthusiasm of expectation, pass om tent to tent, and interchange apos- lic greetings and embraces; and talk of ming solemnities. Their coffee and a are prepared, and their supper is fin- ed. By this time the moon, for they ke thought to appoint the meeting at a oper time of the moon, begins to show s disk above the dark summits of the ountains, and a few stars are seen glim- ering through the intervals of the nches. The whole constitutes a tem- e worthy of the grandeur of God. An d man in a dress of the quaintest sim- icity, ascends a platform, wipes the dust om his spectacles, and in a voice of sup- ressed emotion, gives out the hymn, of hich the whole assembled multitude can cite the words, and an air in which ev- y voice can join. We should deem oorly of the heart that would not thrill, s the song is heard, like the 'sound of any waters,' echoing among the hills nd mountains. Such are the scenes, the ssociations, and such the influence of xternal things upon a nature so fearful- and wonderfully constituted as ours, hat little effort is necessary on such a heme as religion, urged at such a place, nder such circumstances, to fill the heart nd the eyes. The hoary orator talks of od, of eternity, a judgment to come, and ll that is impressive beyond. He speaks f his experiences, his toils and travels, is persecutions and welcomes, and how many he has seen in hope, in peace and riumph, gathered to their fathers; and when he speaks of the short space that remains to him, his only regret is, that he can no more proclaim in the silence of death, the mercies of his crucified Re- deemer. There is no need of the studied rick of oratory, to produce in such a place the deepest movements of the heart. No wonder, as the speaker pauses to dash the moisture from his own eye, that the audience are dissolved in tears, or utter- ng the exclamations of penitence. Nor s it cause for admiration, that many who poised themselves on an estimation of higher intellect, and a nobler sensibility, than the crowd, catch the infectious feel- ing, and become women and children in their turn; and though they 'come to mock, remain to pray.'"—Flint.

THE RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE.

WEDNESDAY, ... APRIL 29, 1840.

The reply of Bro. Boyd, to the strictures upon him in our last number, is received, and shall appear in our next,—this paper being pre-occupied with other matter.

The prices of wheat and flour remain much the same as at our last quotations, except in Baltimore. Lyford of the 18th inst. states that some 2000 barrels were sold at 25 cents advance on former prices.

We make an apology for the long winded article on our second page on Dr. Glover's Report, and promise not to transgress, in this way, shortly, again. The law for the protection of religious meetings, was one that we took more interest in than any which came before the Legislature at its last session. We consider the disorders, at these public meetings, not only very inconvenient to the parties concerned, but highly discreditable to the character of the State. They are witnessed by scores of foreigners and strangers, who, from what they see exhibited on such occasions, form an estimate of our reputation very much to our disadvantage, as a community.—We ask the reader to lay it by for a wet day, and then, when at leisure, and not before, to give it a careful perusal.

We see in the New York papers, a number of very flattering notices of our statesman, Professos Bronson. The following is from the New Yorker:

"Professor Bronson.—Those who have heard this elocutionist do not need an invitation to go again; but many, who have recently heard him for the first time, have expressed great regret that they had not enjoyed that privilege before.—Others may need to be informed, that Professor Bronson has spent many years in mastering every principle of elocution, and has matured a system, of whose excellencies his own recitations are a splendid specimen. His hearers cannot be surprised at the flattering testimonials which have been so freely given him wherever he has spoken; but the improved voices of his pupils are the best certificates.

"A clergyman in this city, who lost his voice several years ago, has astonished his friends by the great improvement in his delivery since he has enjoyed Professor B's instruction.

"Clergymen and Sabbath School teachers will derive great benefit from his biblical readings on Saturday evening. Few can hear him read Judah's speech for Benjamin, or David's lamentation for Absalohi, without tears. His reading exemplifies his own definition of elocution,—'The art of reading with science and effect.' But each of your readers may go to the Tabernacle and become A Delighted Listener."

A fire occurred in Charleston, South Carolina, on the 16th inst., destroying property to the amount, of between $30 and 40,000.

The papers announce the death of the Hon. Hugh L. White, who recently resigned his seat in Congress. He died on the 10th inst. at his residence near Knoxville, Tennessee, in the 67th year of his age.

The Weather.—We have had a plentiful fall of rain since our last, and some very warm weather for April. It cleared up on Sabbath evening, and has turned cooler, but has done no damage to the fruit. The pasturage is well nigh a month in advance of what it was the two past seasons, at this time of the year.

China.—The Charleston Mercury, of the 20th inst. says that orders have been received, at the navy yard of that place, to fit for sea, soon as practicable, the frigate Constellation, and the sloops Concord and Preble. They are designed for the East India station, to relieve the squadron there.

The Jeffersonian.—This paper apologises for not publishing our reply to its attack upon us, on the ground of its suspension about the time; and that before it got under way again, the number containing our reply was lost. But states on condition that we forward an other copy it will publish. Now, we have no other copy without breaking our files.—We shall therefore have to take the will for the deed. It is true the editor rather impeached our "veracity" and "candor" but we presume he hardly meant as bad as he said.—Yes, Brother Cable, your "explanation is satisfactory."

ITEMS.

Nothing important from Washington. The prospect in relation to the Boundary question is pacific.—Bicknell.

The British Government is said to have in contemplation, a new loan of £12,000,000.

The embezzlement of Mr. Beverly Dabney from the Bank of Virginia is stated at $400,000.

Vicksburg stock which sold in this city a month ago as low as eight dollars was sold on Saturday for $20 a 21.—Bicknell.

Mr. Condy Raguet's treatise on Banks, has been translated into French, and is highly commended by several of the leading Parisian Journals.

The price of freight on the Boston and Providence Railroad, has been reduced from $5 to $3 per ton. The charge to passengers had been previously reduced from $2 to $1 50.

A letter states that the Legislature of Michigan has adjourned in a riotous and tumultuous manner, without making any appropriation for the public works of the State.

On Tuesday night, as the steamboat Swallow was on her way to New York, Jonathan Jordon, an Indian, and one of the Oneida delegation to wait upon the President of the United States, fell overboard and was drowned.

The price of the fare on the railroad from Boston to Dedham, (distance ten miles,) was reduced, a week or two since from 37½ cents to 25. Since the reduction, the weekly receipts of the road have nearly doubled.

The people of New Haven have voted an appropriation of $5000 for the ornamenting of their already beautiful burying-ground, on condition that an equal sum be raised by subscription among the citizens.

$20 counterfeit notes of the Bank of Illinois, are said to be in circulation.—They are dated August 1st, 1839, payable to J. C. Barber or bearer, and signed Jno. Marshall, President, and Jno. Siddall, Cashier. The engraving is poorly executed, and the paper inferior.

The Blood Hounds.—After a scent of fifteen days continuation, up the St. John's River, Florida, Col. Twiggs pronounces the blood hounds to be entirely useless; all attempts to make them take the trail proving unavailing. If this prove true, as a general rule, it is a bad speculation.

A daughter of Mr. A. D. Weatherwax of Sand Lake, about 9 years of age, while lighting a match last Saturday, was suffocated by its fumes, and although in a measure restored by cold water, which she continued to call for and swallow, she died in about two hours afterwards, and before medical aid could be obtained.

James Wood.—The Court of Oyer and Terminer, in Philadelphia, on Saturday last, ordered that James Wood be confined in prison until the Court designate another place; to remain in such custody as long as he shall continue of unsound mind, or until he shall be otherwise discharged according to law.

A man named Robert McBeath undertook to perform a surgical operation on one David Hunter, at St. John, N. B. a few days since, and through his ignorance killed his patient. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of man slaughter against him, and he was committed for trial therefor.

We state with pleasuae that all the Banks of Philadelphia, with the exception of the Bank of the United States, now pay out either their own notes or the notes of other Banks, when so requested, and in payment of cheques. This course was adopted within the last week, and we need scarcely add much to the satisfaction of the business community.—Bicknell.

The late Fire at Washington.—We regret to learn from the National Intelligencer, that the loss of the Messrs. Langtree and O'Sullivan by the recent destruction of their office by fire, will not fall short of $18,000. The Mayor of the city is engaged in taking the depositions of divers persons relative to the origin of the fire. The general impression is that it was the work of an incendiary.

Indian Troubles.—Much anxiety is expressed in Missouri on account of the predatory incursions of Indians into the north-west parts of that State. The U. S. troops at Fort Leavenworth number only about forty men, the rest having been called away by General Gaines, when he apprehended Cherokee disturbances. No violence beyond robbery had been committed, up to the 27th of March; and to that the Indians were driven by their impoverished condition.

A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, writing from Rio de Janeiro under date of 14th February; pays the following handsome compliment to the officers of the U. States frigate Indepence:

"The Independence is about leaving us, which makes us all quite sad. She takes with her the fairest set of officers, perhaps you ever saw. During their residence in this station, by their consistent and truly dignified deportment, they have secured to themselves what Solomon says is better than precious ointment. They have finished the term of three years from home and friends—they have done their duty—they have honored our nation—and now they return, enjoying the high esteem of their countrymen, and of strangers resident in this part of the world.

A Good Joke.—There is a bill before the Massachusetts Legislature legalizing the marriage of blacks and whites. A member made the following remark upon it:—

I shall vote in favor of this bill, simply because I do not wish to see a law on the statute book regulating a mere matter of taste, for such I consider to be the whole question of intermarriage between persons of different colors. It is purely a matter of taste, and if my friend from Nantucket wishes to marry a black, blue or green wife, I am content that he should have full liberty to indulge his preference for either color. All I request of him is, that when I happen to pay him a friendly visit at the island, he will not ask me to kiss his milk and molasses children.

Mississippi.—A law has been enacted by the Legislature of Mississippi at its last session called the "Valuation and Debt Law," provides that when property has been levied on, in satisfaction of an execution, the debtor may claim an appraisement; whereupon three disinterested persons shall be chosen, one by the plaintiff, one by the debtor, and the third by the sheriff, who shall appraise the property and make a certificate of their appraisement. The property is then to be offered for sale, at auction, and if two-thirds the appraised value is not offered, the sale is to be stopped, and the property to remain in the hands of the debtor for one year, and then be offered again for sale to the highest bidder.—Baltimore American.

From Harrisburgh.—An Extra Session.—The news from Harrisburgh is important. Thursday last, it will be remembered, was the day fixed upon for adjournment—and both Houses proceeded with their business accordingly. But they could not agree upon an internal improvement bill, and were about to adjourn without one, when the Governor sent in the Message to be found in another part of our paper. It is an interesting document, and does honour to its author. The case may be thus stated. The friends of Internal Improvements are rather in the majority in the House, and they appear to be determined that no bills for repairs, &c. shall pass, unless they get something to continue the main line. In the Senate, there is a majority opposed to appropriating any more money at the present time for new works, and in favor of suspending and paying off the debts due.

The duty of the Legislature, as it strikes us, is to provide for the payment of the interest on the State Debt, and also to devise a Sinking Fund for the ultimate liquidation of the debt.

Nothing was done in relation to small bills.

Both Houses re-assembled on Friday, to commence the extra session, as we suppose it must be called. Some of the members were very indignant at the course of the Governor, but what other course could he pursue?

A bill appropriating $200,000 for the expenses of the Government was passed, and then both Houses adjourned to meet again on the 12th of May. Such a decision, under the circumstances, will excite much disapprobation in the public mind. We consider it an outrageous proceeding. The interests and the honor of the State are too important to be thus endangered and trifled with.—Bicknell.

American Stocks in Paris—The Debt of Pennsylvania.—An important item of intelligence by a late arrival is that referring to the establishment of an Association at Paris for dealing in American Stocks. Four eminent French houses, Baguenault & Co., A. Dasier, Delessert & Co., and Hottinguer & Co., are concerned in the business conjointly with the Barings of London. The mode proposed is to convert American Stocks into bonds to bearer, with dividend warrants payable in Paris at the office of the "Administration," as the association is termed, or in London at that of Messrs. Barings Brothers & Co., and to offer them in this form to capitalists. Six per cent stock of the State of Ohio, five per cent. State of New York, and five per cent stock of the city of New York, are the stocks named for which certificates are first to be issued in the commencement of the system. The result cannot but be beneficial to American interests abroad, inasmuch as a new market will thus be opened to our stocks and of course a new demand created.

We may add our conviction that nothing will prove more permanently beneficial to American securities in Europe than a solemn determination on the part of the States to provide means not only for the prompt payment of the interest in specie, but also a sinking fund, backed by laws, to cut down the principal with as little delay as possible. Pennsylvania exhibits a lamentable figure just now in the European markets. Two years ago and her State securities were eagerly sought for and at a premium. Now they can be sold with great difficulty at prices ranging from 76 to 80. Our recent Legislature we regret to say, had not nerve enough to enforce a direct tax. The people, however, are becoming alarmed, and we should not be surprised at much and just excitement upon this subject between this and the next election. It is not a party question, and we shall therefore continue to agitate it from time to time, in the hope of awakening public attention and averting from our Commonwealth both insolvency and dishonor. Our debt at the end of the present year will amount to something like forty millions of dollars—or about $150 for every taxable inhabitant of Pennsylvania. This, we venture to repeat, is no slight matter.—Bicknell.

Later From Texas.—A Slaughter.—Later advices from Texas have reached us by way of New Orleans. The Texas Sentinel contains the details of a shocking and disgraceful affair, in which a number of Cumanche Indians were slain.

On the 19th of March, a body of 65 Indians arrived at St. Antonio, bringing Miss Lockhart, a little girl, taken by them a year and a half since from the Guadaloupe, for the purpose of holding a council with the agents of our government.—They said they wished to see if they could get a high price for her; and if so, they would bring all the other prisoners one at a time. Miss Lockhart stated that she had seen all the other prisoners at their camp a few days before she left. Col. W. G. Cooke, acting Secretary of War, being present, thought it proper to take hostages for the safe return of the prisoners, and Col. Fisher was ordered to march two companies, and place them in the immediate vicinity of the council room.

After some parleying in relation to the prisoners, one company was ordered to march into the room, and the other to the rear of the building, where the warriors were assembled. The chiefs were then told that they were prisoners, and would not be liberated until they restored their white prosoners. One sprang to the back door and attempted to pass the sentinel, who presented his musket, when the Indian drew his knife and stabbed him. A general rush was then made for the doors. Capt. Howard caught one by the collar and received a severe stab. He then ordered the sentinels to shoot the Indian, which was instantly done. They all then drew their knives and bows for battle, and the whole twelve chiefs were immediately shot. In the meantime, Capt. Reed's company was attacked by the warriors in the rear of the yard, who fought with desperation. The indians were driven into the stone houses, from which they kept a gallant fire with their bows and rifles. Whenever their arrows struck, it was with such force that it penetrated to the feather. A small number succeeded in gaining the opposite side of the river, but Col. Wells pursued them with a party of mounted men, and killed all, with the exception of one renegade Mexican.

A single warrior took refuge in a stone house, refusing every offer of life sent him through the squaws, and after killing and wounding several of our men, the building was fired at night, and he was shot as he passed the door.

The whole number of warriors, excepting the Mexicans, amounting to 35, were killed, besides 2 women and 3 children. Our loss was 7 killed, viz. Lt. W. M. Dunnington, privates Kammiski and Whitney; Judge Thompson of Houston; Judge Hood of Bexar; Mr. Cayce, of Matagorda, and a Mexican.

Wounded—Capt. G. T. Howard, 1st inf.; Capt. Matthew Caldwell, 1st do; Lt. E. A. Thompson, private Kelly, company 1; Judge Robinson, Mr. Higginbotham, Mr. Morgan, and Mr. Carson. Total of wounded 8. Howard, Thompson and Kelly, very severely.

At the request of the prisoners, a squaw was liberated and well mounted, to go to the main tribe, and request an exchange of prisoners; she promised to return in four days, with our captive friends, and Cols. Cooke and M'Leod will wait until they return.

We learn from Mr. Durkee, who arrived from Austin yesterday, that Col. Burleson has been called upon to organize an expedition forthwith to operate against the Cumanches. He will raise one company on the Colorado, and at Austin, and take with him the company which left Houston a short time since, under Captain Pearce, and a body of Tonkwa Indians.

Another account states that 83 Indians and 6 Texans were killed, and a number wounded. It is added that Judge Robinson was severely wounded with an arrow, and that Mr. J. C. Morgan, after receiving two shots from the bow, revenged himself by killing two Indians.

FIVE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the splendid packet ship Geo. Washington, Captain Burrows, from Liverpool, 25th March, and the Charles Carroll, Captain Russell, from Havre, 15th March, we have received our full files of English and French papers, up to that date, inclusive.

There was a report in London that the King of Hanover was dead.

Prince Albert has become a patroniser of the Fine Arts.

Lord Lyndhurst was dangerously ill, 22d March.

Canada.—A motion has been made to have all the expenses of Lord Durham and Powlett Thompson, as Governors of Canada, laid before Parliament.

France.—The question on the Secret Service Money had not been decided on.

Toulon, March 18.—All the ships in our roadstead are getting ready for sailing at a moment's notice. They are expected to be sent on a cruise off the coast of Africa, from Algiers to Morocco, during the continuance of the expedition against Abdel Kader. It is almost certain, however, that the Emir obtains all his ammunition from Morocco by land carriage, and this we shall never be able to prevent.

Germany.—Emigration from Germany to the United States.—"At no period," says the Mayence Gazette, "was emigration to North America so considerable as at present. The emigrants, in general, are families in easy circumstances, some even rich, and whole caravans of them are daily passing through this town. The Americans will be delighted with their new colonists, as most of them are young, active men, between 20 and 30 years of age. On the 13th and 14th inst. upwards of 600 persons left the environs of Alzei for Havre by land. Only a short time ago, 60 persons from Bingen, Upper Hesse and Rhenish Prussia, took the same road, and will be followed to-morrow by as many more from the Grand Duchy of Baden."

Spain.—Madrid, March 18.—The Congress of Deputies is at length constituted. E. Isturitz has been chosen President by a large majority. The other members of the bureau are from the same party. Madrid is quiet. The accounts from the provinces are all satisfactory. The state of seige has just been raised.

Africa.—Oran, March 10.—A treaty has been concluded between Abdel Kader and the Emperor of Morocco, on the subject of the Holy war, for the complete extirpation of the French. The Emir has succeeded and is placed upon an equality with the Sultan. Great preparations are being made at Nedrama, a town on the frontier of Morocco. Abdel Kader is at Tlemeen recruiting his cavalry.

Russia.—A letter from Berlin, in the Augsburg Gazette, states on the authority of accounts from Russia, that the corps under General Perowsky had, on its march to Chiva, met with serious and unexpected obstacles. The Khan had destroyed all the bridges over the rivers and ravines and as wood is very scarce in that country, the expedition, which was harassed by a numerous cavalry of Usbecks, was much delayed in re-establishing the communications, and consequently advanced but slowly.

Chinese Affairs.—It is well known that double pay has been given to some parties engaged in hastening and accompanying the armament of China, and that our arsenals on the Sabbath has been employed to expedite the completion of the required instruments of destruction. Besides the addition to our taxation for the purchase of the army and the navy, the price of tea has advanced more than 1s 3d per pound, which, on the annual consumption of the kingdom, amounts to upwards £2,500,000 sterling, chiefly paid by the working classes.—Standard.

The Post Master at M'Connelsville, O., says George W. Linkins does not take his paper from the office. Will Bro. Woodruff please see to this.

Bro. A. Shinn is requested to forward the books ordered by A. H. Basset, (3 dozen) to the care of his friend Mr. Crow, in Louisville, Ky., and the cash shall be forthcoming.

The third Quarterly Meeting for Charlestown Circuit, Indiana, is appointed to be held at Bethlehem, including the 4th Saturday and Lord's day in May, (proximo.) Who will come to our help? Brethren are requested to come prepared to remain for as many days as convenient after Sabbath, in case we protract our meeting. A. H. Basset, Superintendant.

Anti Popery, wished us to revise his article so far as it needed, before publication; we thought every week we would set about the work, but up to this date we have been so pressed that we have not found time. We have now submitted it to the inspection of a competent hand as soon as it is returned to us, it shall be forthcoming.—We hope our friend will not think we have forgotten him.

Bro. Carson you say Mr. Little does not recollect any thing about subscribing for the paper; Mr. W. Hughey told us that he heard him give his consent to subscribe, being present when he was solicited by Bro. Guest. We have sent him the paper six months, and if he wants to do the fair thing he will pay for it without a word. You wish us to discontinue Mr. Riley's paper at the end of six months. He has not paid—look at our terms.

Resolutions of the Sugar Creek circuit, Indiana, held on the 14th of March, 1840.

Resolved 1st. That we approve of setting off the State of Indiana into a separate Conference District.

2d. That in our opinion it would promote the interest of our cause, if the committee charged with that subject, would proceed to appoint the time and place for holding the first Indiana Conference as soon as practicable. Signed,

Samuel Morrison.

As the Post Master General has decided that "a post master may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter, if written by himself," it is the same thing for a subscriber to address his letter, enclosing the pay for his paper to a Post Master who is publisher of a newspaper, in his official capacity by which it will come free.

We therefore wish our subscribers to address their letters containing remitances for us, to "C. Springer, P. M. Meadow Farm, Muskingum O.;" also all letters on the official duties of our office as Post Master in the same way. All letters on other business, or business of a private nature should be addressed to us omitting the official signatures P. M. and we will pay for them.

Camp Meeting.—We propose to hold a camp meeting, on the farm of John Walker, 3 miles west of Adamsville, Muskingum county, Ohio, to commence on the 4th of June. We solicit the attendance of Bros. Brown, Springer, Marshall, Wilson, Thrap, Fairchild, Davis, Warren and Stephens. P. Inskeep, Sup.

BAPTISM, NO. IV.

THE MODE OF ADMINISTRATION.

Having noticed the institution, and the nature and design of water baptism, I now proceed to consider the modus operandi, which has given rise to so much controversy,—not, however, with any intention of provoking opposition, but rather to allay strife, and with a desire to relieve such as may be troubled in mind concerning what really constitutes a valid baptism. It is asked whether is immersion, affusion, or aspersion the proper mode? I reply: No one of these modes, exclusively, is essential to the validity of this ordinance. It may be administered in either mode. The mode is indifferent, seeing it depends not on the quantity of water used, nor the manner of its administration: Baptism being the application of water to the body in the NAME of the ever blessed TRINITY.

1. IMMERSION.—This is performed by dipping the body, all over, in water, generally in a river or pond, and sometimes in fonts prepared for the purpose. Many maintain that this is the only proper and scriptural mode of baptism. The advocates of this opinion rely upon their construction of the original word "Baptizo" which, they say, signifies to immerse only,—upon the expressions "into the water" and "out of the water"—and upon supposed allusions to this mode in the epistles of Paul. I have already shown that the original word does not always signify to immerse, and that "to the water" and "from the water," are as consonant with the original text as the common reading, consequently no proof can be thence adduced in favor of immersion only. See No. 1. The passages containing the supposed allusion to immersion shall be noticed hereafter. The claim set up for this mode exclusively, and the practice founded thereon, appear to me altogether indefencible and unwarranted by the word of God. It is admitted, however, that immersion is a mode of baptism which may be administered when desired by the person to be baptized under suitable circumstances, regard being had to the condition, health and comfort of the administrator and the candidate.

2. AFFUSION.—This is performed by pouring the water from a cup or other vessel upon the head of the person to be baptized. This is probably the manner in which John the baptizer administered this ordinance by the side of Jordan; and the way in which the disciples of Jesus baptized by the direction of the Lord.—To pour upon is a correct rendering of the original word "baptizo." This mode is supported also by the analogy of spiritual baptism. The spirit is uniformly said to be poured out—to descend upon—to be shed forth—and to fall upon; and if water baptism is intended to imitate the baptism of the Holy Ghost, then to be most expressive it should be administered by pouring. The quantity used is not important, and the mode may be conveniently administered, by taking some water in the hollow of the hand, and pouring it thence upon the head of the subject.

3. ASPERSION.—This is performed by sprinkling the water with the fingers or a branch of some herb or tree upon the person to be baptized. This mode is also justified by a proper rendering of the original word "baptizo," which signifies not only to immerse but also to pour upon, to sprinkle, &c.; and is included in the "divers washings" or "different baptisms" mentioned by Paul in Heb. 9, 10. The Israelites when brought out of Egypt were thus baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea and separated unto the Lord in the wilderness. The baptism of the spirit is sometimes figuratively spoken of by "sprinkling with clean water." This mode has generally obtained among Pedo-baptists.

The Methodist Protestant Church acknowledges baptism as valid when administered in either form, and directs that "every adult person, and the parents of every child to be baptized, have the choice of immersion, sprinkling or pouring."—See Discipline, page 101. The practical result of this liberality of spirit in our institutions, is truly pleasing. Hundreds of persons are here associated in church-fellowship—some of whom have been baptized by sprinkling—some by pouring—and some by dipping, without ever thinking of this circumstance as an occasion of disunion or interruption of brotherly affection. The general voice is "Let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind."

Baptism, then, may be administered in either mode, and so administered is equally valid, the person immersed in water—the person on whom water is poured—and the person sprinkled with water in the NAME of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, are all truly and properly baptized with the CHRISTIAN baptism. So I think and so I practice.—Let others think differently if they please.

But while I admit the validity of baptism by either mode, I am inclined to prefer Affusion, as the most eligible and scriptural, and look upon Immersion as least eligible, and on several accounts by no means adapted to the genius of the Gospel dispensation. I will briefly state my reasons for this objection to immersion, and leave the intelligent reader to supply cases in illustration as they will naturally suggest themselves to the mind.

1st. Immersion is not always practicable. A stream of water sufficiently deep, wherein to immerse a man, does not miraculously follow the minister of the gospel wherever he goes, as the stream from the rock followed the Israelites in the wilderness. The practice of bathing is not so universal, that fonts, already prepared, are found in every land and country—nor could the expense of them be readily met in all cases, for to the poor, the gospel is preached. A variety of difficulties render it impracticable at all times to attend to this mode.

2nd. Immersion is sometimes extremely hazardous and injurious to health. In some climates during the most of the year, the cold is so intense that if it could be performed at all, it would be with great danger; and in milder climes some persons would suffer severely for such exposure.

3rd. Immersion is sometimes impossible. The condition and health of thousands impose an insuperable barrier to its administration. The sick cannot be taken from their couches of pain and affliction, and plunged into the cold water. If the whole human family were now to believe, and desire baptism, how many millions there are who could not possibly be immersed?

Is it likely that Christ would have enjoined a mode, as indispensable, which is often impracticable, hazardous and impossible? Does he not command his disciples to go and disciple all nations by baptizing them? And would he prescribe a mode which would render it impossible to obey him? Certainly not. And yet if Christ prescribed immersion as the only mode, it is evident that baptism cannot be administered in thousands of cases.—Thus immersion conflicts with the terms of the institution itself.

But whatever may be the condition or circumstances, affusion and aspersion are ALWAYS practical, NEVER dangerous, NEVER impossible—universally adapted to the occasion, and therefore suited to the genius of the gospel, and rendering easy obedience to the Divine commands, "baptize all;" and "be baptized every one of you."

Again—If immersion only is baptism, would not the inspired penmen have used the word "bapto," which is more restricted in its signification, instead of the convertible one "baptizo?" But "bapto"—to dip—is never used, and "baptizo"—to pour or sprinkle, as well as to dip—is always used—and this is strong evidence in favor of affusion or aspersion. May we not reasonably infer, that the practice of sprinkling or pouring gave occasion for the use of the convertible word, while it excluded from the christian vocabulary the restricted one? If John the baptizer had always dipped the subjects of his baptism? if Jesus had commanded his disciples to do the same? if this was their uniform custom? I ask why was not the word "bapto" used? No doubt but it would have been used if the apostles had entertained the same views of baptism as is now held by the Anti-pedo-baptists, or had followed the same practice. So I account for the use of the word, "baptizo" on the ground that baptism was uniformly administered by John the baptizer, and by the disciples of Christ, by sprinkling or pouring, and not by dipping. Immersion may possibly have been practiced also, on some occasions, and may still be practiced. Christ hath not forbidden it, and when desired it should be administered if practicable and safe.

JNO. G. WILSON.

Kensington, March 24, 1840.

NARRATIVE OF THE LOSS OF THE BARQUE BURLINGTON.—The barque Burlington, of Boston, burden 405 tons, left New Orleans on Saturday, February 15, 1840, for Havre de Grace, laden with cotton, with a crew of fourteen hands, including two officers, cook and steward, and had proceeded 24 days on her voyage, when in 37 N. lat. and 54 30 W. long., at about 9 30 P. M. on Tuesday, March 10, she was struck by lightning, which came down the larboard main-topsail sheet, knocked down the 2d officer and all the starboard watch, with the exception of the man at the wheel. All hands were turned up to examine the vessel, but no apparent injury seemed to have been done. Capt. Hallet had but a minute before left the deck to examine the barometer, heard the noise and the cry of the watch, came immediately on deck, found fortunately that there was no loss of life, but the men faint and weak in their limbs.

At 12 15, it was discovered that the ship was on fire by the smoke coming up the booby hatch and forecastle. The chief officer, John Girdler, immediately reported this to the captain, who ordered the forecastle and hatches to be closed, and sail put over them. The wind was now blowing a gale, with large sea, and lightning to the S. W. Capt. H. hauled up courses and wore ship to the westward, and got the long boat and jolly-boat all ready with provisions, water, &c., in case they should be wanted. At six A. M. found the larboard side and the mast coat of the main-mast quite warm. A hole was then made in the coat of the main-mast with an auger, large enough to admit a funnel, through which a quantity of water was poured down to protect the mainmast, but the deck was much burnt underneath, and like a torpedo below.—At 8 A. M. the boats were got out, but the jolly-boat filled in lowering—the long boat was safely lowered with a part of the crew and the second officer, and was held by a hawser under the lee of the ship.

At 10 30 A. M. expecting the flames every moment to burst out, all the crew entered the long-boat, having at first implored the blessings of Heaven, they committed themselves to the care of that God who ruleth the winds and waves, and who alone can save. At 1 3 P. M. the weather having moderated, and wanting some articles they had left behind, they boarded the ship, and found less smoke verging from the hatches than when they had left. Capt. Hallet forthwith ordered holes to be bored wherever the deck was the hottest and water poured down, and by means of puttying up and pasting every hole and crack, he was in hopes of smothering the fire, or, at all events, of keeping it down so as to enable him to make some port, as Boston, New York, &c.

Accordingly, he ordered the boat to be taken in; and all things secured about the deck; he kept the ship to a N. W. by W. course. In this manner was employed the six following days, pouring down many buckets of water wherever the deck was the hottest, and in pumping the ship. And here let it not be forgotten that this gallant and seemingly devoted crew, were without change of clothes, although frequently saturated with salt water—no covering except the wide canopy of heaven; but fortunately, their provisions were on deck. On Monday the 16th, a strong gale from W. at 1 P. M. The foresail and foretop main-staysail were taken in. At 2 30 P. M. it blew a complete hurricane from N. W. A new close reefed main-topsail was blown away and the mainmast weakened considerable; probably the wedges were burnt out and had dropped down. The beams and butts of the deck were all open on the larboard side.

In the afternoon the weather moderated. On Tuesday the 17th, at 10 A. M. they perceived a sail, the St. James, Capt. Sebor, and hoisted a signal of distress. At 3 P. M. the St. James spoke the Burlington, and 5 P. M. all hands with some provisions, were safe on board the former vessel. Capt. Sebor displayed a most praiseworthy anxiety for the comfort and accommodation of our rescued brethren; some of whom came on board with only the clothes they had on their backs. Others were enable to save some part of their things. When Capt. Hallet left the Burlington, (which he did last of all,) the flames were ten or twelve feet above the deck. At about 6 P. M. the ship was one mass of fire, and about this time the main and mizzen masts fell overboard. At 10 she suddenly disappeared, having probably sunk.

AN OPEN DOOR TO THE JEWS.—Tuscany is the most free of all countries of Italy and Leghorn; its principal city, is a free port; yet there it is not allowed to preach the gospel to the Roman Catholics. Give a Bible or a tract to a Catholic, and he carries it to the priest, who carries it to the magistrate; and you are immediately seized and imprisoned. But in the same place you may go freely to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Thus the door is shut to the Gentiles, but open to the Jews.

In Egypt and Palestine you cannot preach the gospel to the deluded followers of Mohammed, except on penalty of instant banishment or death; yet you may preach freely the gospel to the Jews, in every place—in the bazars, the market-places and the Synagogues. The same is true in ancient Sidon, Tyre, Sychar, Tiberias and Acre. In Constantinople, where are 80,000 Jews, you may go freely to them, and though converts to the faith among them, may meet persecution from their brethren, they meet none from the government.

In Moldavia and Wallachia, where the established religion is that of the Greek church, an attempt to convert an adherent of that church would be fatal to the missionary; but he may preach to the Jews without hazard, at any time and in all places, under the very eye of the government. No man will forbid him.

Austria will suffer no missionaries and no distribution of Bibles in English, Hebrew or German. There, it is out of the question as yet to carry the gospel to the people—even to the Jews, who are themselves willing to hear it.

At Cracow in Poland, are 22,000 Jews living in a separate quarter of the city—and they have among them a single missionary, whose labors are of the most interesting kind. He is not allowed to preach openly in a congregation; but he goes to a book seller's shop, where he opens the book of life, & preaches the unsearchable riches of Christ. Popery exists here in its most disgusting form, and the Catholic population is so bigoted, that were the devoted missionary to stand up and proclaim the truth to them as it is in Jesus, it is believed that he would be stoned to death before he could reach his own door. Still, even here the Jews are accessible.

In the Grand Dutchy of Posen, though under the government of the King of Russia, a Protestant prince, a Christian missionary could not preach the gospel to the people at large, but the door is open for the missionary to the Jews—and a missionary actually laboring there, has from 200 to 400 collected in his church, out of the 74,000 living in the country.

These facts are gathered from an address of Mr. M'Cheyne, one of the Scotch delegation, recently sent upon the Continent to investigate the condition of the Jews—as reported in the Halifax Guardian.

CLAIRVOYANCE.—At a late sitting of the French Academy, in Paris, there came under consideration the premium of three thousand francs, which a member, Mr. Burden, had offered in 1837, with reference to animal magnetism to the person who, in the opinion of the Academy, should succeed in reading, without the aid of eyes in books provided by the committee; no light to be allowed, &c. Several candidates for the premium were presented, but all failed in their repeated attempts; and among them the famous damsel Pigeare, about whose wonderful performances of sight, when somnambulized, so much has been published in journals and pamphlets. Mr. Burden stated that, as in two years the magnetizers could not win the prize by what they represented as one of their most common and simple achievements, he would give it to any person, magnetized or not magnetized, asleep or awake, who should, in the opinion of the Academy, accomplish the task of reading with the eyes open, and in broad day light, through an opaque body, such as the tissue of thread, silk or cotton, placed at a distance of six inches from the face, or even through a sheet of paper.—[Paris Correspondent of the National intelligencer.

The readers of the Courier know with what derision we treated the pretensions of the animal magnetizers, who made considerable noise in our country about two years ago. To us it was very astonishing that people, who appear to be sensible on other subjects, should for a moment look with favor upon so ridiculous a folly as that which pretended people could read with their eyes shut! Yet Poyen found hundreds who gave credence to his absurdities.

The result of the sitting of the French Academy is presented to the American reader by the pen of Mr. Walsh, formerly our townsman, and the editor of the National Gazette. He is the Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer. It may, consequently, be strictly relied upon; and how could any other result have been anticipated? By no one, who has investigated the pretensions of the Animal Magnetizers, could a different one have been expected. It is a corroboration of a similar investigation made in France by Franklin, and contemporary philosophers, utterly repudiating the claims set up by the advocates of the Mesmerian theory.—Saturday Courier.

A clock maker of Vienna whose name is Mathias Ratzenhofer, has solved the problem proposed by Professor Gruithausen at Munich. "To construct a clock which shall shew at once the time in several cities, the works of which shall not be in any wise hindered in their movement, whether they put in motion more or fewer clocks for different places, whether they are in Europe or in the other quarters of the globe, and the hands of which may be changed at pleasure, and directed to other places." This clock goes right, and its dial plate, which is fourteen inches in diameter, has in the centre the dial for Vienna, and around and radiating from it seventy-two cities of different parts of the world, each with its own dial and the name of the place.—It shews the difference of mean time between Vienna and the seventy-two other towns, and is set in motion by a four pound weight only: all the other clocks, however, are put in motion from the centre of the Vienna clock; so that if the work stand still, nothing more is necessary than to set the Vienna clock to make all the other clocks indicate the true time. Professor Gruithausen, in a letter to the "Universal Gazette" of Augsburg, endeavors to shew that this clock is not what he intended.

BLUE INK.—This writing fluid is extensively used, but according to the following paragraph from the New York Commercial Advertiser its use should be avoided in letter writing, book keeping, and, in fact, all important writing transactions:

One of our Wall street friends has called with a bill of exchange received this morning, from New Orleans, dated March 17th. The bill itself is perfect, the filling up and signatures having been written in black ink. But the letter of instructions, which filled the residue of the first page of the sheet, with the exception of some half a dozen words or fragments of words has been entirely obliterated. By some means, the letter got wet in the mail, and the writing is entirely washed out. So also of the account current on the second and third pages. More than three-fourths of the writing has entirely disappeared, and the liquid of which it was formed, is now probably mingled with the kindred blue of the Gulf of Mexico. In any event, this account current is most conclusively liquidated. By the way, it would be well for speculators, buying lots in lithographic cities, to write their notes in blue ink.

TIMES IN THE SOUTH.—The following graphic account of the state of things in New Orleans, is taken from the "Sun," a spirited paper published in that city:

"Business in New Orleans is most gloriously, lamentably, shockingly, deplorably, egregiously, treacherously, abundantly supereminently dull and dismal.—Oh! Gemini! what times! We caution all poor fellows in the north whose fate is to work for a living, to stay away from New Orleans. Oh! you shoemakers and hatters, and tinkers—you blacksmiths, bricklayers, and tailors—you printers painters, and players—you silver-smiths, copper-smiths, and John-smiths—you stone-cutters, store keepers, and stockjobbers—boot makers, boot-blacks, and brandy drinkers—oh you wives, widows, and widowers; you maids and maidens; you uncles and aunts, and maiden aunts, fathers and mothers—you grandfathers and great-grandfathers—you sisters, and nephews, and nieces and cousins—keep, only keep away from New Orleans.—Come not within hail of her borders, for she has more boarders than she can support already. Go to Wisconsin, if you like. Go to Iowa. Go to Texas. Go to grass. Go any where—to England. But stay you from coming here."

SUITS AT LAW.—Major Noah says that all the minor courts of New York city are overflowing with petty suits. These business trifles are so many innovations upon the peace of society without effecting much good; it being rarely the case that an individual will refuse payment of a debt with the threat of a suit before him. The burden of costs and the rigid requirements of the law embarrass the poor debtor without effecting the ends of the creditor. The times demand lenity, they call for it as imperatively as a season of famine calls for the exertions of the benevolent, and it is far more noble, more human, we had better say, to exercise a spirit of forbearance than to make the pillow of the unfortunate still more flinty by placing near it the writ of execution and the threat of the constable.—We throw out these hints for the consideration of the citizens of our own city.—They have the power to inflict much injury and cause great distress.—Let them beware how they use it.

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in the city of New York, and devoted to Home and Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by PARK BENJAMIN.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant periodical sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 25.—The situation of New York, and its immense commercial intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intelligence received in our "great metropolis." Availing ourselves of the advantages derived from this source and many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper intended for "our country, our whole country"—warped by no sectional bias—controverting no man's political opinions—unsullied by any thing of an immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of such English works of value as may be conveniently embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of original matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from all the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly, the Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazines; Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, LaBelle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.

We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of three celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which a copyright is not attached.

The editor will especially aim to make The New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full accounts of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to OUR people; while they omit or neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.

We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which fall under the eye of the municipal police. We can see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No ludicrous accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal violations of social order by the ignorant and imbecile.

With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient, and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.

Price of The New World, THREE DOLLARS per annum, payable in advance.

All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

A VISION.

n the night season, when deep sleep falleth
the children of men, a vision came upon me,
I saw and beheld a multitude of the elders
the people from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, assem-in a city of the east country, to take coun-together for the welfare of mankind. And w and beheld a remnant of the people of the th country, having bowels of mercy for the ple of the south, that were in bondage, and y besought the elders of the people to let the ressed go free, as Moses did with Pharoah in alf of the children of Israel. But their rts were hardened; and I saw and beheld a hty man of power, having six heads and many ns, and he lifted his iron rod, and he wielded ver the whole assembly, and fear and trembg came upon them all; and consternation d mighty dread fell on them. And the mighty n in power, whose voice was like the voice o my thunders, again spake, and after that ere was silence for fear of him; and the horns the six heads of the man in power, every one them did aid the monster, in all things, until ere was nothing to withstand them, and they shed with their horns until every one of the mnant of the people of the north country subtted to their power, or was driven from the sembly of the people. And the power of the nster waxed stronger and stronger, and his ad and his horns increased exceedingly. And ooked again and beheld, and lo! bondage, in rt, come upon all colors of men that were der the control of the mighty man in power, the north and in the east, and in the west as ll as in the south, until the burden became tolerable and then cometh the end. C.

PITTSBURGH, April 18th, 1840.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

MEADOW FARM, April 29th, 1840.

Mr. Editor: My last communication was from ambridge circuit, where we had two general forts—one at the town of Cambridge, and the her at Ragan's chapel. There was nothing ry special of the revival character at either of ese meetings. Yet it did seem to those of od judgment in such matters, that could our eetings have been continued a little longer, a vival would have been the result, in both the efore mentioned places. It is hoped that our od brother Marshall, who I believe, is doing all e can, for the people of his charge, will yet gath-some souls into the church, who were awaken-d at these meetings. Brother Marshall has no lleague, but the unstationed ministers are oing a creditable part, in a way of rendering im assistance, and keeping up the appointments.

Pisgah circuit came next. Our principal eeting was at Bethel. It was a very interest-ng time all through. On Sunday the house eing too small, we preached, and administered he sacrament, at the end of the meeting house mong the graves. Providentially the clear sky, hortly after we begun, was over-cast with clouds, hus, wholly unannoyed by the sun, we had a leasant time indeed, in waiting on the Lord.—
The meeting closed on Tuesday—a goodly numer were added to the church, whom we hope to meet in heaven. After preaching at Pisgah, Ebenezer, and M'Connelsville, I reached Penns-ille by Thursday evening, very much fatigued nd preached to quite a crowded congregation.—
The meeting for Pennsville circuit was in Athens, to which, over the roughest kind of country, on Friday I rode, having Judge Scott, brothers Woodruff and Ostrum for my travelling companions. At Methenysville we put up for the night, and I felt unusually weary in trying to preach,
for it was their meeting night.

In Athens we occupied the Cumberland Presbyterian meeting house, and were very courteously treated by the good people of that place.
We have no church in Athens, but near it, we have an excellent growing community—they came into the meeting—a goodly number of the citizens attended—upon the whole we had a good meeting. The communion on the Sabbath was truly an interesting time. Cumberland Presbyterians, Episcopal Methodists and Protestant Methodists, all mingling their religious feelings together, at the same altar, was a pleasant sight indeed. This thing was as it should be, let bigotry say what it may to the contrary.
Owing to an error in proceedings, the judicial investigation ordered by the Conference, and appointed to be had at Athens, in case of W.
W. Reynolds, was dropt, and the probability is, all circumstanees considered, it may never take place. After preaching twice at the bridge, and once at Waterloo, I proceeded to my next appointment. Brother Ostrom has added more than 100 members to the church, on Pennsville circuit, this year. His circuit is large, and requires much labor, and he appears to have general confidence, and is doing all he can, and I trust will abundantly succeed.

In New Lancaster brother Maynard is doing well, 66 have been added in the bounds of his charge since Conference. A new class of 32 members has been formed, something more than a mile in the country—33 have been received in town—these added to the 20 left unsold by Judas, will make that much injured, but highly respectable little station, 85 strong, and the prospect for further increase is now quite promising. The church is in a state of peace, and enjoys a high amount of public confidence.

On Zanesville circuit owing to the feeble state of my health, and the busy season, our meeting closed on Sunday night. We were all rather dull. But on this circuit, there is a valuable membership, and brothers Thrap and Fairchild, have been useful, in edifying, enlarging, and building up the church, in this regio n—about 70 have been added this year—may peace and prosperity attend them, and the good people among whom they labor.

In closing this communication, it may be proper to remind our brethren, throughout the District, that according to the law of the Annual Conference, the 3d quarterly meeting is the time fixed upon to elect delegates to our next Annual Conference. To elect at the 4th quarterly meeting has been found by experience, to be too late, to admit of any thing like instructions being given them, in relation to the duties to be performed by them, for the circuits and stations at the Annual Conference.

It will be likewise in place, to remind our brethren, of the efforts agreed upon at our last Conference, to be made in all the circuits and stations, to raise missionary funds, and to take up Conference collections, in view of meeting the claims of our ministers and preachers, who labor in regions, where the churches are unable to pay them their small allowance. Let all do what they can in this respect, and then our laborers will not be driven from the itinerant field, for want of a competent support, to the great injury of the common cause.

My health is impaired, "but my heart is fixed."
Twenty-five years ago last winter, my itinerant labors commenced. I have seen days and even years of affliction, but God has enabled me to hold on my way; I have never located, and probably never shall. To see Zion's prosperity, hitherto has been, and I trust always will be, my chief joy. Commending myself to the prayers of the church, and to the care of the great Father and Lord of all, I am, &c. GEO. BROWN.

Mr. Editor: Will you have the goodness to publish the following appointments for me?—
Should it please God to enable me to fill them, then the labors of the year will be closed, except the two missions in Pennsylvania, and one or two camp meetings.

Wayne, "	14th	Newark, "	12th

Letters may be addressed to me according to the above arrangement. Our brethren will please make their own arrangements in relation to ministerial assistance at the meetings now published. I am always glad to have help.

Yours, &c. GEO. BROWN.

WAYNESBURGH, PA., April 23d, 1840.

Beloved Brother Springer: I take my pen to inform our friends generally, through your valuable paper, that Old Monongalia circuit is still living. I should have written sooner had it not been that nothing very special of a religious character has transpired with us this Conference year. But I have finally concluded, that a brief statement of our condition as a circuit, would not be unacceptable to your readers. It will be recollected that 140 of the three hundred and twenty-five members returned to the last Conference were received in to the church last year, and according to the usual course of things we should look for a calm after a storm; or in other words, it is not to be expected that all the members received last year would continue faithful.
I thought, when I received my re-appointment, to this circuit, I should have no cause of complaint if I should be able to return the original number, next Conference. We are still, however, hoping for better things. The circuit is in general in a healthy condition, and gradually rising in public estimation. We have, as yet, held but few protracted meetings, having spent the first half year in endeavoring to sow the seed, the fruit of which we expect to gather hereafter. Our meetings have been generally well attended and interesting; we have added several regular appointments to the circuit, at one of which we have formed a class of fifteen members, and more are expected soon. We have more calls to preach in new appointments than we can attend to.

Our second quarterly meeting, which was held at this place, was decidedly the best attended of any since I came to the circuit. More hospitality was manifested by the citizens in accommodating the friends, from a distance, and more liberality in contributing to the support of the gospel. Our love-feast, which was held on Monday morning, was among the best I ever attended.
It was truly a reviving time among the members and non-professors were made to feel deeply on the subject of salvation. Six joined the church during the meeting, making in all about thirty since Conference. We were favored with the labors of brother Baldwin, at both our quarterly meetings.

The revival intelligence communicated through the Recorder, has been very cheering. It may be considered strongly ominous of the future and final success of the enterprise with which we have identified ourselves; and we are led to believe the time is at no great distance when our infant branch will occupy a prominent situation among her sister churches. Let us be faithful to God and to each other and all will be well. 'Tis true, many of the friends of the cause in which we have engaged, have been required to make many sacrifices, in order to keep the ship, in which we have embarked, moving. But the cause is worth them all, and the anticipation of final victory, is a sufficient compensation to the mind of the philanthropist.

I have just returned from a protracted meeting at Morgantown on Middletown circuit, at which we had a good time. The Lord was evidently present, and no doubt a considerable amount of good done; eleven were added to the church, during the meeting, making in all about three hundred, on that circuit, this year. O!
may the glorious gospel car move on, bearing down all adverse principles and powers, till the flag of Christ shall be reared in every land, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen!

Yours, in the best of bonds,
JAMES HOPWOOD.

PITTSBURGH, IA., April 9th, 1840.

Bro. Springer: Since my former letter to you we have had some solemn and precious meetings.
The first of March I held a three days meeting, and organized a class of ten members, several professed religion, and the good work is still going on. On the 29th I held another at Wi-nimack,—the work of reformation commenced on Sabbath. Transgressors were convicted, mourners comforted and backsliders reclaimed while believers were edified and established. I also organized another class of nine members, five of them from the old church, and I expect to organize two more classes in a few weeks.

I have much opposition, but hitherto the Lord has been my helper. On the whole I am glad I yielded so soon to travel, and give myself wholly up to preaching Christ crucified. I think if my heart does not deceive me I feel like resigning myself wholly to the church and to the work of the ministry. Pray for me, I am young and liable to be led astray.

If your paper was more known, in the west, it would help our cause greatly. I would not be without it for $10 a year. The more revival intelligence you give, the better my taste is suited. Yours, &c. JOSIAH HOPKINS.

JACKSONSBURGH, O., APRIL 24, 1840.

Bro. Springer: In the Providence of God we are getting along remarkably well on Twin Creek circuit. You have before this received a communication from our beloved brother Dalbey.—
We have just closed a kind of a protrated meeting at Liberty, though it was not got up particularly as such. It was at one of our regular appointments on Sabbath, and as we expected Bro.
Dobbins on Tuesday following, we thought it best to continue the meeting, but it happened that one of our able ministers had to leave, which left brother Dalbey and myself to carry on the meeting, which we did by the help of some good brethren of other denominations—but on Tuesday we were disappointed, as brother Dobbins did not come. We, however, continued the meeting till Tuesday night, received five into society—with a fair prospect ahead for future good. From the general interest taken in the meeting we are persuaded that many others were almost inclined to leave the ranks of the wicked and be christians. At any rate a good impression was left on the minds of the people; they have our respects, and we believe we have their good will.

God speed the good work, and may christian liberty and christian equality spread until the world will be inundated with their beneficial effects. Yours, in the bonds of a peaceful gospel, JOHN H. THOMAS.

ST. CLAIR COUNTY, ILLINIOS, April 17, 1840.

Dear Brother Springer: After my compliments to you, wishing you health and prosperity, permit me to lay before you a brief sketch of our prospects on the Saline circuit. I informed you, in a former communication, that last November, when I commenced travelling this circuit, "I found it in rather an unpromising condition, with but forty-four members. There was then but eight preaching places;
there are now twenty-five, with a class formed at nearly all these places, and one hundred and twelve members, making an increase of sixty-eight, since Conference.
The major part of our increase this year, so far, has been from the old church. We have seven local preachers within the bounds of this circuit; two have been licensed since Conference, and two are from the old church, who have also joined since Conference.

But there is no intelligence, so cheering to the lovers of Jesus, as to hear of a revival of religion. And well it may be so, when those higher orders of intellectual beings, who bend their angelic forms before the divine throne, illumined with the blaze of heavenly glory, and with all their angelic melody, tune and strike the immortal Lyre, then suddenly mounted on their serephic pinions, newly fanned with the breeze of heavenly glory, swift, at the nod of their Creator, fly through the untracked ether, as if to inspect the wide spread dominions of the great Jehovah; then poised on steady wing, hover a while o'er earth, the abode of man, and anon they behold one sinner,—one rebel against the government of heaven's king, with penitential tears approach the mercy seat, and there with humble faith lay hold on Christ as his atoning sacrifice, as his Redeemer. Then suddenly the Saviour comes with garments rolled in blood, with bleeding hands and side and feet and cries behold! behold!! my hands, my feet, my side, for you I spilt my blood, for you I wore the crown of thorns and bore the heavy cross, on which I hung and died, that you might live.

The sinner looks and lives. Then swift the winged seraphs up ascends to bear the joyous tidings to the heavenly songsters: then higher strains of joy rolls from the immortal Lyre. And thus there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. Well then may the saints on earth rejoice when even one sinner is born in the kingdon of grace, and made an heir of bliss.

Many an instance of this kind has transpired on this circuit. At almost every appointment, there appears to be an unusual concern manifested on the part of the unconverted. At a meeting held at a brother Stricklins on my last round, we witnessed a scene truly interesting.
There might be seen the aged sire of seventy years, bending as it were over the grave, approach the anxious seat with streaming eyes calling for mercy, and pardon through the atoneing merits of our blessed Redeemer, and anon rejoicing with a consciousness of pardoned sins.—
And there were those also who had not advanced so far in the journey of life, with trembling limbs and streaming eyes, and throbbing bosoms who approached the mourners bench, crying what must we do to be saved. The work at Bro. Hales is still going on. There has been added to that class nineteen members this year.

I have to regret that I cannot meet my appointments oftener, my circuit being so large that I can only get round once in five weeks. The call for preachers, of our order, is great in this section. I could make one third more appointments in this circuit to advantage, could I fill them.—
The harvest truly is great but the laborers are few. O! that the Lord would raise up and send more; men of clean hands and pure hearts; men that would not shun to declare the whole council of God; with the motto inscribed upon their brow, "holiness to the Lord," and in their hands Mutual Rights and equal privileges. Yours, in the bonds of a peaceful Gospel, WILLIAM PATTERSON.

THE TRIUMPHS OF FAITH.

The human mind is constituted to believe in an intelligent First Cause of all things, and in its own advancing and immortal destiny. When this faith is an abiding inhabitant of the heart, and exerts a living influence over its feelings, and the outward expression of them, it is indeed the best gift of God to man. It comprehends all that the most ardent wishes of the heart can desire, all that its most soaring ambition can seek—endless life, boundless knowledge, and unchanging happiness.

To no human being are the things of futurity of small moment. There is a deep and inextinguishable interest in the myteries of the unseen World; for there are the loved and the lost of this, and thither the footsteps of each survivor are rapidly hastening. That shadowed and cloud-wrapped futurity! How often do its secrets crowd upon the mind, and mock its irresponsible, but fruitless question-ings! How eagerly does the mind grasp at any thing however slight that promises to raise the veil! How easily does it give credence to those who profess to dissipate its darkness without sufficiently testing the authority of them credentials?
The metaphysician has grown grey in his speculations on the nature of the soul and died and left the reality unfound.—
The hour of dissolving nature has been watched to see if the last stern conflict could throw any light upon the pathway of the departing spirit. The student has entered into the very theatre of its operations and dissected the fibres of its tenement, but found no trace of the wonderful tenant. The machinery were all there but at rest, for the operator was gone.—
The keys of the instrument were all there —but the music was silent, for the musician had fled. The baffled inquirer turns from his feeble efforts, to divine promise —from the darkness of his powers to the lights of faith.

The mind is not satisfied with earthly joys nor earthly things. It seeks something purer and more exalted than the best and noblest of this world. Its feelings of veneration that are inherent, demand an object on which they may flow unchecked by the errors and imperfec-tions which cling to the most perfect of mortals—in one word they demand a God. Faith supplies that want—she reveals that object in the Deity.

The mind seeks also a home for its splendid creations, and would fain realize its brilliant illusions, and embody somewhere its cherished idols of beauty and excellence, which here find no counterpart. Faith promises a world where each innocent hope shall be fulfilled—each pure and holy aspiration be satisfied.

In the weakness of our nature, is the triumph of faith. It is not in the sunny hour of prosperity that her full value is felt, and of course acknowledged: but when the storm has arisen, and the frail vessel rocks wildly on a tempestuous sea;
when the winds and waves make fearful strife around, and bury her in the deep:
—then how welcome is the voice which says: "Fear not, thy Father's at the helm." There is bliss in the assurance and fear and sorrow are lost in filial trust; for a father will not, cannot make shipwreck of his trusting children.

And how often is that assurance needed in the varied events of life; for grief here is a familiar word. The cup of felicity is dashed from our lips, or drops of bitterness mingled with its sweets, for we are born to weep from cradled infancy to that second childhood that totters on the brink of the tomb. The social affections are but "founts of tears;" change and death are every where busy with earthly love. There are moments when all consolation is utterly vain, save that which flows from a reliance on the wisdom and goodness of our Father in Heaven. These moments are when the feeble pulse grown feeble beneath our touch; when the eye grows dim as we gaze, and the labored breath is rapidly sinking into that awful mysterious stillness, which the loudest thunders cannot disturb nor the still more potent agony of the broken heart. Life has no more terrible moment —faith no sterner trial than when love watches by the death-bed of a friend.—
Then the wealth of worlds would be given with gladness to stay the parting spirit in its flight, and the hope that we shall meet again, is dearer than the richest of earthly blessings. Well may reason tremble on her throne as the sceptic looks upon the once animated clod never again to be kindled with the fire of intellect; well may he lament in inconsolable bitterness the hour that woke him into being; well may he pray for the dreamless slumber that shall steep his sorrowing spirit again in unconsciousness never to be broken; that shall wrap the mourner and the mourned in the same external repose.

Happy are the children of faith, for to them misfortunes have lost their sting.
Happier than the monarch on his throne,
the conqueror with the flush of victory on his brow, or the philosopher in "the eyry of his eagle thought," are these often despised believers in the Most High;
these humble dependants on his parental care. To them the dark passages of life are all bathed in sunlight from above.
To them the grave is but an entrance to a more glorious mansion in their "Father's House;" the place where the mortal puts on immortality. P.

Mason, Dec. 1839.

PHRENOLOGY.—The Greek philosophers taught that the brain was the organ of intelligence, because, that deep thinking produced a sensation in the head; but it had probably never occurred to them, that the study of mathematics would produce a sensation in one part; the study of music in another; whilst reasoning upon man's consciencious duties, would cause the same in a third.

In the economy of the animal organization, is not every part put in requisition constantly, while the animal is awake, and no one organ allowed to be idle, except, indeed, thirty-six of the thirty-seven organs of the brain?

Now what good reason is there for supposing that the great mass of a man's brain remained unemployed, when that is so contrary to all of the known natural laws of organic life?

Why should we believe in one organ, or class of organs, by the action of which, we universally have moral thoughts and inclinations, with another, the opposite, which produces only evil thoughts and sinful acts?

The same member slanders that speaks consolation; the same member wields the murderous dagger, that is extended to relieve the oppressed, and why may not the same mental apparatus think one thought to-day, and have a thought contrary to the first, to-morrow?

When a man changes his mind, or thinks opposite to what he formerly tho't is not his whole mind changed, or is there a little portion which still holds to the former opinions?

And is it not a fact, that many noted infidels, such as Voltaire, of France, Knee-land of our own country, and others, have had a large developement of that organ, which is said to inspire with religious veneration; and if so, shall we not infer that the organ which should produce pity is apt to produce irreligion?—*Charleston

A FUNNY CASE.—Tuesday the Coroner was summoned to the City Prison to hold an inquest upon the body of Joseph Bernard, who was represented to have died drunk in his cell on Saturday night.
On summoning a jury and submitting the body to an examination, Joseph rose up suddenly from his couch, and stoutly denied the charge that he had departed life. Some of the jurymen were much appalled at his sudden resurrection, and could not get over their fright until they had adjourned to a neighboring public house, and taken something to sooth their disturbed nerves. As for Joseph, he was taken instantly before Justice Wyman, who imposed a fine of $3 and costs upon him for shamming dead. In the course of a few hours his employer appeared and paid his fine, at the same time stating that it was the first time he had known Joseph to transgress from sobriety, he being in the main a respectable and industrious young man.—N. Y. paper.

CORONER'S INQUESTS.—Singular Position of a Dead Man.—Monday night at 12 o'clock a watchman discovered the body of a black man, standing upright against the iron railing of a house in Gold street. On further examination it was found that he was hitched to the railing by the waistband of his pantaloons.
On taking the body to the watch-house and examining it, the fact was ascertained that he had died of intemperance; and it is supposed that some mischievous persons had met the unfortunate man while he was drunk, and hitched him to the railing where he died. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of death from intemperance.

The Coroner held two other inquests at the City Prison—First, upon the body of Elizabeth Burgan, a poor, miserable, drunken creature, who came in yesterday and requested that she might be sent to the Penitentiary, but died shortly after, being committed to a cell. Verdict, as above.—Also, upon the body of James Campbell, who was brought in by his friends, who had been refused admittance for him at Bellevue, and who had no other place to bestow him. Verdict, death from delirium tremens.—ib.

MANKIND AT THE BEGINNING OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.—They had neither looked into heaven nor earth, neither into the sea nor land, as has been done since; they had philosophy without experiment, mathematics without instruments, geometry without scales, astronomy without demonstration; they made war without powder, shot, cannon, mortars—nay, the mob made their bonfires without squibs or crackers; they went to sea without compass, and sailed without the needle;
they viewed the stars without telescopes, and measured altitudes without barometers; learning had no printing presses, writing no paper, no ink; the lover was forced to send his mistress a deal board for a letter, and a billet doux might be the size of an ordinary trencher; they were clothed without manufactures, and their richest robes were the skins of the most formidable monsters; they carried on their trade without books, and their correspondence without posts; their merchants kept no accounts, their shop-keepers no cash-books; they had surgery without anatomy, and physicians without materia medica;
they gave emetics without ipecacuanha,
and cured agues without bark.

THE KING CONSORT.—Our friend of the Philadelphia Gazette, thus pictures the newly wedded Albert, of England.

The countenance of his Highness is round, and devoid of color; the forehead, moderate, its greatest breadth being above the other angle of the eye, forming projections where phrenologists place the organs of music and order. The hair worn, straight, and entirely off the forehead, is not what is termed "fair," but is of a light hue, much like that of her Majesty.
The brows are broad, lowest at the inner angle, and but slightly arched. The eyes, cheerful in expression, are of a greenish hazel, and not large. The nose rather large, with a slight depression below the bridge, and another rise at the point, somewhat similar in profile to that of the late Lord Byron. The mouth is moderate, the lips well colored, surmounted by a narrow, short moustache, which with the brows and eye-lashes, are rather lighter in tint than the hair. In figure his Highness is slight, and not tall; but his carriage is erect, and his movements active. Such is the husband of the British Queen. Of her features, the world has heard every shade of verdict, from the faintest praise to the loftiest eulogy.

A NEW MODE OF GETTING A LIVING.—
We yesterday saw one of the oddest tricks employed to "raise the wind" that ever entered into a mortal's head. We were sauntering about the Levee, in the vicinity of the lower market, when our attention was attracted by a Dutch woman who stood directly before a bag of coffee, with her toes within six inches of it.

What excited our curiosity was, that she kept ever and anon looking first over the river, then down at her feet, and then round about. Observing this, we approached her as stealthily as we could, when we saw, snugly concealed beneath her dress, a child of some five or six years old, with a case-knife in its hand, boring into the coffee-bag as industriously as a bee, and pouring the avails of its predatory occupation into a kind of receiver, prepared by its mother for the purpose, in the front part of its dress.—New Orleans Sun.

Sir Walter Raleigh having told Queen Elizabeth one day that he had a favor to beg of her, she said to him, "When will you cease to be a beggar, Sir Walter?"
"When your gracious majesty," replied he, "ceases to be a benefactor."

WESTERN RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

WEDNESDAY, ... MAY 6, 1840.

We give below extracts from sketches of the history of the two present candidates for Governor at the ensuing election, in this State, a given by their friends respectively. As our paper is read by both the political parties, each may be gratified by seeing the incidents which relate to his man. It would seem that they are both Log Cabin men, and both very clever fellows

THOMAS CORWIN.

The gentleman whose name stands at the head of this article, having been nominated at the late Harrison Convention, as a candidate for Governor, it may be interesting to the people of the Buckeye State to know something of his history in early life and in the private circle.—His public career, especially since he took his seat in Congress, in Dec. 1831, is known to the nation, and requires neither notice nor comment. It would not be saying too much, perhaps to assert in general terms, that he has distinguished himself in the National Legislature, for industry, ability, integrity and eloquence, beyond any man of his age in that body. Political friends and opponents have borne testimony to the truth of this position, and it therefore requires no confirmation.

Mr. Corwin was born in Kentucky, in 1794. His father, the late Matthias Corwin, sen., who served many years in the Ohio Legislature, and whose name yet appears to many of our statutes, as Speaker of that body, removed with his family to Warren county, in the fall of 1796 and settled on a small farm near to which the town of Lebanon was afterwards laid out and where he remained until his decease in 1829. After a long and faithful service in the Legislature, the elder Mr. Corwin was appointed an associate Judge of Common Pleas for Warren county, which place he filled acceptably to all until his death. Judge Corwin was one of the few men who had no enemies. As a private man, as a most faithful and devoted member of a christian church and as a public officer his character was unimpeached and unimpeachable.

Thomas Corwin's life may be said to have begun in Ohio, then the Northwestern Territory. The first school he entered was in the fall of 1797. It was a a low rough LOG CABIN put up in a few hours by the neighbors who formed the little settlement, and stood on the north bank of Turtle creek, about half a mile west of the place where the town of Lebanon now stands. This school was then taught by the late Judge Dunlevy, of Warren county, the intimate friend of Judge Corwin, and to his latest hours the warm supporter of his talented pupil.

This school was soon left by Judge Dunlevy, and in fact there was nothing like a regular school in the neighborhood until the year 1806, when the Rev. I. Grigg, opened one under more promising prospects in Lebanon, which had then been laid out about 3 years, and contained 40 or 50 families. Mr. Grigg, however, only continued his school about two years, and his favorite pupil Tom, as he was familiarly called, could only attend during the winter months, his services being required by his father in the busy farming season in the field. It was here, however, that Tom completed most of his college education. An elder brother, the late Matthias Corwin, jun., of Warren county, was at that time put to school with a view of giving him a classical education, and their father being unable to educate more than one son, intended Thomas for a farmer; Matthias was furnished with a pretty good collection of school books for the times, and it was to this circumstance that Thomas Corwin is indebted for the higher branches of education. About the year 1813, up to which time he had labored incessantly during the busy part of the year on his father's farm, and driving his wagon he received an injury on his knee, loosening the cap, and rendering him incapable of pursuing hard labor or even walking any distance. With this wound he was laid up for some time, and it was then that his brother's books were found most opportune aids. To these he betook himself with intense application, and before the crack of his wagon whip and his shrill voice at the plough, had well died away in the ears of his neighbors,—

"He was a scholar,
And a good and ripe one."

But I must go back a little. During the fall of 1812, when by Hull's surrender, so many troops were so suddenly called on our northern frontier, the soldiers at times suffered for provisions.—Hull's disgraceful capitulation had completely defeated and deranged all the arrangements of the government. There were no supplies of provisions at any point, in readiness. The patriotism and activity of our citizens had to furnish these on a sudden emergency. But notwithstanding every effort, they could not be sent with the rapidity and to the extent required for the army's comfort.—This call for provisions reaching Judge Corwin, he sent his team to aid in this work of benevolence, and his son Thomas, the subject of this article, at his own request, undertook the laborious and hazardous task of driving it. And if we had one of the best commanders, at the time in the person of GENERAL HARRISON, now candidate for President of the United States, we had at the time one of the most expert wagoners, to supply us with provisions in the person of THOMAS CORWIN, now candidate for Governor of Ohio.

Mr. Corwin's elder brother, Matthias, then commanded a volunteer infantry company, and belonging to the same battalion, the writer was very intimate with Captain Corwin, and from this circumstance came to a knowledge of the last mentioned event in Thomas's life. And having known Captain Corwin well, I cannot forbear from paying one tribute of respect to his memory here, though it may be thought out of place. He was a kind and affectionate officer, a brave soldier and an honest man. I have preserved a small memento of him, on which I have inscribed his name, followed by the simple words, "INTEGER HOMO ET AMICUS," an honest man and a friend.—Unfortunately, Captain Corwin, soon after his return from the army, applied himself too closely, to the sedentary life, yet laborious duties of the Courts in Warren county, which, while they hid his talents, gradually undermined his constitution. He died respected and beloved, in the year 1823.

In 1815, Tom Corwin having completed his education as above mentioned, entered the law office of Judge Collett to study that science. To this object all his energies were bent until 1817; when he was admitted to the bar. He had already exhibited his powers in debate, in private clubs, and his success as an eloquent advocate was anticipated by all who knew him. But the profundity of his legal attainments surprised even the high expectations of his friends. He at once established a character at the bar, for legal acumen and eloquent advocacy which few men ever attain, with all the study and exertion of the 20 years referred to by Lord Coke as necessary to make a lawyer and civilian.

In 1820, Thomas Corwin was elected a Representative for Warren county in the State Legislature, where he soon distinguished himself in opposing a bill introduced for the purpose of punishing petty crimes by whipping instead of fine and imprisonment in the county jail. He was successful and defeated this odious measure at that, and it is believed, at the succeeding session to which he was again returned a member.

Long before he was elected to Congress he was urgently requested by his friends in different parts of the district, to be a candidate for Congress. But having some friends whose hopes of success for the same place would have been blasted had he consented to run, he declined from year to year until 1830, when he consented to be a candidate and was elected, though the district composed of Butler and Warren, was by a decided majority in favor of General Jackson. The people of both counties, however, knew him and party could not detach them from his support. His course in Congress is too well known to require any mention here.

Mr. Corwin is in moderate circumstances. Had he been a money making man he might have been independently rich. His practice at the bar has been extensive, and he is the first man known to the writer who retained and attended to it, though he held and faithfully filled a seat in Congress. The amount which he might have hoarded from his practice, would have been great, had he been as exact about fees as some other gentlemen of his profession. But he was careless of collecting his fees, and his purse strings were too loosely held to retain what he did realize. He is distinguished for his liberality. He has been a father to the fatherless and a friend to the widow and has bestowed a handsome estate, as the writer wells knows, in charity, and in aiding such as required assistance. It would not be proper to be more particular on this point, not because truth would not warrant it, but delicacy to the feelings of others forbids it.

The above is a brief but true sketch of the life, and character of Thomas Corwin. The writer has known him well and intimately from childhood, in all his varied scenes of life, at school, on his father's farm, in his legal studies, and for 20 years at the bar. While Mr. Corwin has at all times been an intimate and most valued friend and companion of the writer, this plain statement of facts is made without his knowledge, and free from even the slightest obligation for any favor had of or expected from him. The people should know something of the candidates for Governor, and with this view alone I have drawn this hasty sketch.

Mr. Corwin is not—his friends are not ashamed of his humble employments, in early life. Labor in any useful department of business, is honorable to all. No man of sense views it otherwise or thinks the less of a Statesman because he is or has been a mechanic. In fact other qualifications concurring, it should be a recommendation. Did our executives and legislators know by experience what it is to obtain a livelihood by hard labor, they would have more fellow feeling for the great body of the people.

WILSON SHANNON.

The attitude in which this gentleman stands to the people of Ohio—having been placed in nomination for their suffrages, for the office of Governor—induces the writer of this to give some incidents in the early history of Mr. Shannon and his family. They follow:

Mr. Shannon's father was of Irish parentage, a native of Pennsylvania; he was amongst the foremost to take up arms in the struggle for liberty, and served in the army during the whole of the revolutionary war. At the close of the war, he settled in western Pennsylvania; from thence he removed to Ohio county, Virginia, where he resided for several years—and subsequently (in 1800) removed to Ohio, and set himself down in the forest in the western part of Belmont county. In the winter of 1803 he was found dead in the woods, having been frozen to death while on a hunting excursion. He left a widow and nine children, (of which Wilson was the youngest.) They were possessed of no real estate, and such articles of personal property as were common with the first settlers of the country.

Before noticing immediately the subject of this sketch, the writer will, so far digress as to speak of Mr. Shannon's elder brothers. First to show that the Shannon family has rendered the country some service—and second, to invite the young men of Ohio to the spectacle, ennobling as the writer conceives it, of so many brothers rising from poverty and indigence, to stations of honor and distinction, by their own industry, energy and probity.

The eldest brother (George) in 1802-3 crossed the Rocky mountains with Lewis and Clark; after an absence of 3 years he returned. Subsequently, on a second trip up the Missouri river, in th service of the Government, he lost one of his legs in a battle with the Indians. Being then unfitted for active life, he turned his attention to books, and through the kindness of Lewis and Clark; with what means he had of his own, he received a liberal education, studied law in the city of Philadelphia, and commenced the practice in Louisville, Ky.—held the office of District Attorney for the Commonwealth seven years—represented Fayette county (Lexington) for three years in the Legislature—was appointed and held the office of Judge of the Superior Court 7 years, and then resigned it and removed to the State of Missouri—where he held the office of Attorney for the United States District Court until 1836, at which time he was elected to represent the county of St. Charles in the Legislature, but died before taking his seat.

Thomas (next to George) served a term in the army during the late war—commanded a company—served several sessions in the House of Representatives from Belmont county—represented the Belmont District in Congress—and has been twice elected to the State Senate, of which he is now a member.

John served a term in the army during the last war.

James entered the army as an ensign in the regular service, and served until the close of the last war. He then studied law with Judge Harper, of Zanesville, Muskingum county, Ohio, and commenced the practice in Wheeling, Va.—represented that county two years in the General Assembly—removed to Lexington, Ky.—received from Gen. Jackson the appointment of Minister to Guatamala, and died on his outward trip on the coast of Honduras.

David served his time at the printing business—removed to Kentucky, and received a liberal education in Transylvania University—studied law, and subsequently accompanied Gen. Jackson into Florida, where he took charge of the Territorial Government—was appointed Territorial Judge, and after an eighteen months residence, died in Pensacola.

We come now to the subject of our sketch.

Wilson Shannon was born in Belmont county, Ohio, February 24th, 1802.—From the time he was able to labor, he assisted his mother in gaining a livelihood—occasionally going to school in the winter—he assisted in subduing the forest and labored in her service until the year 1818. He was then sent by his brother James to the Ohio University, at Athens, on Hocking river, where he remained one year—from thence he went to Transylvania University at Lexington, Ky., where he remained two years, and then returned to Belmont county, Ohio, and commenced the study of law. He has resided at St. Clairsville ever since, in the practice of his profession.

In 1832 he was nominated by the Democrats of the Belmont district, and ran for Congress. Although he ran considerably in advance of his party in his own county, [Belmont,] he was defeated in the District by a majority of 36 votes.

In the fall of 1833, he was nominated for the office of Prosecuting Attorney for Belmont county, and was elected by a majority of about eleven hundred votes. In the fall of 1835, he was re-elected to that office without opposition.

He now stands before the people of Ohio a candidate for their suffrages for the Gubernatorial trust; and whatever may be the result, his friends, those who know and appreciate his talents and his worth, will give him an ardent and vigorous support; confident, if elected, he will so fulfil the trust, as to place him among the brightest ornaments of our great and prosperous State.

Inured to hardship in early life—he knows and appreciates the wants of the people; while his vigorous intellect, his legal attainments & his thorough reading and investigation in the political science, admirably qualify him for a statesman.

ARMS AND MUNITIONS OF WAR.—The following statement exhibits the present resources of the United States in arms and munitions of war. There are now in the arsenals, 600,000 muskets, ready for use, besides 400,000 that have been distributed by the general government to the respective states; 3000 pieces of heavy cannon, an abundant supply of ball and all kinds of projectiles. There is a sufficient store of materials to manufacture 5000 pistols and swords per month. The amount of powder on hand is stated at 12,000 bbls. with materials for 4000 more.

A GLANCE AT THE OLD WORLD.—Our advices from the Old World are down to within a month of the present period.—A brief notice of the existing condition of affairs among the older empires, may not be considered without some interest.

Great Britain has, for some time past, been enjoying a condition of much repose. The young Queen is certainly very popular, while her husband, Prince Albert, has conducted himself with marked propriety, considering the dizzy eminence to which he has been elevated. No better illustration of his winning and plausible course can be afforded, than the way in which his name is made use of by the people at large. Thus, we are told that John Bull is Albertising every thing.—Braham's St. James' Theatre is called "The Prince's Theatre." An ironmonger at Pimlico has a culinary invention ycleped "The Albert gridiron." A tobacconist placards the town with bills of "Real Albert Cheroots," and a snuff called "Prince Albert's Mixture." A penny pieman announces his 'cheap Albert pies.' A gin-shop sports "Albert cordial at 2d. a glass." Another spirit dealer has a run upon that species of gin called "Prince Albert's cream of the valley, only fourpence a quarteen." A tailor in the Edgeware road placards his shop windows with "Trousers cut in the Halburt stile, thirty shillings the pare; 2 happrentices wonted. N.B. Loggins to let."

The Queen, moreover, appears very fond of her husband, and disposed to shower upon him every description of honor. This is right and natural, and provided the matter be not carried too far, cannot but have a most salutary tendency. The manufacturing Districts of England is in a less flourishing condition than formerly; but the Chartists having been subdued, we hear of no popular disturbances. Ireland is especially quiet, while the progress of Father Matthew, in inculcating the principles of temperance, may be justly pronounced the greatest moral revolution of modern times. He has succeeded in securing nearly 1,000,000 members to the various Total Abstinence Societies.

The trouble with China is an event of considerable importance. It may lead to mighty results; but our present impression is, that the Chinese will speedily yield before the powerful British armament dispatched to that quarter, and thus, the difficulty will be brought to a close. That is to say, if Great Britain be desirous of such a determination. We have heard it suggested that the opium trouble was merely a pretext, and that the movement of Great Britain had a deeper object, and was intended as a counter movement to that of Russia; whose gigantic ambition has long been a source of distrust to the British Government. This speculation appears rather wild. In relation to the policy of Russia, the following brief view may not be without interest.

When the Government of this vast empire saw the movement of the British army into Affghanistan, so judiciously planned, and so vigorously, gallantly, and successfully conducted—fearful that British power might obtain too great an influence in the political affairs of the Affghans,—the Emperor Nicholas resolved to make a counter move; and, looking over the map of Asia for a convenient route, fixed upon that of Khiva. A pretence was readily found, and the Russian troops were sent to chastise the Khan and his people, for injuries committed, or alledged to have been committed, against Russian subjects, as well as against the commercial allies of Russia. The southern boundary of Khiva, touches the southern part of Cabul, in possession of the British, and Russia, it is announced, will retain Khiva, at least as long as Cabul is occupied by British troops. The subjugation of Khiva is looked upon as inevitable; an army of 32,000 men, with a large force of artillery, having been despatched against the Khan of that State, whose subjects are estimated at only 300,000 souls. Still it is represented that Khiva, however little known in Europe, and however insignificant it may be deemed, is not an adversary to be despised. For more than a century it has been a predatory State, formidable to all its neighbors, and above all to Russia, precisely because the latter is separated by an immense, desolate and inhospitable steppe; for the privations and suffering to which the troops are exposed on their march through it, are the most effective auxiliaries. About 17 or 18 years ago, an expedition of nearly 10,000 men, was sent against them for several seasons, and did indeed get within sight of the walls of Khiva, but in such a miserable condition that the general did not venture an attack, but faced about and returned home, with his troops greatly reduced in numbers. The naturalist who accompanied the expedition, was strictly enjoined not to publish any part of his journey for ten years. If the Russians having now acquired a more complete acquaintance with the steppe, and the situation of the great nest of banditti, should be able to conduct an army to the walls of Khiva with less loss than formerly, we are not to believe that they will have light work with a population supposed to amount to 300,000 souls, of which all the males have been accustomed, by their profession as banditti, to the use of arms.

The Turco-Egyptian question remained still unadjusted; while Mehemet Ali persisted in his preparations for defence, and also in his demands as well for the sovereignty of Egypt as of Syria. It is believed, however, that the subject will be ultimately settled without bloodshed.

France is quiet, but still excited. M. Thiers, the new Minister, will not, it is believed, be likely to retain his place for any great length of time. He does not enjoy the personal confidence of the King, and is still less likely to secure the confidence for any considerable period of the majority of the Chambers. The morals of Paris are represented as in a deplorable condition. During a single night of the Carnival, as many as 4000 masked balls took place. It is computed that 200 musicians officiated on the occasion, and that 200,000 persons participated in the various scenes. One would suppose from these facts, that Paris was the happiest city in the world, and yet, a highly respectable journal of that city, furnishes this appalling picture:

"There are, in Paris, myriads of individuals, without hire or lodging, who rise in the morning, not knowing how they shall subsist in the course of the day. A great number of them seek shelter, at night, under the arches along the quays, or in the stone quarries; and those the most dexterious, who have contrived, by tricks often culpable, to get a little change, assemble at night in houses of ill-fame, in several notorious streets, where they are received without search or inquiry.—When those dormitories are filled, the last comers take refuge in a species of tan-yard, near the Halle, where their slumbers are frequently disturbed by importunate visits from the police. On Wednesday night, no fewer than forty-eight poor creatures were taken from this miserable asylum to the Prefecture, as vagabonds. Among them were many who had been discharged from the hulks."

We have equally discouraging accounts from other quarters; all going to show that the French metropolis is among the most dissipated in the world.

But our limits are exhausted. We may give another glance at "matters and things" across the water, as events and opportunity may suggest.—Bicknell.

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.

Their Commercial Intercourse.—We alluded a week or two since, to the commerce between the United States and the principal nations of the world. As the relations between Great Britain and the United States, are of the deepest importance to mercantile men, the following outline, condensed from the valuable report of Mr. Forsyth, will not be deemed unimportant. Great Britain now admits the vessels of the United States into her ports on payment of the same tonnage duties and charges as British vessels.

This liberal provision, however, is qualified and restricted by the conditions upon which, alone, the cargoes of such vessels are entitled to the benefits of the treaty stipulations.

These conditions are, that the vessel be built and owned in the United States, and navigated by a master and a crew three-fourths of which are citizens of the United States—our own navigation laws being satisfied if the master and two-thirds of the crew are American citizens; and that the goods composing the cargo be the produce of the United States, which, in practice, limits the import trade to the direct intercourse between one country and the other.

She allows them to clear out for any foreign country, whether laden or in ballast; whether laden with national or any other produce; and for her principal settlements in the East Indies, with British produce ions.

2. She admits the productions of the U. States to entry, either for consumption or re-exportation, on payment of the same duties and charges as similar articles, the produce of any other foreign country, whether imported in British or American vessels; subject, however, in the latter case, to the condition above mentioned with reference to the character of the vessel and her crew.

She prohibits the importation, in American vessels, of the productions of any country but the United States, whether from the United States, the country of production, or any other country.

When re-exported, the productions of the United States are allowed the same drawbacks as similar productions of other countries, whether orignally imported in American or British vessels; and other goods the same bounties on exportation, whether exported in American or British vessels.

The trade of the United States with the British colonial possessions is regulated, viz: With the East Indies by treaty stipulations; with the West India and other American possessions, by diplomatic arrangement.

In the four principal settlements in the East Indies, viz: Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Prince of Wales Island, to which Singapore has since been added by diplomatic arrangement, the vessels of the United States are admitted on the footing of the most favored European nation—that is, they pay the same tonnage duties and charges as vessels of the most favored European nations, whether laden or in ballast, and whether laden with productions of the United States, of other foreign countries, from the United States—of Great Britain, from Great Britain,

And they may clear out, if in ballast, for any country; but, if laden, for the United States only, where the cargoes must be unladen.

The commercial intercourse of the United States with the colonies of Great Britain in America, that is, the West India Islands, the settlements on the South American continent, and the North American possessions, continental and insular, is regulated by legislation giving effect to diplomatic arrangements.

That trade is, under British legislation, limited to the following places, which are created free ports, viz:

Kingston; Montego Bay; Santa Lucia; Antonio; St. Anne; Falmouth; Maria; Morant Bay; Annotto Bay; Black River; Rio Bueno; Port Morant; Old Harbor, the Island of Jamaica; St. George, Grenada; Ronan, Dominica; St. John's, Antigua; St. Joseph's, Trinidad; Scarborough, Tobago; Road Harbor, Tortola; Nassau, New Providence; Kingston, St. Vincent; Port St. George & Port Hamilton, Bermuda; any port where there is a custom house, Bahamas; Bridgetown, Barbadoes; St. John's; St. Andrew's; Magaugadavic, Miramichi, New Brunswick; Welch Pool, Campobello; Halifax; Pictou; Digby, Arachat, Nova Scotia; Quebec, Canada; St. John's; Harbor Grace, Newfoundland; Georgetown, Demerara; New Amsterdam, Berbice; Castries, St. Loucia; Basseterm, St. Kitts; Charlestown, Nevis; Ploymouth, Montserrat; Sidney, Cape Breton; Charlestown, Prince Edward Island; Anguilla, Anguilla.

At all these places the vessels of the United States are admitted on payment of the same tonnage duties and charges as British vessels, provided the goods composing the cargo be the produce of the United States, and imported directly from the United States.

They are allowed to clear out, whether laden or in ballast, for any foreign country whatever.

The productions of the U. States, (and similar articles from other foreign countries are not entirely prohibited) are admitted on payment of the same duties and charges as similar articles the produce of any other foreign country; subject, when imported in American vessels, to the same conditions, as to the character of the vessel and her crew, as when imported in the British possessions in Europe.

The importation from the United States of all goods but those of their own produce, is prohibited.

Upon exportations, the same drawbacks, bounties, and allowances are granted, whether the goods be exported or originally imported in American or British vessels.

In the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, vessels and boats of the United States are admitted on payment of the same tonnage duties and charges which are chargeable upon British vessels and boats in the ports of the United States.

For the purpose of securing to British bottoms, a greater share of the carriage of the United States to her Colonies, Great Britain has established various places as free warehousing ports, and also, as warehousing places, for goods brought by land and inland navigation. In this latter list are Kingston, Montreal, Liverpool and Yarmouth. Goods imported into such places, are admitted and warehoused duty free, and conveyed thence in British vesssls, exclusively to other British colonies, where they are admitted as British goods, at a lower rate of duty than those imported directly from the United States.—Bicknell.

OUTRAGE AT WASHINGTON.—A disgraceful affair recently occurred at Washington. A wordy altercation took place between Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, and Mr. Bynum, of North Carolina, when the lie was given by Mr Bynum, and Mr. Garland, in answer to it, seized Mr. B. by the throat, and struck him two or three times. Mr. B. in return, after scratching the face of Mr. Garland, drew a knife. He uttered horrid imprecations in a voice which was heard in the Hall.

Mr. B. was seen by the crowds in the galleries with his knife in his right hand and heard using the most brutal language "liar," "puppy," "scoundrel," &c.

Mr. Garland, no less excited, but more silent, continued to deal heavy blows against his antagonist. As soon as could be, the two members were separated by Mr. Evans and Mr. Banks, aided by those around them. After the separation Mr. Bynum still attempted to reach Mr. G. and to stab him with the knife which he brandished in the air.

The Speaker in the meantime took the Chair. The Sergeant-at-Arms was ordered to arrest the members, but their friends protected them. Both now withdrew from the bar of the House, and partial order was restored. [During the interruption the members had left their places, and all upon the outside of the Hall rushed in. Order was at length restored.]

A Select Committee of five was appointed to investigate the affair. The offender should have been promptly expelled from the halls of Congress. He has not only disgraced himself, but he has tarnished the character of the nation.—Bicknell.

GREAT BRITAIN & THE UNITED STATES.—An English writer has addressed a letter to a Member of Parliament, in the course of which he says;

"But we allude to the danger in which we are placed, of being overshadowed by the commercial and naval ascendency of the United States. It has been through the peaceful victories of mercantile traffic, and not by the force of arms, that modern States have yielded to the supremacy of more successful nations; thus the power and civilization of maratime Italy succumbing to the enterprise of Spain and Portugal, these again were superseded by the more industrious traders of Holland, who, in their turn, sunk into insignificance before the gigantic growth of the manufacturing industry of Great Britain; and the latter power now sees, in America, a competitor in every respect calculated to contend with advantages for the sceptre of naval and commercial dominion."

THE RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

WEDNESDAY, ... MAY 6, 1840.

Since our last issue we have had it excessively wet. From present prospects farmers will have difficulty in getting in their corn.

We have received the May numbers of the Casket and Lady's Book,—both excellent. The former is embellished with a beautiful steel engraving of the Catskill Mountains,—the latter with the fashions colored and uncolored, two pages of music, and a steel engraving—"Warming the Mitten."

We learn from a source to be relied on, that some months ago nine travelling preachers and in the neighborhood of 600 members, have left the Methodist Episcopal Church, within the bounds of the Erie Conference, which lies on the borders of the north east corner of the State of Ohio, on account of oppressive measures of the government of that church. They, at present, sustain a temporary relation to the Congregational Church, awaiting the doings of the present General Conference.

A society of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America, in the neighborhood of this office, have recently passed a resolution to withdraw from the American Anti-Slavery Society, because of that society having taken political grounds. This church as a body, are abolitionists, but cannot go with the present anti-slavery organization because of their identifying the subject with politics. However, the church, in general, we understand, are somewhat divided, some congregations are in favor of retaining their connexion with the American Anti-Slavery Society, but others are for a separation.

Whoever wants to live a semi-hermits life, here's your chance.

The following is from a pious, talented, and wealthy English lady, of retired habits, unmarried and living alone, with whom we are acquainted, and are confident that a female, possessing a similar disposition, would find a delightful home and agreeable society by accepting the invitation.—Ed. of Rel. Tel.

AN INVITATION.—The subscriber is desirous of meeting with a middle aged or elderly female companion, of good common education, truly religious principles, good temper, character, &c., who would be happy in a humble, solitary dwelling and a very economical way of living. Such a christian might, in all probability, find a pleasant home for life by addressing a line to

This though a small snake, is nevertheless the greatest snake TALE we have yet seen.

ASTONISHING CURIOSITY.—Our attention was called yesterday to witness one of the greatest natural curiosities we have ever seen—it was no less than a living snake in the eye of a living horse. The snake is, we should judge, between three and four inches in length, about the diameter of a common darning needle. The left eye of the horse, where it has taken up its abode, is blind, though perfectly transparent. When we saw it, the snake seemed to be in quite a playful mood, and was performing various evolutions, similar to the animalculæ of water, or the worm so frequently discovered in stagnant pools. How it came there is more than we can divine. It is the opinion, however, of some scientifical gentlemen who have examined it, that a small egg has by some means been deposited in the stomach, and conveyed arterially through the blood vessels to the eye, where by a natural process it was hatched. Be this as it may, it is certainly a great curiosity. We suggest to the curious and men of science to go and witness for themselves. The horse may be found at the stables attached to the hotel of Mr. Whitback, Front street, directly opposite the American Amphitheatre.

MAXIMS OF JURISPRUDENCE.—1. Experience shews it to be a principle in government, that men will not ACT until they are made to FEEL; hence it is, that many who approve of liberal government, will not act until power treads upon their toes.

2. The power to interpret law is equal to the power to make law. Grant men power to interpret even the Divine law, and they can prove any thing out of the sacred scriptures, from the assumptions of popery, through the whole range of ridiculous opinions, to the vagaries of Mormonism.

3. All acts of legislatures and decisions of jurists, should proceed upon the maxim, that, when men have power in prospect, they will take hold of it, and when in possession, they will abuse it, if not properly checked; and he that goes upon any other supposition, betrays the very principles on which the fabric of American jurisprudence is reared.

4. Tie the hands of a public functionary, so that he can do no harm, and he will be unable to do any good; grant him the power to do good, and you also give him the power to do harm; the better way, therefore, while you confer the power necessary for the public weal, is so to dispose of it, that it may be recalled when abused, by regular provisions in the government.

5. He that takes into possession unamenable and undelegated power, takes what the Almighty never designed him to have, of course he will not be protected by His providence in the exercise thereof; therefore, its natural tendency is to corrupt the possessor. And for him who holds unlawful power, to pray to God to enable him to use it rightly, would be as ridiculous as for a man of intemperate habits, when pouring down the intoxicating draught, to pray the Most High for grace to use the "good creature" so as not to abuse it.

6. Civil and religious liberty are so intimately connected, that they usually "live and die together," and the same maxims of government, that apply to civil, will equally apply to ecclesiastical polity, because human nature is the same, whether schooled in Church or State.

For the Western Recorder.

EXPLANATION.

Brother Springer: I have just received from the office in this place, 'The Western Recorder' of April 22d. On your third page, first column, you charge me with inconsistency in principle, between my course against the Methodist P. Church in former years, and my present course in favor of Abolitionism. And call upon me for explanation.

In answer, I would say that according to your representation of my former course, I could not attempt to claim consistency in these matters. But in view of the true state of the case, I am not conscious of the least inconsistency whatever.

1st. While the principles of Reform, (as they were called,) were under discussion for 7 years, from 1820 to 1827, I never said a word against the free and full investigation of the merits of the proposed changes. And in perfect keeping with this, I am now in favor of free discussion on the subject of slavery and abolitionism. And the very communication from which you have quoted in the "Observer," proves that I am still in favor of a temperate discussion of the merits of Episcopacy itself, or any proposed modifications in our present form of episcopal government.

2d. When the old reform question changed its course, under Mr. M'Cain, into an attack upon the characters and motives of the worthy dead; and represented the episcopal government of our church as being surreptitiously assumed, through the intrigues of Coke and Asbury, and saddled upon the American Methodists under the professed sanction of Mr. Wesley, while in fact, it was contrary to his views and wishes. In this shape I opposed it firmly as a slander. And in perfect keeping with this course, I opposed any squinting towards the same view, in the Observer. And while I can discover no necessary connexion between a lay representation in our ecclesiastical councils, and ceasing to hold our fellow man as property, at the same time, I am as much in favor of examining and discussing the one as the other.

If you will watch the American Observer for a few weeks, I expect you will find a communication from my pen, under the caption of "Radicalism and Abolitionism," in which you will find some of these matters more fully examined. You will do me a favor by copying it into the Recorder, as it is a kind of a four edged sword, cutting error in all directions.

In conclusion, if you will not consider me intrusive, I wish in my turn, to inquire whether that portion of the Methodist P. Church which now opposes the discussion of the subject of slavery and abolitionism, claim to be consistent with their principles and measures in 1830?

Your's, respectfully, ROBERT BOYD.
Barnesville, O., April 23, 1840.

Bro. B. does not deny the facts we have stated in relation to his case. But, he remarks, he said not a word against the investigation of the old question until it was "changed under Mr. M'Cain into an attack upon the character and motives of the worthy dead," &c. Now this is a very easy way of getting out of the difficulty, by stating that Mr. M'Cain changed the question by attacking the dead. The fact is that Mr. M'Cain, nor no one else, ever said a word against the dead, until the cause of truth required him to expose that subject. When the clergy of the M. E. Church were called on to surrender some of their immense power, they were constantly responding that their system was given them by Mr. Wesley, and that to modify it would be a departure from the principles of Wesleyan Methodism, &c. &c And such statements had a powerful influence with all who held a veneration for Mr. Wesley. Mr. M'Cain, on investigating the matter, being satisfied that Mr. W. never gave his consent to many important arrangements in the government of the American Methodists, but that some of them were imposed upon the church contrary to his express will, felt it to be his duty to expose the imposition, so that truth might have its due influence upon the public mind. His "History and Mystery," so uncovered the nakedness of the Methodist aristocracy, that they became alarmed, and set all the episcopal dogs in the land to bark at him, and soon succeeded in raising such an excitement against him, that any man risked his reputation to attempt to defend him. Now we have read Mr. M'Cain's productions, and the replies to them, and it is our honest conviction that he has ably sustained himself. And we are firmly of opinion that no Methodist, in America, has been more wantonly abused than Alexander M'Cain.

But what had the case of Mr. M'Cain to do with brother B's. treatment towards Brown, Springer and other seceders? They were not the special advocates for Mr. M'Cain; had nothing to do with him; were opposed to the power of the Methodist clergy, no difference whether it were held with, or without Mr. Wesley's consent, because they thought it unscriptural.—They contended for the right of the laity, as scriptural, to be represented in the department which made laws to govern them. For the sake of illustration, we will admit that Mr. M'Cain was in error. But even on this supposition, why should the people in the west, or any where else, suffer for his crime? Will Bro. Boyd agree to be held responsible for all abolitionists do?

My brother thinks he "can discover no necessary connexion between a lay representation in our ecclesiastical councils," and the right of the slave to his liberty. Now, this is the very ground of our complaint against him; herein is precisely where we think his defect lies. He has the keenest vision to perceive all the rights of the colored man, but is as blind as a bat when the rights of the white man are concerned. We do not contend that these rights are exactly the same, but we do contend that the rights of the laity to representation has involved as important consequences, in the history of the world, as the rights of personal liberty. Or in other words, that ecclesiastical bondage, has caused as much misery, in the history of mankind, as ever civil bondage has. In illustration of this opinion we refer him, to the man of sin,—to that iron despotism under which the whole world groaned for centuries. Yea, in his own church, the ghostly power of the clergy, has already gained such ascendancy that he will not be permitted to enjoy his favorite theme of free investigation, nine months longer, unless he do like the slave, run off from his master.

But Bro. Boyd thinks a "portion of the Methodist Protestant Church" has proved recreant to their principles by opposing the discussion of the subject of Abolition. Now, suppose we admit this to be true; should we be held responsible for the misgivings of others. No man in the country has vapored more about free discussion than Dr. Baily, of the Philanthropist, who is at the head of the Abolition press of this State. When he insinuated that we were pledged to silence on the Anti-Slavery question, we proposed to him, to open our columns to what he might write on the subject of American slavery, if he would give us an equal amount of his, for what we might write on the subject of Ecclesiastical slavery. But the Dr. backed out by abusing us and withholding his exchange.

Now, would it be right to hold Mr. Boyd responsible for this ungentlemanly conduct of his brother abolitionist, who abandoned his principles of free discussion in such an ill humor?—But, however, the charge does not apply to us. The General Conference refused to do any act to suppress free discussion on any subject. All our members are opposed to, at least, in this region, is mingling politics with church matters. They wish to keep political and church action separate.

However, we feel kindly toward our brother Boyd, and hope, as he begins to admit the rights of some of his fellow men, he will ultimately see and admit the rights of all.

Howard street Flour has sold from stores on and since Monday at 5 00, 4 75 for common brands; the latter was the predominating price at which sales were made yesterday, although some holders demanded something over that rate. The sales probably did not amount to 1000 bbls.

Molasses is also plenty. Sales in large lots 30 a 31, and to the country 33 a 35 per gal.

Moblie, we are rejoiced to learn, is rapidly recovering from her recent prostrate condition.—New buildings are in progress in various sections of the city.

The first boat left Buffalo on Monday last, for the east. She had on board four hundred barrels of flour, four tons of furniture and eighty passengers.

Six young villains, all between the ages of 12 and 16, have been arrested in New York, for conspiring together and robbing a house. After the robbery, several of them took passage for Michigan.

The New Jersey Rail Road and Transportation Company have reduced their rates of fare. They now charge for passengers to Newark and Elizabethtown 25 cents, to Rahway 37½ cents, and to New Brunswick 50 cents.

We state with pleasure that the line of canal communication between the far west of Ohio and Philadelphia, is now complete. Cargoes of produce have arrived in this city from Cleveland and elsewhere, via the Pennsylvania and Ohio canal, and we now consider that important link in the great chain as complete, and the internal navigation as now secure.—Bicknell, 28th ultimo.

FROM FLORIDA.—"Information," says Bicknell of the 28th ultimo, "has reached Black Creek on the 16th, that a wagon returning from Fort Griffin, and escorted by a non-commissioned officer and six privates, was attacked about eight miles from Fort Fanning. The whites ran off, taking alone one of the escort, who was dangerously wounded. A white man was with the Indians, the leader of the enterprise."

The Committee of Investigation, appointed to examine into the affairs of the State Bank of Indiana, states that of the borrowers, six hundred are stockholders and directors, who are accommodated with more than one-third of the whole, $1,410,193; the same six hundred stockholders and directors are liable as endorses for the additional sum of $1,246,960—making in all nearly three-fourths of the whole circulation of all the Branches that are loaned to the directors and half of the stockholders.—Bicknell.

TOO LATE TO LAST.—Eighteen inches of snow fell at Calais, Maine, on Thursday last se'nnight. All the roads were blocked up.

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY.—Washington, April 14.—The Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning made a report in answer to the Executive and other communications referred to the committee on the subject of the north eastern boundary.

The report, in its general scope and tone, is for peace and expresses the belief that the question will be amicably settled.

THE QUAKER LAWYER.—The New York Commercial in recording the death of the much esteemed and deeply lamented Benjamin Clark of that city, remarks: "He has ever been known as 'the Quaker lawyer'—the only lawyer of that peaceable sect whom we have ever known.—He was a just man and a good man, and, in taking his departure for another and better world, it may safely be said that he has not left an enemy in this."

FOREIGN NEWS.

From the Morning Herald.

New York, Sunday, April 26, two o'clock.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT NEWS.

SIX DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

By the arrival of the packet ship United States, Captain Britton, we have received London papers to the evening of March 31st, and Liverpool to April 1st, (her day of sailing) inclusive.

The news is important and exciting.—There are wars and rumors of wars.—Persia has declared war against Turkey; France has joined Turkey against the Pacha of Egypt. The Russian army is said to have been destroyed in the mountains of Khiva, and the empire of Persia will doubtless be one scene of battle and bloodshed.

The commercial news is no better.—Cotton is down 1-8th. Corn is down.—American flour in Liverpool is one shilling less than at last accounts, and the duty on wheat is 2s less. The money market is comparatively easy, but a dreadful depression still continues in all the manufacturing districts.

THE TURKISH QUESTION.—All the coolness and difficulties between the French embassy at Constantinople and the Sultan, have been removed by the admirable management of the Count de Pontois; but another source of embarrassment in the affairs of the East has arisen, from open hostilities being commenced by the Shah of Persia against the Ottoman Porte, and by the actual march of a Persian army against Bagdad. It appears that this offensive step has been undertaken without a formal declaration of war, though it has been evident, for some time past, that a decided coolness subsisted between both Courts.

THE EMPEROR OF MOROCCO.—It is officially denied in London papers, of March 21st, that the Emperor of Morocco had declared war against France.

There have been several earthquakes in various parts of Scotland.

BRITISH PARLIAMENT.—House of Lords, March 27th.—Clergy Reserve in Canada.—The Archbishop of Canterbury gave notice that the Bishop of Exeter would, on Monday, move for a copy of the despatch written by Sir F. Maitland, dated December, 1827, in so far as it related to clergy reserves in Canada; also a copy of a despatch to Lord Bathurst, mentioned in the said despatch, which contained the views of the legal authorities in Canada upon that question. His grace further gave notice that it was his intention on Friday, the 10th of April, to move an address to her majesty, praying that her majesty would not give her royal assent to the clergy reserves bill, that had received the approbation of the legislature in Canada.

LORD SEATON—Lord Melbourne, on the consideration of the Queen's message regarding Lord Seaton's services, moved an address expressive of their lordships' readiness to concur in her Majesty's wishes to distinguish and reward those services; which, after suitable testimonies to the merits of Lord Seaton, from the Dukes of Wellington and Richmond, was adopted.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.—The London observer of March 29th says—"It is said in the city that authentic accounts, received within the last day or two from Canton river, represent the Chinese merchants as being really alarmed lest the impending war should cause a scarcity of British goods in China; and that in consequence of this apprehension, they were making great efforts to effect an exchange of commodities with the British vessels. Lord Lyndhurst is much better.

FRANCE.—Paris, March 30.—The Thiers' ministry have carried their motion in the Chamber of Deputies, for the grant of a million of francs, £10,000 sterling, as secret service money, by a majority of 86: the number being, for the grant, 286; against it, 160. This was not only a signal, but a very unexpected triumph to the Thiers' administration, for the most sanguine of their supporters did not anticipate a greater majority than 25 at most. The circumstance is regarded as decisive of the stability of the new ministry, and produced a favorable effect on the French funds.

Advices were received in Paris on Wednesday, confirming the news of a declaration of war by the Emperor of Morocco against France. It was supposed that the Bey of Tunis would unite with the Emperor and the Emir Abdel Kader, to endeavor to drive the "infidels" out of Africa. It was likewise rumored that Admiral Rosomel would be sent with a squadron to bombard Tangiers. Thus the war in Africa is about to commence in earnest. The Arab tribes friendly to France are to be supplied with food, clothes, and arms, at the expense of the French Government.

SPAIN.—Cabrera is stated to have discovered treason in his army, and to have shot four officers implicated in it.

The snow and the rain were so heavy as to have interrupted all the movements of the belligerents.

Espertero has made some successful skirmishes and captures.

RUSSIA.—The London Shipping Gazette of March 30th, says—It is currently reported in the city this morning, that the Russian expedition agaist Khiva has been totally discomfitted. The substance of the report is, that the Russians were outgeneralled by their wily opponents retreating before them until they drew them into an ambuscade, where they were so beset on all sides, that they were compelled to abandon their artillery and comissariat, which decided the fate of the expedition. The report rests on the authority of private letters received this morning from Constantinople—and we can no further vouch for its authenticity than that it is very generally credited in the respectable mercantile circles.

TURKEY.—Constantinople, Mar. 3.—We have now more hopes than ever that the Turco Egyptian question will be speedily brought to a satisfactory solution. The last accounts from Europe state positively that France, having perceived the injustice of most of the demands of Mehemet Ali, has decided that she will no longer support him, but co-operate with the other powers in bringing about an equitable settlement. To this effect Nouri Effendi, the ambassador from the Porte to Paris, has, it is said, received directions to proceed to London, and enter into the negotiations which have for some time been going on in that city.

The Post Master at Centerville, Belmont Ohio, returned the 35th No. to us, addressed to W. Hannon, D. Lucas and W. Ault, with this remark: "These gentlemen do not pay their postage, therefore I cannot receive them."—Some time since he gave us notice to discontinue the paper of John Young, assigned as a reason, if we mistake not, that he had "run off." It appears to us that he must have a very indifferent set of people around him. We are surprised that our friends would send us such subscribers as these. Will Bro. Clancy see to this matter, and inform us on the subject?

QUARTERLY MEETING.—The third quarterly meeting for Zanesville circuit, will be held at the Clay Lick meeting house, commencing on Saturday, the 16th May instant, at 1 o'clock. P. M. Bro. John Wilson, Superintendent Newark circuit, and the local brethren, are respectively invited to attend. ISRAEL THRAP.

CAMP MEETING.—We propose to hold a camp meeting, on the farm of John Walker, 3 miles west of Adamsville, Muskingum county, Ohio, to commence on the 4th of June. We solicit the attendance of Bros. Brown, Springer, Marshall, Wilson, Thrap, Fairchild, Davis, Warren and Stephens. P. INSKEEP, Sup.
Adamsville ct.

As the Post Master General has decided that "a post master may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter, if written by himself," it is the same thing for a subscriber to address his letter, enclosing the pay for his paper to a Post Master who is publisher of a newspaper, in his official capacity by which it will come free.

We therefore wish our subscribers to address their letters containing remitances for us, to "C. Springer, P. M. Meadow Farm, Muskingum O.;" also all letters on the official duties of our office as Post Master in the same way. All letters on other business, or business of a private nature should be addressed to us omitting the official signatures P. M. and we will pay for them.

RULES FOR CORRESPONDENTS.

3. When a paper is to be transferred, give the place whence it is to be taken, as well as the place where it is to be directed.

4. In all cases where moneys are paid for papers, receipts should be taken; without these we shall consider our subscribers responsible. Experience in conducting a paper, has shown us that attention to this rule is essentially necessary to secure justice to a publisher.

5. Our paper is $2 per annum on the reception of the first No. On the first opportunity, therefore, be so good as to hand this amount to an agent, or remit by mail, at our risk. If any of our agents have made different stipulations with subscribers as it respects the time of payment, we cheerfully abide their arrangement.—But in all other cases, and in future, we shall expect our "Terms" to be complied with. This will be absolutely necessary to enable us to continue our paper.

OBITUARY.

For the Western Recorder.

"Have pity on me, O my friends: for the hand of the Lord hath touched me."—Job.

Mrs. ABIGAIL BASSETT was a native of Sandwich, Barnstable county, Massachusetts, born October 30th, 1772. In early life she joined the Methodist connexion, with the first fruits of the ministrations of the eminent Jesse Lee, in New England. In 1799 she was married to Mr. Elisha Bassett, who with his family, in 1810, emigrated to the State of Ohio, and settled near Cincinnati. In 1814 she was left a widow, with three children. The death of the pious husband, however, did not in this instance, as is often the case, result in the demolition of the family altar. The widow, in the consciencious discharge of duty, maintained family worship so long as she was head of a family. In the recent governmental discussion which agitated the Methodist Episcopal Church, from the leadings of an enlightened and informed judgment, she was found upon the side of mutual rights and reform. She was numbered with the original 250 who at once seceded in the city of Cincinnati, August 18, 1828. And from the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church, she continued to be identified therewith as a member, until her death.

Mrs. B. was a most affectionate parent. But did she love her children?—she loved the cause of Christ more. Shall the writer be indulged in stating an instance?—She had an only son, whom she like Hannah of old, with many prayers and tears dedicated to God from his birth, with a fervent desire that he might live to be useful in the church. When in the order of Providence, it appeared that he was called to the work of the itinerant ministry, she "conferred not with flesh and blood." In the increasing infirmities of age, and frequent afflictions, she needed an arm of flesh upon which to lean. She observes, in written documents left behind, that her heart bled at the thought of parting with her only son—that her mental sufferings in consequence of the separation are not to be described. "The right hand and eye are gone, and it seemed sometimes," said she, "that I should sink. But when I considered the worth of souls, and that He who had a right, had made it his duty to seek the wanderers and bring them to Christ, I could but say, if I had ten sons, thus called of God, I would not withhold them from Him who lent them to me for for a season." Unto the tenth year has that only son been engaged as an itinerant preacher, most of the time in parts distant from her. And he now feels it the most painful trial of his whole life, that he was called to be more than one hundred miles distant from that dear parent at the time of her dissolution. Extreme debility prevented her from accompanying him to his circuit. She was spending the winter at the kind residence of a relative, Mrs. C. W. Langdon, near Cincinnati, when she closed her pilgrim age.

For several months previous to her dissolution she experienced a progressive decline of the powers of nature, though the writer is not aware that she was a decided subject of disease. Last summer she began to realize a palatal difficulty, which continued and increased until she lost the power of swallowing any solid substance. In addition to this, after a while, her stomach became so weak and irritable, that she could scarcely retain, even for a minute of time, either nourishment or medicine. In this situation, marvellous to tell, she subsisted eleven weeks, her strength and her flesh, the while, wasting away, until life went out. During all her sufferings, she manifested entire submission to the Father of Spirits, as well as confidence in Him, that all should work for good. She several times mentioned to the undersigned, when on a visit to her the week before her death, she had promised the Lord, that by His grace, she would be content to suffer, so long as it should be His will. She expressed a grateful confidence that the Lord was carrying on the work of grace in her soul, and that after she had been sufficiently tried and purified in the furnace of affliction, the great Refiner and Purifier would take her to Himself. She spake of the refiner of silver in illustration. It is said that the refining process is continued until the refiner can see his likeness reflected upon the face of the bright metal. So our heavenly Father, she observed, tries and purifies His children, until they reflect His image,—then are they fitted for His presence. Thus, it is presumed, like the Captain of Salvation, she was "made perfect through sufferings." It is believed that she was for many days previous to her departure delivered from the sting of death. The writer never heard a saint or a philosopher speak in terms of more calm and fearless composure about the cold grave, or express a firmer confidence of immortality, after that "worms have destroyed this body." The Saviour, in whom she so long had trusted, left her not comfortless. She delighted to dwell upon and to repeat all the verses of that double hymn of Charles Wesley's, M. P. Col. pp. 455–456. And we doubt not she has gone to realize the fullness of the closing sentiment:

"I know thee, Saviour, who thou art,—
Jesus, the feeble sinner's friend;
Contented now upon my thigh
I halt, till life's short journey end;
Then, to eternity, I'll prove Thy nature and thy name is LOVE."

Her death took place on the morning of Tuesday, February 18th, 1840, and on the 20th, Bro. Wm. B. Evans, of Cincinnati, attended and preached a funeral sermon, from Deut. xxxiii. 29. May the gracious Saviour lead us on, as "followers of those who through faith and patience have gone to inherit the promises," and with them who now rest in Jesus, may we come to dwell and reign together in the glorious kingdom above.

A. H. BASSETT.

Utica, Indiana, April 15, 1840.

Bro. Springer: It falls to our lot to record the death of sister MARY D. FLOWERS, consort of Dr. F. L. FLOWERS, of this place. Sister F. was born February, 1806, in the State of Maryland, and with her parents moved to this State several years since, and settled in Fairfield county, on the west end of Zanesville circuit, where she professed to embraced religion in 1833, under the administration of our much esteemed brother, H. Sandford, who has since diseased and is now no doubt in heaven, whither his works have followed him. She at the same time attached herself to the M. P. Church, of which she lived a member until the time of her disease.

Her affliction was of about four weeks continuance from the time that she was taken ill. During her illness she complained but little of pain except for the first five or six days. Her mind was tranquil—her peace flowed as a river—and her confidence in God was unshaken to the last, for she knew in whom she had believed, and was persuaded that He was able to keep that which she had committed unto Him against that day. And, although she manifested no fear to meet her approaching dissolution, yet, she at times expressed a desire if it were the will of God that she might live to raise her little family. A day or two before her death, however, she one evening became more than usually engaged in prayer to God, for a complete preparation for heaven, and for a clearer evidence of her acceptance with God. She continued agonizing for some time, when she apparently fell into a deep sleep, and lay in that condition nearly all night, and when she awoke, told her friends of a very special and satisfactory communion that she had enjoyed with her God;—had been permitted to take a very pleasing view of the heavenly world,—to behold the angels and to hear most melodious music, sung by flaming tongues above, and this she imagined she heard at intervals as long as she remained in the body. Ever after this she expressed a desire to depart and be with Christ. When we visited her, on the second evening previous to her death, she requested us to sing the hymn commencing, "And let this feeble body fail," and to pray with her, which we endeavored to do. After prayer we had a conversation with her, in which she told us that she experienced no more anxiety about her family, but cheerfully resigned them into the hands of the Lord, and that if she now had her choice she would rather die and go to be forever with her Saviour.

She then requested the writer to preach her funeral. We promised to try to do so. This was the last conversation we had with her, but was afterwards informed, that, on the following day, she gave her husband charge concerning her children, himself and the disposition that was to be made of her clothing, together with a number of other little domestic affairs, which she did with the utmost composure of mind and with the greatest accuracy. And having thus set her house in order she continued to enjoy a full assurance of eternal life, and was blessed with perfect sanity of mind until the morning of the 7th of the present instant, when she calmly fell asleep in the arms of her Saviour.

"————the traveller of earth unfurl'd
Her trembling wings emerging from the world,
And o'er the path by mortal never trod, Sprung to her source, the bosom of her God."
Campbell.

On the following morning the corpse was conveyed to New Salem, about fourteen miles from this place, attended by a very respectable number of the citizens of the village. A large assembly of relatives and friends attended the funeral, and we tried to address them from Paul's letter to the Philippians, i. 21—"For me to live is Christ and to die is gain." We then committed the body to the tomb and the spirit to the God who gave it, in the use of the beautiful hymn in our collection, page 543:

"Happy soul thy days are ended,
All thy mourning days below:
Go, by angel guards attended,
To the sight of Jesus go." &c.

Sister F. has left a husband with four small children and a number of relatives to mourn her departure. But they mourn not as those who have no hope. Confident of her compiete triumph over the last enemy, they anticipate an association with her in the blessed world above, where

"No chilling winds, nor poisonous breath,
Can reach that healthful shore;
Sickness and sorrow, pain and death
Are felt and feared no more."

Peace to thy remains! Mary. May they slumber in undisturbed repose until the Trump of God shall proclaim the blessed morn when mortality shall put on immortality; then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory." "O death where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?" Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. ISRAEL THRAP.

Brownsville, Ohio, April 22, 1840.

Our beloved brother JACOB NACE departed this life on the 21st of February, 1840. He was born in Baltimore county, Md. in 1810. He was awakened under the preaching of the Rev. Eli Henkle, and soon attached himself to the church. He removed some years since to Dayton, Ohio, where he closed his earthly career. He attached himself to the M. P. Church in this place and remained firm to his integrity until his end.

Just before his confinement he lost his little daughter; while at the grave he was taken ill with an attack of the typhus fever; from the very commencement he told his companions that his sickness was unto death. But he remained perfectly calm and resigned to the will of God, and found that that religion which was his solace in health supported him in the hour of affliction. His wife and child appeared to be very near to him. Just before his departure he enjoined it upon his companion to be careful to raise their son in the nurture of the Lord. And after an illness of nine days, in the midst of weeping friends, he left the militant to joined the church triumphant. Yours, &c.

VARIETY.

In Germany, husbands are masters; in England servants; in France, companions; in Italy, school boys; and in Spain, tyrants.

A Meteor of astonishing brightness was observed passing in a northeast direction over Lancaster, Penn., on Sunday, when the sun was at meridian.

Profusion in expenses, living like your neighbors, and mimicking the manner of high life, are the paths which lead directly to bankruptcy.

If you live according to the dictates of nature, you will never be poor; if according to the world's caprice, you will never be rich.

"Isaac, can you describe a bat?" "Yes sir—he's a flying insect, about the size of a stopple—has India rubber wings, and a shoestring tail; he sees best with his eyes shut."

Somebody has remarked that the Englishman is never happy but when he is miserable; the Scotchman is never at home but when he is abroad: and the Irishman is never at peace but when he is fighting.

Washington Irving, the most vivid, happy and finished writer of our country, is now upwards of fifty years old, but has not the appearance of being more than forty. He enjoys high health both of mind and body. Temperance and a "calm and sunny spirit," are a foundation of perpetual youth.

CENTENARY OF PRINTING.—The Germans are making great preparations to celebrate the fourth centenary of the discovery of printing. Leipsic, the central point of the literary world, will celebrate this glorious event on the 24th 25th and 26th of next June, with great splendor, Felix Mendlessohn Bartholdy is now writing a new oration for the occasion.

A WITTY AUTHOR.—A gentleman accosted a lady in the street with "My dear Mary, I have been at your house—I have placed my life in your hands." "You amaze me—what has happened, speak?" answered the lady. "Only my dear, having written and published my Memoirs I have left a copy for your acceptance," replied the gentleman.

There is a story of a Portuguese shoemaker, who used to give a severe flogging to his wife, every month, just before he went to confession. On being asked the reason of this proceeding, he replied that having a bad memory, he took this method of refreshing it, as his good wife, while under the castigation, was sure to remind him of all his sins.

A QUICK TRIP.—The steamboat Queen of the West recently made a very short trip from Cincinnati to New Orleans and back. The Gazette says:

The Queen was four days and six hours on her way from Louisville to New Orleans and six days and twelve hours on her return. Her entire trip from Cincinnati to New Orleans and back, was made in fourteen days and twenty-two hours.

SUNDAY TRAVELLING.—A judicial decision of some interest to those who furnish means and appliances for Sunday travelling, was lately had at Philadelphia.—"In a case before the District Court to recover damages for injury done to a pair of horses by several young men who had engaged them on the Sabbath, Judge Stroud ordered a non suit to be entered, on the ground that contracts made for the performance of work on the Sabbath were not legal, and therefore the plaintiff could not sustain his case."

Cosroes, king of Persia, in coversation with two philosophers and his vizier, asked—"What situation of man is most to be deplored?" One of the philosophers maintained, that it was old age accompanied with extreme poverty; the other, that it was to have the body oppressed by infirmities, the mind worn out, and the heart broken by a heavy series of misfortunes, "I know a condition more to be pitied," said the vizier, "and it is that of him who has passed through life without doing good; and who is unexpectedly surprised by death."

A FLATTERING PICTURE.—A correspondent of the New Haven Record, writes from Washington as follows—'In respect to religion and social morals, this city has long been in a condition most painful to the American Christian. Pennsylvania Avenue is crowded with grog shops, lottery offices and gambling houses. There are a large number of free negroes in the city, and they constitute a portion of the populaton, of which the citizens make abundant complaint. As many as a thousand of them, in the opinion of the Major, obtain a living by petty thefts. The city is in debt to the amount of $860,000.'

ANECDOTE FROM MARRYATT'S JOURNAL.—An American told me one day, that a company had been working a coal mine in one of the eastern States, which proved to be of a very bad quality; they had sent some to an influential person as a present, requesting him to give his opinion of it, as that would be important to them. After a certain time he forwarded to them a certificate couched in such terms as these: "I do hereby certify that I have tried the coal sent me by the company at ——, and it is my decided opinion, that when the general confiagration of the world shall take place, any one who will take his position on that coal mine, will certainly be the last man burned."

SPEAKING RIGHT OUT.—The Legislature of Maine have adopted a series of resolutions respecting the boundary question, one of which is as follows:

Resolved, That unless the British Government, during the present session of Congress, make or accept a distinct and satisfactory proposition for the immediate adjustment of the boundary question, it will be the duty of the General Govervment to take military possession of the disputed territory, and in the name of a sovereign State, we call upon the National Government to fulfil its constitutional obligations to establish the line which it has solemnly declared to be the true boundary; and to protect this State in extending her jurisdiction to the utmost limits of our territory.

PRODUCTION OF SALT AT ONONDAGA.—According to the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the Onondaga Springs, the quantity of salt made last year was 2,864,718 bushels, being 289,695 bushels more than in 1838. The Superintendent says that, but for the extraordinary embarrassments among the business community during the last three months of the year, the quantity made would have considerably exceeded three million bushels.

The amount of duty collected from their manufacture, at 6 cents per bushel, was $171,885. The Superintendent states that notwithstanding the duties upon salt manufactured in Ohio have been repealed, and the competition of the Virginia salt-works, the Onondaga salt finds it way to Cincinnati, and along the waters of the Upper Mississippi.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

CATHERINE.—Catherine is a little girl ten years old. She loves her Saviour, and loves His cause. A few facts will show this. She values the Bible, and takes a great deal of interest in sending it to those who have none, especially to the poor heathen. She not only saves all the money which she gets, to put into the missionary box, but she takes every opportunity of asking her friends to contribute to this good cause. Her father and brother go to sea, and when they return home, she gets all the cents she can from them to put into the box. One day, a pedler came to her house, and displayed some very pretty combs, which Catherine wanted very much. She importuned her mother to buy her one. But her mother told her she had no money to spare, and that she did not think she needed one. "But, my child," said she she, "if you want one so much, take some of your own money and buy one." Catherine paused, looked wishfully at the combs, and then firmly said, "No, mother, I cannot do that; my money is for the missionaries; I can do without the combs."

Catherine, as you may suppose, prays. One night, about an hour after she had retired to her bed room, her mother was astonished to hear her crying; and going to the stairs, she asked what was the matter. Catherine said she wanted to come down; and being told to come, she appeared crying, and said she had that day told her mother a lie, and she could not pray until she had confessed it, and asked her forgiveness. This being obtained, she went joyfully to her room, prayed, and retired to rest. She rightly judged, that a holy God, who knew every secret of her heart, would not forgive her, until she had confessed her fault to her mother, and obtained her forgiveness.—(Matt. v. 23, 24.)

She has a cousin Mary, about her own age, who came from Boston to see her. They were to sleep together, and her mother and another lady were curious to know whether she would do her duty and pray as usual. So they watched them. Says Catherine, "Mary, do you pray?" "Yes, I say my prayers every night." "Well, do you pray? I mean, read in the Bible and kneel down and pray?"—"No, I never do that." So Catherine opened the Bible, read, and went through with her usual devotions.

One night a Christian lady was to sleep with Catherine, and she sat down and was reading to herself, when she asked Catharine if she would like to have her read aloud. She answered yes. The lady afterwards knelt and prayed, and as she concluded, Catherine proceeded, praying very feelingly for the conversion of her friends, &c., much to the surprise of the lady.

Now Catherine is as lively and playful as other little girls; but she is careful not to indulge herself in any thing sinful. She fears God, and tries to keep his commandments. She loves her fellow creatures, and wants them all to love the Saviour and seek his glory.—Sabbath School Treasury.

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in the city of New York, and devoted to Home and Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by PARK BENJAMIN.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant periodical sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 25.—The situation of New York, and its immense commercial intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intelligence received in our "great metropolis." Availing ourselves of the advantages derived from this source and many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper intended for "our country, our whole country"—warped by no sectional bias—controverting no man's political opinions—unsullied by any thing of an immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of such English works of value as may be conveniently embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of original matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from all the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly, the Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazines; Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, LaBelle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.

We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of three celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which a copyright is not attached.

The editor will especially aim to make The New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full accounts of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to OUR people; while they omit or neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.

We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which fall under the eye of the municipal police. We can see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No ludicrous accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal violations of social order by the ignorant and imbecile.

With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient, and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.

Price of The New World, THREE DOLLARS per annum, payable in advance.

All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

COMMUNICATIONS.

RUSH COUNTY, IA., APRIL 20, 1840.

Bro. Springer: After an absence of upwards f two months, in a section of country where our paper had not one single subscriber, but I rust, ere this time has, I am now at home. In ooking over the several numbers of your pa- er, which have come to hand in my absence, find some notice taken in the 25th, of my com- unication, published in the 11th. One might uppose from the length of the "Vindication," hat something very much calculated to injure he Methodist Protestant Church had been writ- en by me. This, I very much regret, if it should ave this tendency in the slightest degree. I ish and pray for her prosperity—have contri- uted and still am willing to contribute for her dvancement, while ever she adheres strictly to he doctrine set forth in the 5th Article of Re- igion as appears in he Book of Discipline,—to it: "The holy scriptures contain all things ecessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is ot read therein. nor may be proved thereby, is ot required by any man," that it should be elieved as an article of faith, or be thought equisite or necessary to salvation. Again, in he 10th Article of the constitution, where it estricts the legislative assemblies, it is said, t. "No rule shall be passed which shall con- avene any law of God."

Now, Mr. Editor, you, as a minister, I pre- ame, opposed the Methodist Episcopal Itiner- nts, for their assuming a divine right to expound spel doctrines, ordinances and moral discip- ne, &c., &c. This certainly was a topic much velt upon by the first Methodist reformers.— inisters and laymen united their opposition to . Well, suppose we, after all our cry against is limb of the beast, adopt the same principle hd carry it out to practice in our legislative epartment. Will it not be as difficult for us prove our authority, or right to pass acts, or ake rules, or even recommend plans binding our people, which are not found in God's ord? The bare fact of the laity and all parties ncerned, being represented in such assemblies, es not alleviate the difficulty. This brings to y recollection an observation made by a very nspicuous minister of the M. P. Church, and e for whom I entertain the highest respect. id he, "does any wish to know the difference tween us and the M.E Church? I will tell you a very few words; they believe in a divinely. stituted ministry, only, and we believe in a vinely instituted ministry and membership."— ow, Mr. Editor, this I hold to be true, but at e same time, I disbelieve that an assembly of inisters and laymen possess any more author- y to legislate over the faith and conduct of the ints, than the ministers alone have, under eir claim of divine right. The truth is, the postles themselves were restricted to teach ly whatsoever Christ had commanded them, d that, they taught at the risk of their lives. ay God help the ministry of the M. P. Church teach whatsoever Christ has commanded, and at only!

I hope this will not be calculated to mislead, r if we follow Christ in all things, we will not wrong, nor mislead any, but should we follow ter any one of all the different creeds and con- ssions of faith, that I have yet seen, it would calculated to mislead and do injury. Of this ave no doubt; hence, I adopt the language, our system may be much amended." If I have gan at the wrong place, I hope my beloved other, A. H. B. will commence right.

The improvement I wish to make was, first, impress our people with the idea, that it was t guaranteed to them by the Great Head the church to make laws or recommendations the brethren, unless it be in strict accord- ce with God's word. It is only such rules that n be enforced upon intelligent men, in these lightened days. Bro. B. says: twelve or ore circuits and stations attended to it, that , the recommendation by the Conference, and thinks it is to their credit. He also informs s of some ten or more circuits that neglected e course recommended, but adds no credit for em; yet, just preceding, he lets us know he is rry to even intimate, that we have dead stat- es in our code. Now, what becomes of his rping about its being only a recommendation? e pronounces it one of the statutes in "our de," and gives the brethren who carried it out redit, and to those who did not, he gives none. ut as one man's applause is worth about as uch as anothers, those that did not adopt it all have mine. First, because I believe it to e anti-scriptural; secondly, it is contrary to e ways of Methodism; thirdly, and not the ast, because it is made the prerogative, in the h Article of our constitution, of the General onference to devise ways and means for raising nds.

Again, Bro. B. wishes I had quoted fairly from e Report, or let it alone. Well, it is true I d not the Report before me, and according to y respected brother B's shewing, quoted WILL T, when it should have been CANNOT feel ound, &c. Now, if the Conference cannot feel ound, what is the reason the recommendation s taken the ascendency and acts on their inds with the force of a rule? Hence, as the rcuit or station has not complied, we cannot el under any obligation to them. Does not very observer see at once, that the term WILL OT is more excusable than "CANNOT?" My orthy brother, perhaps, is not aware of the npression this Report made on many worthy inds, and those too, who are not inclined to be vetous.

There is no dispute or disagreement between ro. B. and myself about the laborer being wor- y of his reward, &c. But I had much rather e would "quote scripture rightly, or not attempt ." The reader will refer to Deuteronomy 5 and 4: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." Bro. B. has it "that treadeth." In the 9th of 1st Corinthians, it is quoted the "mouth of the ox," &c. Now, it is plain that a man must be at my residence, or table, or corn, before this applies. He must be ploughing, and ploughing in hope too. How can this be done in hope, if it applies to the preachers' pay, when he has it all secure by sub- scription? Yours, as ever, J. J. AMOS.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

MORGAN, OHIO, APRIL 29, 1840.

Bro. Springer: In regard to our church mat- ters. let me say, that though we have not had the copious effusions of the spirit of God, that some other circuits have, yet we have had some gentle showers of grace, some souls have been converted and some additions to the church, and there is a manifest improvement in our member- ship. This circuit, perhaps you are aware, in days of other years, has had serious difficulties, and for sometime doubtful, whether we should live or die; but I think, after a little, the ship will get under way and land safely in port. We have peace in our borders, at present, and Bro. Brown will be here on the 23d of next month, at our quarterly meeting, and we pray God to give us a fresh breeze for glory.

I send you herewith a new subscriber and the pay in advance for the Recorder. Your paper has done a great deal of good among this people, in spreading the principles of ecclesiastical lib- erty; and the revival intelligence is particularly cheering to the friends of Zion; as also in checking the slang of some, that as a people, the Lord does not own our labors and we are coming to naught. Success attend you.

Yours. &c., A. K. EARL.

SUTTON, VA., APRIL 6, 1848.

Bro. Springer: Our second quarterly meeting closed last Sabbath evening week. On account of the rain on Saturday, our congregation was small. We had no ministerial aid, but the Lord was with us. We had a good love-feast, and I was much blest while laboring for my Master.— The brethren appeared much encouraged to go on in the work of the Lord.

I reached my circuit in October, and found, from experience, that I should have some embar- rassments to labor under; the Lord has removed those difficulties, in a degree, and we have some good meetings. The prospects are better and better every day. Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

I preached the funeral, on yesterday, of my much esteemed friend THOMAS HAYMOND, son of Col. John Haymond, aged 41 years and 6 months. He died the 9th of March, 1840. The day before his death, he done a very hard day's work, pruning his apple trees; when the labor of the day was over, he ate a hearty supper, and in company with his companion, walked out into the meadow and returned to the house, when requesting her to make ready and they would retire to rest; while she was making preparations he was setting by the fireside conversing with his wife, without knowing that the destroying angel was so near, to strike the fatal blow. He made a noise as though he had fallen into a dose of sleep, Mrs. Haymond went to him and raised his head, his mouth was drawn to the left side of his face and the right eye was open, and the left shut. By the help of one of his little sons, she was enabled to lay him on the bed, and he died almost instantaneously. He lived a moral life and was much beloved by all with whom he was acquainted. He has left a wife, who is a worthy member of the church, and eight small children to mourn the loss of a kind father. But God will be a father to the fatherless and a husband to the window.

See slow and solemn move along,
The weeping kindred, gazing throng;
A friend is dead, beloved and dear,
And nature drops the tender tear.

But stay kindred, tell us why
Ye heave that melancholly sigh?
He is not dead, but lives above
In worlds of light and endless love.

The silent grave we cheerful leave,
And for our friend no longer grieve;
We soon shall end this life of pain
And joyful meet our friend again.

ABNER MITCHELL, son of the Rev. John Mitchell, died in January last. He had his leg broken, and in two days it proved mortal. His age was fifty-three years.

OBITUARY.

Bro Springer: I think the following tribute of respect is due to the memory of sister ELIZA EVANS, who departed this life on the morning of the 20th instant, after many months of suffering, which was borne with that patience and submis- sion, characteristic of the disciple of the suffer- ing Saviour. She embraced religion about ten years since, being in the seventeenth year of her age, and united herself with the M. P. Church and continued a worthy member until God saw fit, by death, to dissolve the connexion and take her to the church triumphant in heaven. "Pre- cious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." Though young when made the subject of converting grace, yet she evinced a strong attachment to the Saviour and His cause, by a pious and exemplary life. But in the provi- dence of God, it fell to her lot to have a more than a usual share of the sufferings incident to this life. But for this, she was prepared, and the promise, "My grace shall be sufficient for thee," was evidently verified in her case. In August, 1838, she was taken with the chill and fever, from the effects of which she never entirely recovered. Her disorder settled in her limbs and caused lameness, so much so, that she was not able to walk without assistance. In about one year after, she was deprived of her eye-sight, and something like three months ago of her hearing. In this situation, what but religion could support her, and render any comfort in the midst of such complicated afflictions? That religion she possessed—the graces of patience and resignation shown conspicuously, and she was happy in the Lord. And though she could not walk, nor see, nor hear, she could talk and feel, and call her relations around her bed and recom- mend to them the Saviour's love. She felt es- pecially anxious for one of her brothers, who is rather inclined to be sceptical. A few hours before her departure, she had him called to her and asked him if he had religion; but alas! reli- gion is a jewel that he did not possess. She then asked him to pray before she went to sleep. But in this, he could not gratify her wish. In a short time after prayer, by another of the fam- ily, she sweetly fell asleep in the arms of Christ. On the 27th, the writer of this attended her fu- neral. She was truly a trophy of redeeming grace, she has gained heaven. And though pa- rents, brothers, sisters, the church and commu- nity mourn, their loss is her gain.

VARIETY.

The editor of the Northamptom Cou- rier tells of a silken tread eighteen hun- dred feet in length, wound without break- ing, from a single cocoon.

"It is," says the Churchman, "a fact at once remarkable and gratifying, that three buildings in the city of Albany, originally erected for theatrical purposes, are now places of christian worship."

GLORY.—Pliny gives the following character of true glory—"Doing what deserves to be written, and writing what deserves to be read; and rendering the world happy and better for having lived in it."

WONDERS OF CHEMISTRY.—Aquafortis and the air which we breath, are made of the same materials. Linen and sugar, and spirits of wine are so much alike in their chemical composition, that an old shirt can be converted into its own weight in sugar, and the sugar into spirits of wine. Water is made of two substances, one of which is the cause of all combustion or burning, and the other will burn with more rapidity than almost any other thing in nature. The Peruvian bark, so much used to strengthen weak stomachs, and the poisonous principles of opium, are formed of the same materials.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN FLAX.—A species of Flax has been found growing spontane- ously in the country adjacent to the Rocky Mountains, similar in many re- spects to the ordinary flax, but perennial in its growth. It may be mowed like grass, and need not be pulled up every season. Mr. Oakley, who travelled thro' the country, on the head waters of the Platte, last year, describes a vast prairie, thirty miles long and three broad, cov- ered with a strong tenacious fibre, and it is used by the Indians to make fishing nets. If this plant should be found to be equal to the flax which is now cultiva- ted in the country in respect to fineness and strength its perennial nature will give it a decided superiority, and render the culture of it far more easy and pro- ductive.

A soldier of the garrison at Valencien- nes, a few days ago, swallowed a five-franc piece. At first he was very uncomforta- ble, but appeared soon afterwards to be- come quite at ease, and now walks about gaily with the money in his stomach. On this occasion a local paper states that a medical man of Valenciennes relates that about forty years ago an old invalid died in the hospital of Lille. As soon as the breath was departed some of his re- lations came and begged his body might be opened, as when he was engaged in the Hanoverian war he had swallowed a crown piece, then worth six francs, which might still be recovered. The operation was performed in their presence, and the crown piece was found lodged at the en- trance of the intestines, and given to them. They went away rejoicing with the only inheritance that fell to them.—Paris paper.

INTELLECTUAL AND SUPERSTITION.—If genius enables its possessor to rise above the age in which he lives, in many re- spects, still it is interesting to remark the prevalence, in the same minds, of the highest intellectual ability with the low- est superstition. Melancthon could in- terpret dreams and cast nativities; Kepler, with all his exact science, was a visionary and an astrologer; Luther battled Satan face to face, on points of theology; Tycho Brahe listened to an idiot whom he kept in his services, as he would to revelations from above; Dr. Johnson believed in ghost and second-sight; and Matthew Hale con- demned people to suffer as witches. These, and hundreds of like instances, only serve to show that mind, however sharpened by cultivation, and raised above an age in the discovery of particular truths, is still subject to its spirit, in common with the rudest of its contemporaries.—Post.

ELECTRICITY VS. OAK TREES.—After a philosophic investigation of some months, a writer says that species of trees is somewhat allied to iron. It is well known to the chemist that the oak contains a con- siderable portion of iron in its composi- tion. It is presumed that the metal is held in solution by the sap, and equal- ly distributed throughout the tree. This may account for the fact that among a copse, the oak is invariably struck by lightning, while other trees of equal mag- nitude escape destruction. On this sub- ject, a western editor says:

Our own observation confirms the fact that oaks are singled out from other trees, by electricity, and probably most of our citizens have seen its effects in this vicin- ity. At one place, within a few miles from this village, some twenty oak trees can be seen within the circle of a few rods, splintered by the subtle agent, while other trees in the immediate vicinity re- main untouched.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—A Veteran.—We had the pleasure yesterday morning of giving the FORTY-SEVENTH bill and recept for the New York Spectator, to the ven- erable William Ludlam, of Oyster Bay. During the whole of the period, forty-se- ven years, he has been a constant sub- scriber, has paid punctually every year, and has the whole number of receipts in order. He is an example for the world to look at. What sound and quiet sleep he must have! And how much more comfort would there be upon the pillow, if all men were like him! Reader, who- ever thou art, think of this matter. And if in those hours of the night when dead sleep falleth upon man, you lie tossing and tumbling about, without being able to sleep at all—pause a moment and reflect whether you do not owe for your news- paper! Mr. Ludlam, by the way, is eighty-three years old, in excellent health and spirits, and promises long to read the Spectator still.—N. Y. Commercial Ad- vertiser.

POPULAR ERRORS.—That those who are loudest or most unceasing in their profes- sions of regard for the people, are the people's truest friends.

That genuine courage is shown by va- poring or bravado.

That it is consistent with the character of a gentleman to smoke in a stage coach.

That green or unseasoned is as good for making fires, as dry or seasoned wood.

That hot bread, or bread less than twenty-four hours old, is wholesome.

That keeping the door open in cold weather is conducive to health.

That other people have not as many, or as great causes of unhappiness as our- selves.

That any simpleton will do for a legis- lator.

That a lawyer to succeed in his pro- fession, is obliged to utter falsehoods.

That the citation of many books, or the use of learned words, is a sign of learn- ing.—Southern Literary Messenger.

LONDON SUNDAY NEWSPAPERS.—News- papers of London, to the number of one hundred and fifty-four, have addressed a memorial to the proprietors of the Sun- day papers, requesting them to change their day of publication to Saturday.— They state that the experiment has been made by the proprietor of Bell's Weekly Messenger, the proprietors of which have abandoned their Sunday edition, and the result has been an increased sale. The newsmen pray earnestly that the exam- ple may be followed, that they and their servants may be allowed like other peo- ple one day of rest. The prayer certain- ly ought to be granted, for there can be no greater nuisance, fraught, moreover, with great moral evil, than the crying of papers on Sunday, through the streets. The Sabbath is greatly desecrated by this increasing practice, in New York; and the evil is increasing under the laxity of public morals, and the inefficiency, or ne- glect of duty of the police. We believe no other city in the Union is disgraced by Sunday newspapers, or infected by Sun- day newsmen.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.—A family of eight persons, in this place, was strangely affected, last Saturday morning, on at- tempting to rise from their beds. The mother rose first and on stepping out fell prostrate on the floor; the father, on has- tening to his wife's assistance, met with a similar fate. The children being awakened by the noise, and called upon for aid, sprang out of their beds, but on reaching the floor, every one of them sank helplessly down. A fit of severe vomiting ensued, accompanied with violent pain in the head, each being affected pre- cisely alike. Under these distressing circumstances, help arrived, and medical aid being summoned, the cause was im- mediately detected in a disjointed pipe of a coal stove in the lower story; the doors above having been left ajar, the gas filled the chambers, and hence the consequen- ces. A few hours longer exposure to this deleterious atmosphere might have pro- ved fatal; as it was, fresh air and a little nursing, we are pleased to say, have re- stored all to usual health.—Germantown (Pa.) Telegraph.

THE ELOQUENCE OF THE PULPIT.—Pulpit eloquence should be the eloquence, above all, of an impressed and affectionate heart. As Mr. Simeon used to say, "of all men in the world, the christian pastor should be a man of an affectionate heart. When he preaches, he should be the shepherd in search of the lost sheep—the bereaved parent in pursuit of the lost child. For as well might you have a marble statute to supply the place of a real father, as a marble hearted preacher to supply the place of a real and affectionate pastor." "A sermon cold and poor," says Claude, "will do more mischief in an hour, than an hundred rich ones will replace." The affectionate, glowing, sanctified heart, af- ter all, is the true source of genuine pul- pit eloquence. Jerome used to say, "It is not the clamour of praise but the groans of conviction that should be heard whilst the minister preaches." And again, "the tears of the congregation form the high- est praises of the pulpit orator." The anecdote of Dean Milner and Rowland Hill, here is apposite. Dean Milner had a great objection against extemporaneous preaching, thinking that it warred against the precise and orthodox mode. Howev- er, being attracted by the great fame of Rowland Hill, he was led to indulge his curiosity by once going to hear him. Af- ter the sermon the Dean was seen forcing his way, in much haste, to the vestry- room, when seizing the hand of the preacher, in his enthusiasm, he cried out, "Well, dear brother Rowland, I perceive now, that your slap dash preachers are, after all, the best preachers; it went to the heart, Sir—it went to the heart, Sir!"

REV. GEORGE WHITEFIELD.

"In him there dwelt a spirit, generous, bold,
Unawed by threatenings, unallured by gold.
Preferments, honors, ease, he deemed but loss,
Vile and contemptible for JESUS' cross:—
Inured to scandal, injuries and pain,—
To him to live was CHRIST;—to die was gain."
De Courcey.

The father of this eminent and pious divine was brought up to the employment of a wine-merchant, in Bristol; but after- wards kept an inn in the city of Glouces- ter. He had six sons and one daughter. Of these George was the youngest, who when his father died, was only two years old. By this severe bereavement he was deprived of the advantages resulting from paternal instruction and example; but his mother regarded him with a pe- culiar tenderness, and educated him with more than ordinary solicitude.

He was the subject of early religious impressions, and on being placed at school made rapid progress in his studies.— Between the age of twelve and fifteen, his eloquence began to appear, in the speeches which he delivered in his annu- al visitations.

When he was eighteen years of age he was sent to Pembroke College, Oxford, where he cultivated an acquaintance with Messrs. John and Charles Wesley. He was treated with particular kindness by Mr. Charles Wesley, and received such benefit under his ministry, that he always accounted him his spiritual fa- ther.

His health declining, he was urged to go into the country, and returned for a while to his native city, where he was rendered useful in the awakening of sev- eral young persons; when he was about twenty-one years of age he was ordained by Doctor Benson, bishop of Gloucester. The next Sunday he preached to a crow- ded audience in the church where he had been baptized. In the week following he returned to Oxford and took his bach- elor's degree. Soon after this he visited London, and preached at Bishopsgate church. His youthful appearance at first excited a smile, but his eloquence and piety soon subdued it, and won the esteem of the wise and good. He continued in London two months and then returned to Oxford, but was soon called to supply a vacancy in Hampshire, where he labored diligently and faithfully for some time. Soon after this he received letters from Georgia inviting him to come thither.— A little before his departure his ministry was blessed to the awakening of many souls, and so great was his fame, that an eminent ship-builder, who was invited to hear him, at first refused, but afterward went. On being asked what he thought of Mr. Whitefield, he said, "When I go to my parish church I can build a ship from stem to stern under the sermon, but, were it to save my life, under Mr. Whitefield, I could not lay a single plank."

On the 28th of December, 1737, he left London, and on the 30th embarked for America, but did not arrive at the place of his destination until May fol- lowing, having been detained awhile at Gibraltar, where he preached the gospel faithfully. While at Savannah he for- med the project of an orphan-house for the poor children in Georgia, and for this purpose resolved to return to England to raise contributions for that object.— He accordingly embarked in September, 1738, and arrived in London the Decem- ber following. On his return from Ameri- ca his popularity was so increased, that the churches would not hold the immense numbers who wished to hear him. This led him to adopt the novel plan of preach- ing in the open air, in which Mr. Wes- ley afterwards followed his example.

On Sunday, April 29, he preached the first time in Moorfields,* London, and on Kennington Common, to thousands of attentive hearers. August 14th he em- barked again for America, having col- lected upwards of one thousand pounds sterling for the orphan-house. After the building was commenced, he travelled extensively in the colonies, "preaching the word every where." Among his numerous hearers were often found some of the children of Ham. On one oc- casion, in a drinking club, one of the gen- tlemen demanded of a poor colored boy, who was a great mimic, that he should imitate Mr. Whitefield, which he was very unwilling to do, but the company in- sisting upon it, he stood up and said,—"I speak the truth in Christ. I lie not; un- less you repent you will all be damned." This broke up the association. In March, 1741, Mr. Whitefield sailed again for England. While in London, the weather rendering it convenient for him to preach abroad in Moorfields, as formerly, some friends obtained the loan of a piece of ground near the Foundry, and engaged a carpenter to build a large temporary shed to screen the auditory from the weather, which they called a tabernacle, and which gave rise to the name by which Mr. Whitefield's principal place of worship was afterward called. In 1744, Mr. Whitefield visited America again, and re- mained three or four years, but, on ac- count of ill health, he visited Bermuda, and, in 1748, returned to England. On this occasion, the countess of Huntingdon heard him, and afterward made him her chaplain, and became his firm friend through life. In 1751 he visited Ireland, and, in August of that year, embarked again for this country. In 1753, we find him again in London, where he laid the foundation of the new Tabernacle. In 1754, he sailed again for Georgia, having taken under his care twenty-two poor children, with whom he arrived in safety on the 27th of May. After this he visit- ed his native country again. In Septem- ber, 1769, he embarked the 7th time for America. During the fall of 1770, he set out for Boston, intending to visit New- buryport on his way, but before he arri- ved at the last mentioned place, he receiv- ed a pressing invitation to preach at Exe- ter, with which he complied, but was greatly fatigued. In the afternoon he reached Newburyport, quite exhausted, and went early to bed, as he intended to preach the next day. Before he went out to address the multitude in the field, a friend said to him,—"Sir, you are more fit to go to bed than to preach." He an- swered, "True, sir." But, turning aside, he clasped his hands together, and look- ing up, exclaimed, "Lord Jesus, I am weary in thy work, but not of thy work. If I have not yet finished my course, let me go and speak for thee once more in the fields, and seal thy truth. and come home and die." The text he preached from was 2 Cor. xiii, 5, "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves; know ye not your own selves how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" and, to the grief of thousands, it proved his last sermon. To a friend who wished he would not preach so often, he replied, "I had rather wear out than rust out." At a quarter past four on Sunday morning, September 30, 1770, he waked out of sleep, and said, "My asthma, my asthma is coming on." On being asked soon after, how he felt himself, he answered, "I can scarce breathe; my asthma quite chokes me." Soon after he turned himself to his friends, and said, "I am dying, I am dying."— After this he spoke no more. In a few minutes he gasped once, stretched out his feet and breathed his last.

The remains of this eminently zealous and successful minister of Jesus Christ, were interred in a vault beneath the old church in Newburyport, Mass., where they now sleep in undisturbed repose; though they have often been visited by those who, being attracted by his extra- ordinary fame, conscientiously revere his memory.

At the close of his will Mr. Whitefield added the following:

"N. B. I also leave a mourning ring to my honored and dear friends, and dis- interested fellow-laborers, the Rev. John and Charles Wesley, in token of my in- dissoluble union with them, in heart and christian affection, notwithstanding our difference in judgment about some par- ticular points of doctrine. Grace be with them all, of whatever denomination, that love our Lord Jesus, our common Lord in sincerity."

*Here he often met with great persecution from the rabble that resorted there, but, not- withstanding this opposition, many clave to him in love, and even little children loved to follow him. On one occasion Mr. Whitefield says, "I cannot help adding, that several little boys and girls, who were fond of sitting round me on my stand, while I preached, handing to me people's notes, though they were often pelted with eggs, dirt, &c., thrown at me, never once gave way; but, on the contrary, every time I was struck, turned up their little weeping eyes, and seemed to wish they could receive the blows for me. God make them, in their growing years, great and living martyrs for Him, who out of the mouths of babes and sucklings perfects praise."

MISCELLANEOUS.

The following is from the May number of the CASKET, and is accompanied by a beautiful steel engraving of the "CATSKILL MOUNTAINS," by Durand:

THE CATSKILL MOUNTAINS.

The banks of the Hudson have been compared to those of the Rhine, and if crowned, like them, with hoary ruins, the scenery of the former stream would surpass that of the latter as much as its deep, majestic, ceaseless current surpasses the narrow and shallower tide of the great German river. It only wants moral associations. In variety it is certainly equal, and in boldness perhaps superior. Who can look unmoved upon the old ribbed Palisades—the glassy, land-locked Tappan zee—the towering crests of Crow Nest and West Point—and the dark blue outline of the Catskill Mountains, rising like thunder clouds in the west.

It was on a sunny morning in the heat of summer that we found ourselves on board a North river steamer, sweeping majestically upon that noble stream, with the intention of loitering a day or two amid the refreshing coolness, that is always found upon the summit of the Catskill Mountains. Our party were like ourselves, young, happy and determined to be pleased. None of us, moreover, had ever ascended the Hudson, and we gazed on its verdant, ever varying shores with continued delight. Now seemingly landlocked in some gentle lake, and then shooting into a narrow passage that might have been its outline, we swept majestically on our voyage, gazing on new beauties at every opening headland, and admiring the endless variety of lawn, slope, hill and frowning cliff around us. A company of volunteers was on board, and as we approached West Point, their band struck up a stirring air, whose notes floated away in delicious melody across the silence. The compliment was acknowledged by a gun, that woke up the voices of the old hills, echoing and re-echoing as it died away with the gale. A few cadets, in undress, loitering upon the rocks, started to their feet and waved their hats as a salute; and directly the mellow sound of a bugle floated across the waters, now swelling out in rich harmony, and then dying away in a tremulous cadence. The white buildings on the hill—the hoary fort high above—the gigantic cliffs towering on either shore—the dark shadows that lay in the river between—the seemingly pigmy sloop that floated lazily beneath the western shore; and the wild opening before us that led into Newark bay, formed a picture that can scarcely be imagined. Directly, however, we shot from the quay and swept gracefully along our way,—but the last sound we heard as we emerged into the bay were the low notes of the bugle melting upon the gale.

As we ascended the river, the banks became less bold, and swept onward in gentle vallies and rolling hills. Gradually, however, the Catskill Mountains became more and more indistinct in the western sky, now lighted up with the merry sunshine, and then frowning dark and forbidding in an approaching storm.

At length we landed at Catskill village, and began the ascent to Pine Orchard,—a very singular cognomen, we must confess, far a house perched on a mountain-top. At first the road was excellent,—but as we proceeded it grew more steep, until at last we passed a rude gate, and began in earnest to climb the Catskill. The prospect meanwhile was magnificent. Now a glimpse of the far-off Hudson would be caught through the various gaps of the surrounding hills, and then nothing could be seen but crags, and dark green forests towering on either hand into the sky. At last a turn of the road disclosed to view the white walls of the hotel glistening in the sunbeams, as it hung, like the eyrie of an eagle, upon the verge of a cliff far overhead.

The thunder storm which had been gathering for the last hour, soon, however, shut out the brilliant scene. A grander sight, on sea or land, it was never our lot to behold. The summit of the peak above was wrapped in a black veil of clouds, from which the lightning zig-zagged dazzlingly, while the thunder echoed away among the neighboring hills. Directly the clouds above waved, undulated, and breaking from around the peak, rolled darkly down upon us: in an instant the trees groaned, the rain rattled on the stony road, and every gully around us became a mimic torrent. The scene above was still obscure, but finally, as the storm rolled down into the valley, the sunlight was seen gilding the summit of the mountain top, while a sea of vapor tossed, heaved and chafed around the wooded sides below. It was a sight to kindle lofty emotions; while it cleared away around us, the sunbeams glancing horizontally through the rain in the lower valleys, made every drop sparkle like a diamond, until it seemed as if millions of brilliants were falling from the sky.

Night found us still upon the road.—The horses toiled heavily up the wet and slippery ascent, and the sight of Old Rip Van Winkle failed to inspire them with speed. Like trusty travellers we close the curtains, and began to make ourselves sociable with each other. Besides our party, there was a pretty blue-eyed girl, a maiden, duenna-looking aunt,—and a bashful country beau, who stammered and blushed at every word he said. We soon, however, propitiated the aunt with a sly compliment or two, and made rapid advances toward an acquaintance with her pretty niece. We saw she had a touch of coquetry in her, and as we grew more sociable we asked her to sing. And prettily was it done forsooth.

The view from the Mountain House is perhaps not equalled in America. A boundless prospect stretches before one embracing hill and stream, lowland and highland, forest, village and farm. The Hudson glitters along far away in the distance, with here and there a tiny sail lazily floating on its surface; clumps of forest trees dot the luxuriant landscape, with anon, a snow-white village peeping out from the green foliage,—a belt of rolling uplands, and dim, hazy hills, sweeping along the distant horizon, mark where the highlands of Massachusetts melt into the Green Mountains of Vermont; while, on a clear, calm day, far away to the north-east, the bold outline of the White Mountains of New Hampshire start up against the sky.

The view from the South Mountain is even superior to that from the table of the Pine Orchard. But it is not approached without some difficulty, if not danger.

The Kauterskill Falls, a mile or two from the Mountain House, is another fine sight. The stream leaps from the centre of a semi-circular rock, falling from such a height as to be almost lost in mist before it reaches the bottom. From thence, it descends eighty feet further in a roaring cascade, although from the top of the first fall it seems scarcely more than a fathom high. A wilder view, than the one looking up the valley from the lower fall, can scarcely be imagined. Here a hill peeps out, and there a gorge opens before you, presenting a varied picture of craggy cliff and rolling uplands, covered from base to summit with pines and mountain firs. At intervals through the gaps, a feathery cloud is seen floating; and while the sunlight glances on the brows of the mountains, the valleys beneath lie buried in shadow. When the evening closes in, and darkness flings her mantle around, the scene becomes even grander, and has that weird solemnity about it, which has filled the Hartz Mountains in Germany with so many fearful legends.

There are one or two traditions, related by old inhabitants of the neighborhood, which entitle these mountains to even a higher claim than that of natural beauty. In the early days of the colony the vicinity was the seat of bloody struggles between the whites and Indians,—and there still are shewn the spots where some fierce attack or thrilling massacre took place. Irving has celebrated the neighborhood in Rip Van Winkle,—and we long for some master-pen to immortalize the Indian traditions. J.

A DELPHIC ORACLE.—The Greeks believed in the possibility of foretelling future events. The wisest among them were in this respect not more advanced in intelligence than those ignorant beings in the present day who put faith in fortune-tellers. The practice of divining what would be the result of important enterprises, was connected with the religion of the country, and therefore countenanced and supported by the state. In all matters of importance, the desired knowledge of futurity was sought for from certain oracles, or, as we should now call them, fortune-telling establishments. By far the most celebrated of the Grecian oracles was that of Apollo at Delphi, a city built on the slopes of Mount Parnassus, in Phocis. At a very remote period it had been discovered, that, from a deep cavern in the side of that mountain, an intoxicating vapor issued, the effect of which was so powerful as to throw into convulsions both men and cattle. The rude inhabitants of the surrounding district, unable to account for this phenomenon, conceived that it must be produced by supernatural agency, and regarded the incoherent ravings of those who had inhaled the noxious vapor as prophecies uttered under the inspiration of some god. As the stupifying exhalation ascended out of the ground, it was at first conjectured that the newly discovered oracle must be that of the very ancient goddess, Earth; but Neptune was afterwards associated with this divinity, as an auxiliary agent in the mystery. Finally, the whole credit of the oracle was transferred to Apollo. A temple was soon built on the hallowed spot, and a priestess, named the Pythoness, was appointed, whose office it was to inhale, at stated intervals, the prophetic vapor. To enable her to do so without the risk of falling into the cavern, as several persons had previously done, a seat, called a tripod, from its having three feet, was erected for her accommodation, directly over the mouth of the chasm. Still, however, the Pythoness held an office which was neither safe nor agreeable. The convulsions into which she was thrown by the unwholesome vapors of the cavern, were in some instances so violent as to cause immediate death, and were at all times so painful that force was often necessary to bring the official to the prophetic seat. The unconnected words which the Pythoness screamed out in her madness, were arranged into sentences by the attendant priests, who could easily place them in such an order, and fill up the breaks in such a way, as to make them express whatever was most suitable to the interests of the shrine, which was the main object. Lest the oracle should be brought into discredit, care was, in general, taken to couch the response in language so obscure and enigmatical, that, whatever course events should take, the prediction might not be falsified, or rather might appear to be verified. It may be observed that, in course of time, the plan of stimulating convulsions was most probably adopted by the chief agent in these impositions.

The fame of the Delphic oracle soon became very extensive, and no enterprise of importance was undertaken in any part of Greece, or of its numerous colonies in the islands and along the coasts of the Ægean and Mediterranean seas, without a consultation of the Pythoness. The presents received from those who resorted to it for counsel, not a few of whom were princes or influential and wealthy leaders, formed a source of great and permanent revenue to the institution, and not only afforded the officiating priests a comfortable maintenance, but furnished also the means of erecting a splendid temple instead of the rude edifice which had been originally constructed. The high veneration in which the Delphic oracle was held, gave its directors a large share of influence in public affairs; an influence which they sometimes exerted in a most commendable manner, in sanctioning and furthering the schemes of the statesman, legislators, and warriors, who undertook to improve the political systems, reform the laws and manners, or defend the liberties of Greece.

MR. PIERPOINT'S ADVICE.—Rev. John Pierpont, who is 55 years old, has been, for 21 years, pastor of the Congregational church which meet in Hollis street. Many thousands of our children are indebted to his industry and refined taste for the beautiful pieces they have read in the "First Class Book," "National Reader," and "Introduction." His parishioners are wealthy, and he has been honored and caressed. But he has not been so intoxicated by their flattery, as to forget by what craft they have their wealth.—He has dared to speak freely of a traffic which is crushing hearts, blighting hopes and ruining souls. Several of his hearers seem to feel—if they did not utter it,—"Thus saying, thou reproachest us also." A meeting of pewholders has lately been held, at which it was voted, that "we no longer wish the services of Rev. John Pierpoint as pastor of the society."

To this vote, Mr. Pierpoint replies, in one of the ablest letters he ever wrote,—and that is giving it high praise.

It appears that 68 votes were cast against him, and these were given by only 41 persons,—many of whom owned several pews,—while 50 persons voted for him. Thirty-eight votes were cast by 19 dealers in spirituous liquors. The man who introduced the resolutions was not a worshipper in the church, but he had bought eleven pews that he might give eleven votes, to show that a rumseller did not wish a temperance man to preach even where he did not attend meeting. Mr. Pierpont mentions these facts in glowing language, and decides that he will not be driven from the pulpit by such a vote. The pew-holders had talked of employing a lawyer, but Mr. Pierpont says:

"It is quite possible that his services will be as little in harmony with your wishes, as mine have been; for I believe that the laws of man, upon this point, agree with those of God; and, very possibly, your legal adviser may tell you that he can no more bend the law to your wishes, than can I the gospel."

Mr. Pierpont concludes with the following advice, and we pray that it may disturb the consciences of the wealthy rumsellers and distillers till they obtain peace by following it:

"Desist—I counsel you to desist, from that part of your business which has been the cause of all this unhappy controversy; the cause of your troubles, and of my trials and triumphs; for I shall be triumphant, at last. Desist from the business that, through the poverty of many, has made you rich:—that has put you into your palaces by driving them through hovels and prisons down into the gates of the grave. Abandon the business that is kindling the fires of hatred upon your own hearth-stones, and pouring poison into the veins of your children,—yea, and of your children's children, and sending the shriek of delirium through their chambers:—the business that is now scourging our good land as pestilence and war have never scourged it; nay, the business, in prosecuting which you are, even now, carrying a curse to all the continents of the world, and making our country a stench in the nostrils of the nations. I counsel you to stay your hands from this work of destruction, and wash them of this great iniquity, as becomes the disciples of Him who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them. As His disciples, I counsel you no longer to absent yourselves from your wonted place of worship, and to return to your allegiance to your church and to God. Say to your minister 'Well done, good and faithful servant! you have faithfully done the work that you were ordained to do. You have neither spared us or feared us. You have even wounded us; but, faithful are the wounds of a friend. We commend you for your work, and charge you to go on with it, that we may meet together, and rejoice together, in the presence of God.'"—Youth's Cabinet.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

THE MONEY MARKET.

The Philadelphia Money Market has undergone very little change within the last fortnight. The aggregate sum on deposit in the Banks, is unusually large—but the demand for discounts on the part of sound and unquestioned houses, is exceedingly limited. Hence, the rates continue low. Our Banks discount nearly all the good paper that is submitted to them. We learn with pleasure, that nearly all our Philadelphia Institutions are conducting their operations with a view to resumption in January next.—This is the true policy—nay, it is the only policy that can be pursued with any thing like honesty or safety. That time was recommended by the Banks themselves. It is but fair to infer that they will govern themselves accordingly.—The notes of the United States Bank are paid out in larger quantities than those of any other Institution; indeed, no other Philadelphia notes are paid out, with the exception of a small amount of the Girard. This arises from the fact that the U. S. Bank is indebted to most of the Philadelphia Banks, and as those Banks receive the notes of that Institution in the payment of debts, they have more of them on hand, and hence pay them out more readily. We are unable to give any thing like authentic information as to the policy pursued by the U. S. Bank, but we may suppose that she is doing her utmost to recover from her weak position and embarrassment. We say weak position, because her funds are scattered widely throughout the Union—because she has heavy sums invested in Vicksburg, Stonington, and other equally unprofitable stocks—and because of the loan after loan, and million after million, which she has been compelled to borrow in Europe. We fear also, that within the last week, she has been induced to make another issue of post-notes We entertain no hostility towards this Institution, but on the contrary, we should rejoice in common with every business man in the community, to see her once more in a flourishing and prosperous condition. But it is evident, from the low rate of her Stock and the other facts stated above, that some time will elapse, before she will be able to inspire any thing like the degree of confidence in the public mind, that was formerly entertained as to her means and ability generally.

The Money and Stock rates at the close of the week, were as follows:

The Spring Trade has not wholly ceased. Merchants continue to arrive in small numbers, and thus to produce a degree of animation in the vicinity of our principal business thoroughfares. An immense amount of produce has already reached Philadelphia from the West; and a still larger amount is on its way by the various channels of communication. The forwarding-houses of Pittsburg were all full a few days ago, while the Western waters have been swoollen to an admirable state of navigation by the recent rains.

From New York, we learn that business is somewhat more active; and produce was arriving by the State Works. An immense amount of distress, however, still exists in that city. Thus the Signal cites some instances:

"The real situation of the laboring class of our community is, we believe, very little understood either in the city or out of it. We know (and have already stated) the general fact that thousands within our borders are out of employment; yet, while admitting the truth of this, as a sort of undeniable abstraction, we are not, any of us, apt to realize the full import, the practical bearing of the truth we so readily acknowledge. It is well for us to ask ourselves the question what it is, in such a city as ours, to be out of employment? And the question may be answered briefly (and better briefly than at length) by two or three facts which any one may light upon in a morning's ramble through the streets. We met, to-day, an honest, sober, industrious and capable mechanic, whom we know to be thus qualified, and whom for years past we have been in the habit of employing in small jobs. He inquired if we could give him work or recommend him to any one who could?—and proceeded to say that for nearly two months he had been searching from house to house for employment, without finding enough to keep his family in shoes. In the meantime he had sold some of his tools, some of his furniture and some of his clothes to save his wife and children from starving: and now his rent was to be paid, and he added, in a tone which apologized for his words, "God only knows what I am to do!" We gave him a dollar from our editorial penury, and internally prayed that each citizen able to do the same (and many thousands are able to do much more) would contribute to a fund for the relief of honest and sober citizens who are out of employment.

"The next person in distress was a respectable and honest porter, whom we had known in that capacity for several years, and who had served in some of our mercantile houses. He had, with previous earnings, purchased a small farm contiguous to the city, and had spent a part of several summers last past in cultivating it. He told us he had been endeavoring all winter to find work as a porter, but without success; and asserted, positively, that he had not earned a shilling in six months! He said, besides, that he had been obliged to neglect the cultivation of his little farm for want of means to work with; he had tried to sell it, but nobody would give a quarter of its value; he had tried to mortgage it, but nobody would take the trouble to examine his land and execute the formalities of a mortgage—especially for him, an irresponsible bondsman—for so small an amount of money as he was desirous to borrow; so that, literally, the smallness of the man's necessities (combined with the smallness of his means) was an obstacle to his relief!"

These are terrible cases, and exhibit the Commercial Emporium in any but an enviable condition.—Bicknell, May. 3

EXTENSIVE FORGERIES.—"Our community was this morning thrown into considerable excitement arising from whispers and surmises relative to forgeries said to have been made yesterday, as reported, on every bank in our city and liberties. Upon making inquiry we ascertained the following fact: It appears that accounts have been opened in the several banks in the names of Vanarsdale & Roberts, Steiner & Wood, and Geo. B. McKee & Co. all of whom, if we understood correctly, had given their residence at No. 42 Walnut street. Yesterday, checks were drawn by Vanarsdale & Roberts, and deposited by one or other of the above mentioned firms, with the word "Good" written thereon, and the name of the Teller forged. The check exhibited to us was remarkably well done. After depositing these checks, the amount was then drawn out without suspicion. When the banks, as usual, made their exchanges this morning, the fraud was detected; but too late to secure the offenders, as they had availed themselves of one or other of the many facilities our city affords, for making an escape. It also appears that no such firms have ever done business at No. 42 Walnut street. The amount of money obtained by these forgeries, we could not ascertain; but report says, not far short of twenty thousand dollars.—Philad. Gaz.

Other accounts state the amount as high as $50,000; but that no Bank has suffered to a greater extent than $8,000. The plan was, to obtain a cheque for a small amount, marked "good" in the first instance, and then to draw other cheques on various Banks, and counterfeit the word "good" as well as the signature of the Teller. These forged cheques were them deposited in other Institutions, and drawn against, and so the fraud was managed to the extent of the sum specified. The system must have been entered into with much deliberation, as the parties appear to have understood one another perfectly, and to have played into each others hands.—Bicknell.

THE REGION OF OREGON.—The vast territory of Oregon, one of the most fertile sections of this continent, is beginning to excite attention. A hundred years hence and its inhabitants will amount to thousands and tens of thousands. Our government should lose no time in taking formal possession of at least our rightful portion. In the United States Senate a few days since, Mr. Lynn, from the Select Committe on the subject, reported a joint resolution to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon. It is declared in the resolution that the title of the United States to this Territory is certain; and will not be abandoned.—In accordance with this declaration the President is authorized to take immediate measures to have the boundaries of the United States on the Pacific frontier ascertained and fixed,—also to provide for the establishment of military posts from Fort Leavenworth to the Rocky Mountains.

The encouragements offered to emigration are unusually liberal. We cannot say that such lavish appropriations of the Public Lands would altogether meet the views of the people in the old States who are in the habit of believing that the public domain is national property, held in trust for the common benefit. The resolution provides

That as soon as the boundaries of the Oregon Territory are indisputably determined, one thousand acres of land shall be granted to every white male inhabitant of said Territory, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, who shall cultivate and use the same for five consecutive years, or to his heir or heirs-at-law, if such there be.—Bicknell.

SINGULAR MANNER OF DETECTING COUNTERFEIT PAPER MONEY.—A correspondent has favored us with the following easy method of detecting counterfeit paper currency.

Having a genuine bill of the same denomination and date of the bill to be examined, run a pin through any letter or part of a letter in the true bill, and cause the point of the pin to pass through the corresponding letter in the suspected bill, leave the pin there, pierce the true bill in some other part at a distance from the first essay, and cause the point in like manner to pierce a corresponding part of the suspected bill; see that the two pins stand upright or perpendicular to the places of the bills, then run a third pin through both the bills in any part at a distance from the two former essays; if the third pin pierces the two bills through corresponding letters, the bill examined is a true one, otherwise it is a counterfeit.

The two first pins place the bills directly over each other, and as those of the same denomination and date are struck off from types fixed in a certain position, they will correspond in every part; but counterfeits being only an imitation, to deceive the eye, will not stand this test.

Congress—a body of men who abuse one another for eight dollars per day.

The Reading Democrat of Thursday last says, "the Berks County bank has within the last few days refused to give other current bank notes in exchange for its own, and many people have therefore refused to take them. The Cashier, however, says that arrangements will be made in a few days."—Bicknell.

A letter received in this city says that holders of produce in Ohio and the western parts of Pennsylvania, would send their produce to the New York market via Cleveland and lake Erie, in preference to shipping it to Philadelphia, via the Pennsylvania and Ohio Canal, the difference in the cost of transportation being greatly in favor of the former route.—ib.

A morning paper states that it is in contemplation on the part of several houses largely interested in the produce business with the west, to establish a line of portable boats via the Tide Water Canal to Pittsburg, by which route both merchandize and the various articles of produce can be more cheaply conveyed than by the Columbia Railroad, notwithstanding the reduction in tolls and the drawback on flour.—ib.

We state with pleasure that the Chesapeake Canal is now fully navigable, and all means and appliances at hand to ensure the transit of merchandize, etc. each way. And we learn that a gentleman of this city, known as most active in the transportation business, is engaged in the vicinity of the canal in looking to the interests of houses in this city connected with the purchase and sale of the various kinds of produce. The city Councils, or our merchants, should engage a small steamboat to facilitate matters.—ib.

The counsel of James Wood has applied to the Court of Oyer and Termine to allow him to be removed from the Moyamensing prison, where he is now confined, to the Lunatic Asylum, on the west side of the Schuylkill. The Attorney General is to examine the institution and report to the Court the capabilities of the building as to the safe keeping of the prisoner.

In the Court of Oyer and Termine the Attorney General gave the result of his examination of Blockly Hospital as a place of confinement for James Wood.—His opinion was, that safe as the apartments in the hospital might be, those in the prison were more so, and he therefore resisted the rule. The Court refused to make the rule absolute, and Wood will continue to be confined in Moyamensing prison.

THE CROPS.—Accounts from Baltimore state that the crops of wheat on the eastern shore of Maryland looks exceedingly well. The same statement is made by our farmers with regard to the wheat of Philadelphia county and its neighbourhood. The country round about never presented a more encouraging appearance. The prospect now is that the harvest of the present year will prove full equal to that of last. But let us not be too sanguine.—Bicknell.

A large, new sail boat was launched yesterday, and shortly after, a pleasure party numbering from 50 to 75 persons proceeded on an excursion. They had not been long on the Delaware, before either from mismanagement, the large number on board, or a sudden squall, the boat was upset—and several lives; or account states as many as four, were lost. The rest of the passengers clung to the bottom, until other boats came to their assistance, and rescued them.—Philadelphia paper.

The General Jackson, which cleared at Savannah on the 8th inst. for Liverpool, as we learn from the Georgian, can be traced back to 1765, making her seventy-five years old. She was originally a Portuguese ship, built in the East Indies of Teak wood; taken by the English, and captured last war by the True Blooded Yankee, a private armed schooner, belonging to Rhode Island, owned by a D'Wolf, Esq. She still belongs to his sons. More wonderful still, her bottom plank was never caulked.

THE METHODIST CONFERENCE.—The Baltimore American of Saturday says:

"This body, which is the legislative branch of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, commenced its thirteenth session in the Wesley Chapel, in this city, yesterday morning. All the Bishops, were in attendance, except Bishop Soule, who is expected in a few days. The conference was organized by the appointment of the Rev. Jno. A. Collins, of the Baltimore Annual Conference, as Secretary, and the Rev. J. B. Houghtaling of the Troy Conference, and the Rev. Thomas R. Sargeant, of the Baltimore Conference, as assistant Secretaries.

Bishop Roberts introduced the Rev. Robert Newton as a delegate from the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in England. We understand that the Rev. M. Stinson, the Representative of the Mission Department, and the Rev. Mr. Rierson, the General Representative of the Wesleyan Methodist church in North America from Canada, are also in attendance. The present will be an unusually interesting session of this body, as several questions of deep importance to the church will be brought before it for its action. Its meetings are daily, and will hereafter commence at half past eight, A. M. at the Chapel."

QUERY.—If the doctrine of "Justification by h ONLY," be true, who of you can reconcile writings of the Apostles, Paul and James? DISCIPLE.

little learning is a dangerous thing, rink deep, or taste not the pierian spring; ere shallow draughts intoxicate the brain, ut drinking deeply sobers us again. Pope.

his maxim of the poet is particularly appli- le to the doctrines of the gospel, and to none e than the doctrine of justification by faith. nan reads the seeming disagreement of Paul d James on the subject of Faith and Works, d finding, as he supposes, a flat contradiction ween the two Apostles, concludes that they not both be right, considers himself at liberty believe either, as his caprice or whims may line him, and to play off his ironies at the posed discrepancy of the Scriptures. Whereas, he would only dispense with the pride of criti- m, look soberly at the subject long enough to derstand it; he would see that the sinner is tified by faith ALONE, but at the same time at there was not the least disagreement be- een Paul and James, who, when properly un- rstood, perfectly harmonize.

But in order to understand these two Apostles, you must recollect they do not speak of the same justification. Paul speaks of our justification as sinners, James of our justification as christians. Paul says, in substance, that when as condemned sinners, we approach the mercy seat for justification, that all our good works are dross and filthy rags, when offered under these circumstances; that at this crisis, without faith, and faith ONLY, it would be impossible to please God.

Now, James does not contradict this; but he means, after we are justified in St. Paul's sense, as condemned criminals, we shall receive a second justification, not as condemned sinners, but as christians, at the bar of public opinion in this world, or at the bar of God in the world to come, by our works, or rather, if you please, by evidence of our works.

Fairly to understand Paul and James, you must recollect the errors they are respectively opposing. Paul directs his treatise on the subject of justification by faith, against the error of the Pharisee, who denied the divinity and atonement of Christ, and proposed by his long prayers, his alms and charitable deeds, to propitiate the Deity. He tells this proud Israelite that the law considers both Jew and Gentile under sin, and that by its deeds, no flesh living, can be justified. But that it is faith alone in the great mediation of the Redeemer that can introduce the penitential sinner into a state of favor with the offended majesty of heaven.

But it was not long in the progress of the gospel, before the indolent Antinomian wrested these sayings of Paul to suit his own inclinations. Being averse to the active duties of christian benevolence, faith was to do every thing for him. He was a poor creature, morally unable to think a good thought or do a good act; grace must do all. Faith must lay the foundation and bring on the cap stone of his salvation. At the same time he ate and drank to intemperance, lived in the habitual omission of the essential duties of the christian, faith was to be a kind of substitute for all this delinquency.—To this lazy and inactive Antinomian, James exclaims, "O, vain man! faith without works is dead," and "by works faith is made perfect." St. Paul's faith gives birth to St. James' works, but the latter is that which perfects the former.

When Paul and James both refer to Abraham, one affirming that he was justified by faith, and the other, that he was justified by works, they speak of different acts of this great man. The one speaks of the act which made him a believer, the other of the fruit of that act.

The moment you say the SINNER is not justified by faith ONLY; that his good works have something to do in meriting his salvation, you virtually dispense with the atonement of Christ, and open the flood gates of modern infidelity.

The following tale has some good thoughts on the subject:

DAN AND JANE.

OR, FAITH AND WORKS.—A FABLE.

Good Dan and Jane were man and wife,
And lived a loving kind of life;
One point, however, they disputed,
And each by turns his mate confuted.
'Twas Faith and Works—the knotty question
They found not easy of digestion;
While Dan alone for faith contended,
Jane equally good works defended.
"They were not christians, sure, but Turks,
Who build on faith and scoff at works,"
Quoth Jane—while eager Dan replied,
"By none but heathens faith's denied."
"I'll tell you wife," at length quoth Dan,
"A story of a right good man.
A patriarch sage, of ancient days,
A man of faith, whom all must praise.
In his own country he possess'd,
What'er can make a wise man blest;
His was the flock, the field, the spring,
In short, a little rural king.
Yet, pleased he quits his native land,
By faith in the divine command.
God bade him go, and he content,
Went forth, not knowing where he went.
He trusted in the promise made,
And undisputing, straight obeyed.
The heavenly word he did not doubt,
But proved his faith by going out."
Jane answered with a little pride—
"I've an example on my side;
And though my tale be somewhat longer,
I trust you'll find it vastly stronger.
I'll tell you, Daniel, of a man,
The holiest since the world began:
Who now God's favor is receiving,
For prompt obeying, not believing.
One only son this man possess'd,
In whom his righteous age was blest;
And more to mark the grace of heaven,
This son by miracle was given.
And from this child the word divine
Had promis'd an illustrious line.
When lo! at once a voice he hears,
Which sounds like thunder in his ears.
God says—Go sacrifice thy son!
—This moment, Lord, it shall be done.
He goes, and instantly prepares,
To slay the child of many prayers.
Now here you see the grand expedience,
Of works, of actual sound obedience.
This was not faith, but act and deed,
The Lord commands—the child shall bleed.
Thus Abraham acted," Jenny cried;
"Thus Abraham trusted," Dan replied.
"Abraham," quoth Jane, "why, that's my man!"
"No, Abraham's him I mean," says Dan.
"He stands a monument of faith;"—
"No, 'tis for works the Scripture saith."
"'Tis for his faith that I defend him;"
Thus he—thus she—both warmly feel,
And loose their temper in their zeal;
Too quick each other's choice to blame,
They did not see each meant the same.
At length, "good wife," said honest Dan,
"We're talking of the self-same man.
The works you praise I own indeed,
Grow from that faith for which I plead;
And Abraham, whom for faith I quote,
For works deserves especial note:
'Tis not enough of faith to talk,
A man of God with God must walk:
Our doctrines are at least the same,
They only differ in the name:
The faith I fight for, is the root;
The works you value, are the fruit;
How shall you know my creed's sincere,
Unless in works my faith appear?
How shall I know a tree's alive,
Unless I see it bear and thrive?
Your works not growing on my root,
Would prove they were not genuine fruit.
If faith produce no works, I see,
That faith is not a living tree.
Thus faith and works together grow,
No separate life they 'er can know:
They're soul and body, hand and heart,
What God hath join'd let no man part."

QUERYEST.—It is said in the 17th Article in our book of Discipline, "The baptism of young children is to be retained in the church." I ask, what are the benefits they derive from baptism? or what is its effects upon infants? DISCIPLE.

It is said in the scriptures, that the Jews should get their children circumcised at eight days old, and that circumcision should be retained among the ancient people of God. We ask, what are the benefits they derive from circumcision? or what was its effect upon infants?

We do not mean to evade the force of DISCIPLE's inquiry, but we wish to show him that it is easier to ask questions than to solve them.—Besides, the answer to his interrogatory is contained in that of ours. And if by attending to this, he finds the solution of his own difficulty, it will be more satisfactory to him, than if he had been informed by another.

If after DISCIPLE attends to our query, he will inform us that both his and ours are involved in darkness, we will then attend directly to his. We shall take the liberty, however, of now stating, that the question should not be in reference to the "effect" of God's ordinances, because we are rather too limited in our capacities to comprehend the "effects" of His dispensation; but it should be, whether or not we have any warrant of authority for any proposed ordinance,—that's the question. If God commands we are bound to obey without asking of Him the reasons. It is true, God commands nothing unreasonable, and religion itself is "our reasonable service," yet to some extent, in this probationary scene, "His path is in the deep waters," and "His ways past finding out."

The last Zanesville Gazette in noticing the post office established at "Meadow Farm;" says —"C. Springer is post master and carries the mail." This is a mistake, Jeremiah Springer has taken the contract for carrying the mail.—Post masters, we believe, are prohibited by law from taking contracts for carrying the mail.

Understanding that there was a special law, authorizing the post office department, to establish offices, and supply them with the mail by "special contract," in neighborhoods where they might be called for, provided the office would sustain itself, we petitioned the department for one in this neighborhood, offering to sustain it for its net proceeds. The department has granted us one limiting its expense as above. But should the proceeds exceed a certain sum the overplus goes to the government. The government has given us a mail portmantau, lock and key, and have left us to make our own fortune.

ITEMS.

It costs more to keep one vice than two children.

The Central Bank of Georgia is about to make a new emission.

The English have 1 line of battle ship, 9 frigates and 19 sloops of war, on and near our coasts, making a total of 522 guns, and 5500 men.

Twelve sealing vessels have returned to St. Johns, New Foundland, this season, with an average of 4000 seals. Some had been out only ten days.

The brick church in Salem, Washington county, New York, was destroyed by fire on Sunday morning, the 26th ultimo. It cost about 10,000 dollars.

The Mayor of Richmond has refused to admit B. W. Green to bail, on the charge of being concerned with Dabney, in abstracting the funds of the Bank of Virginia.

A COY INSINUATION.—Governor Pennington, of New Jersey, in a recent speech at Trenton, said, "I expect a man about my size will be elected Governor next year."

The Rev. Mr. Newton, said to be the most celebrated Methodist preacher in England, is shortly expected to arrive in this country. He will attend the Annual Conference in Baltimore.

DELICATE IDEA.—What an exquisitely delicate precept is that of the Hindoo law, which says, "Strike not, even with a blossom, a wife though she be guilty of an hundred faults."

ONE HUNDRED BARRELS PER HOUR.—There have arrived per western boats, since Tuesday evening, 5000 barrels of Flour. All the canal boats are loading with it for the east.—Bicknell.

The New Orleans Picayune, of April 10th, makes this ungenerous inquiry: "Plenty of fine ripe blackberries now in this city. Don't the announcement make your mouths water, you 'down-east' editors, who have to wait until July or August for them?"

AN UNTIMELY DEMAND.—A provincial actress was performing the part of Lady Anne in Richard III, and on delivering the following passage, "When shall I have rest?" she was answered by her washerwoman from the pit, "Never, till you pay me three shillings and two-pence."

AN AWFUL DEATH.—A man named Taylor recently went into the woods in Adams county, Illinois, to cut timber; a log knocked him down and rolled upon his thighs, holding him in that position until he died, which, from appearances, was not until several days after the accident.

On the first day of April, a dentist in New Orleans was called upon and requested to make all haste, with his instruments, to a house high up in Magazine street, to perform an operation. On arriving at the house he ascertained all they wanted of him was to set the teeth of a hand saw!

THE WHALE FISHERY.—An abstract of the vessels employed in the whale fishery belonging to the United States, on the 1st of September, 1839, is published in the New Bedford shipping list. The whole number of vessels, ships, brigs and schooners, engaged, is 557. The amount of tonnage is 169,983.

The Wisconsin Enquirer mentions as a fact not generally known, that a large quantity of copper ore has been shipped from the western part of that territory to England, within the past year, to be smelted. It is said that the ore is of so valuable a quality that it yields the exporters a handsome profit.

LIVERPOOL.—Eight hundred and twenty-seven vessels entered inward at the port of Liverpool, from the 25th of January, 1839, to the 24th of February, 1840, fifty-nine of which were from the United States.

A spendthrift nobleman had a fortune left him and was advised by a friend to purchase an estate, notorious for its neglected state and sterility.

"Why," said his lordship, "there is not a single passable road through the estate."

"That is the reason I wish you to buy it," said the other, "it will take you the longer to run through it."

THE SEASON.—We do not recollect a season when vegetation generally was so forward, the first week in May, as at present. The forest leaves are fully developed, and the wild-flowers are out in all their fragrance and beauty. The Chesnut Ridge, in this immediate vicinity, affords one of the most inviting fields for botanical research that we have ever seen. The grain, on the farms around us, is remarkably forward, and gives promise of an abundant harvest—the cattle are nearly up to their knees in clover—and the meadows exhibit a covering of blade and flower, to be exceeded in richness and beauty, only by the wide prairies of the far west.

The past two weeks might be marked in the calendar as the rainy season. Almost every day or night affords abundant showers, and the pattering of rain the live-long day has become a familiar sound. Streams that never were navigable since old Noah's flood, are now available as highways to convey to market the produce and manufactures of the country.—Mt. Pleasant (Pa.) Register.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

NEW YORK, May 3, 12 o'clock, noon.

The steam packet Great Western arrived at our dock about 11 o'clock this morning, and we are now in possession of London papers to the 15th, Liverpool to the 14th, and Bristol to the 13th of April. The Western departed from King road at 7 o'clock in the evening of April 15, and has had a regular series of westerly breezes and gales to contend with during the whole passage. This is the more singular, as the wind has been mostly from the eastward in this vicinity. She brings out about one hundred and five passengers, exclusive of servants. Among the names I noticed the names of Mr. Cunard, the proprietor of the line of mail steamers from England to Halifax and Boston; Fanny Esler, the celebrated danseuse; Miss C. Esler, and T. Van Sands, bearer of despatches.

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE SICILIES.—The intelligence received by the last arrival of threatened hostilities between the Neapolitan and British governments is confirmed. Mr. Temple, the British Envoy at the Court of Naples, had ceased to hold any communication with the government, and at his direction the English Consul had issued a circular, informing "British merchants in the kingdom, that circumstances had arisen which will very probably oblige the naval forces of her Majesty to make reprisals upon ships sailing under the flag of the Two Sicilies, and to warn them to make such reserve in their shipments on board such vessels, as in consequence of his notice they may think right."

This intelligence was received at Paris, via Marseilles, on the 13th April. It caused a great sensation, and both Neapolitan and French funds fell in consequence of it.

RELATIONS WITH CHINA.—There have been some long debates in Parliament on Chinese affairs, in which the Ministry have been pretty severely handled. They escaped a vote of censure, in a resolution introduced in the Commons, by Sir James Graham, accusing them of a want of forsight, neglect, and mismanagement in relation to the affairs of China, by a vote of only 9—262 voting for, and 271 against the resolution.

In the House of Lords on the 11th, the Earl of Aberdeen asked Lord Melbourne whether an order of council had been issued for letters of marque and reprisal against China. He answered, no; but it was the intention of the government to demand reparation from the Chinese, in consequence of injuries which had been inflicted on British subjects in China, and unquestionably, if that reparation were refused, it was the intention of the government to proceed to acts of reprisal against the Chinese trade.

In the House of Commons, on the 14th, Lord John Russell moved an address to the crown, for copies of all correspondence between American Ministers and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with respect to the North American boundary.

The Canada government bill was read in the House on the 14th, and passed to a second reading.

Government had granted a pension to the widow and children of John Lander the celebrated African traveller.

The news of the retreat of the Russians from Khiva is confirmed, so far as a retrogade movement is concerned. The expedition, however, is not abandoned; General Perowsky having encamped in a good position to await better weather.

A letter from Bayonne, dated 9th of April, states that the sixth and seventh Carlist battalions of Arragon had been surprised and destroyed by Colonel Zurbano at Pitrarque. Four hundred and nineteen officers and soldiers were taken prisoners.

Dr. Lardner, of whose elopement with Mrs. Heavisides we have heretofore had an account, was severely beaten by the injured husband, who overtook the guilty pair at Paris. The lady was separated from her lover, and conveyed by her father to his residence in Boulonge.

The duty upon foreign wheat in England at the latest dates, was 16s 8d per quarter. The grain market in London was dull, and flour was difficult of disposal.

At Liverpool, 2000 barrels American flour had been disposed of in bond at 28s 6d per barrel. It was offering duty paid at 39 and 40 shillings per barrel. In cotton a decline of 1-8d is noted on American for the week ending the 10th. On the 13th the market closed steady, with sales of 4000 bales, among which were 3,100 bales American at 5d and 7¼d.

INDIA AND CHINA.—The Prometheus steamboat which left Alexandria as late as the 22d March, has brought advices from Canton to the 5th January, from Calcutta to the 19th, and from Bombay to the 29th of Feb. Lord Auckland arrived in Calcutta on the 11th of February, and was actively engaged in forwarding and completing the preparations against China. The expedition was to be ready against the 1st of May. The destination was supposed to be the Island of Formosa, but it was the opinion of the best informed persons that the object of the Governor General was rather to alarm than to subdue the Chinese, and to bring them to a proper sense of the value of English commerce and friendly relations. The whole armament was to be placed under the command of Lieutenant General Sir R. Arbuthnot, while Generals Oglander and Walker would act under his orders.

Nothing had occurred at Canton to render it probable that commercial intercourse would be renewed; on the contrary, an attempt by Capt. Elliot to induce Commissioner Lin to allow the resumption of legal traffic had been met by a positive refusal, and a statement that the Emperor of China positively interdicted all trade between his subjects and the English, and had ordered that no British goods of any kind should, upon any pretence, be admitted. Upon this point Commissioner Lin had issued a new edict, prohibiting the conveyance and introduction of the produce and manufactures of this country in foreign vessels.

A British merchantman, of the name of Gribble, had been taken by a Mandarin junk out of a smuggling boat, in which he was proceeding, in contravention of the edict of Commissioner Lin. After his capture he was conveyed to Canton, and it was supposed that he would be released, but no representations by the merchants, or by the commanders of any of her Majesty's vessels of war, had been of any avail previous to the date of the latest intelligence, 4th of January.

The following are the reasons said to be declared in the imperial edict for the stoppage of the British trade forever, viz: Capt. Elliot's attack at Cowloon, and murdered three; Capt. E's attack at Chumpee; keeping outside all British vessels for the purpose of clandestinely dealing in opium. This edict is said to be pitched in a much higher and stronger tone than Lin's in regard to the English, and no representative authority is allowed to alter it, so that no negotiations for the opening of the trade can be conducted by the Canton government, but must be referred to Pekin.

From the N. Y. Express of 2d inst.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM FRANCE.

By the packet ship Silvie de Grasse, Captain Weiderholdt, we have received Havre and Paris papers to the 31st March, inclusive. We select the following:

PARIS, MARCH 31, 1840.

Government has received the following telegraphic despatch:

Bayonne, March 30.—The Sub-Prefect of Bayonne to the Minister of the interior. The fort of Castellote capitulated on the 26th, after a vigorous resistance. The garrison surrendered at discretion.

A letter from Toulon, states that reinforcements are to be sent direct to Oran. Marshal Valee not having been able to detach any portion of his army on his march, it is said that the 6th light infantry in garrison at Toulon, the 21st of the line at Marseilles, and the 13th light at Perpigram, have received orders to hold themselves in readiness to proceed to Oran. There are to be formed, it is said, two active columns of 5000 men at Oran, the other of 3000 men at Mostaganem.

Extract of al etter from Oran, 10th instant, quoted by the Constitutional:

"Accounts received from the west, through Arabs who have relations with the interior, have no doubt as to the existence of a treaty between Abdel Kader and the Emperor of Morocco. If, however, the French Government looks for a formal declaration of war from the Emperor, it deceives itself; for the character of the Morocco chiefs has always been the same as that of the Arabs, and the policy which governs the western States is founded on the same basis as that of the Emir,—the utmost fraud and dissimulation. The only official announcement of hostility which the Emperor will ever make, is the active exchange of ammunition and stores now going on at Tlemcen, and the movement of the people of Medroma, which are entirely directed by the Lieutenants of the Emir. Abdel Kader has completely re-organized the regular battalions broken by the conflict of Oued Lalleg. They have been almost entirely recruited from the Kabilest of Ceuta and Tangiers."

The typhus fever is at present making extensive ravages in the garrison of Cherbourg, and the marine hospital is crowded with patients.—The battalion of marine infantry stationed there has eighty men invalided from this malady alone.

A Messina correspondent of the National, writes on the 19th instant:

"Sicily is menaced with a blockade by England. Already eight English ships of war are, it is said, directing their course to the island.—However exaggerated may be the statement as to the naval forces intended for a demonstration on the coast of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, the Neapolitan Government is rapidly sending off the troops for the probable purpose of opposing a descent."

"Several Carlist agents," says the Sentinelle of Bayonne, "have been purchasing here various articles which can only be of use in case of new insurrection in the Basque provinces. They hold out that they will soon have ample supplies of money."

A Berlin correspondent of the Frankfort Journal writes on the 24th instant: Col. De Rauch, the King's aid-de-camp, returned yesterday from St. Petersburg, bringing very afflicting accounts of the health of the Empress. He left St. Petersburgh on the 14th.

LATER FROM CANTON.—The ship Providence, which arrived yesterday from Canton, left the river earlier than our previous dates, but spoke an English ship on the passage, and took from her a quantity of letters to Dec. 20. These letters state that an edict had just been issued by the Chinese Commissioner, Lin, forbidding the bringing up to Canton of any British manufactures, even in American ships; and declaring that if it was attempted, both goods and ship should be confiscated.

Teas were coming down slowly—as the Chinamen were unwilling to sell until after New Year's. The Levant was the only ship loading for the United States, and she was not expected to sail until some time in January. The Asia, Lotus and Samarang, arrived at Canton between Dec. 15th and 20th.—Journal of Commerce.

BRITAIN AND PRUSSIA.—In Britain we hear much of religious liberty; but the true feeling seems wanting—for the animosity between Irish Protestants and Catholics could hardly be surpassed by the rancor of tribes living under a heathen dispensation. In Prussia, and throughout Germany, the state of opinion is widely different. A philosophical spirit of religious toleration generally prevails; and it is considered comparatively unimportant, for all the purposes of civil and social life, to which of the christian sects a man may belong.

This happy state of feeling probably arises, in a great measure, from Protestant and Catholic children being educated in the same schools, and accustomed to associate as friends and companions, without reference to creed.

The good results to be anticipated from the pursuit of a similar course in Ireland, was happily illustrated by the Rev. Sydney Smith's quoting an answer elicited from the cage-keeper on Waterloo bridge, who exhibits cats, dogs, rats, mice and birds, occupying the same apartment, and living in harmony.

On being questioned as to how such a miraculous state of intercourse was produced, he simply replied, "I brings them together."

CORRECTION.

Last fall in publishing the minutes of the Ohio Conference, the list of names were changed in our office from the order in which they were forwarded to us. This, the compositor informed us, was done to accommodate our rather too narrow columns, by placing a short name and a long one opposite each other, not knowing that any particular order had been observed in forming the list.

The Secretary, Bro. Bassett, informs us he had been careful to arrange the list according to senority, placing the oldest member at the head.—Though this is the first time we have ever known a list of members of Conference to be kept in this way, we think it a precedent which should be followed by all our Conferences. There is something due to age as well as to talent. The man who has served the cause the longest should certainly be honored with a station at the head of the list. In the military department, the order of senority is rigidly observed, each officer taking rank according to the date of his commission.

This explanation is due to the Secretary.—But we would here remark; in reference to all tables, if any particular order is wanted to be observed, it should be stated when the table is forwarded for publication. It will then be our pleasure to attend to it. But, otherwise, we believe compositors are in the habit of arranging them to suit their columns, when it will not destroy the sense.—This explanation we intended to have made sooner, but for reasons not intentional it has been deferred till now.

Jamestown, Ohio, April 22, 1840.

The Post Master of Hiramsburg, Ohio, informs us that Charles Lukins does not take his paper from the office, and that he wishes it discontinued. He has paid us $1, and has now received 37 numbers of the paper. When he pays up the arrears we will discontinue, and not before. If he wished us to discontinue at the end of six months, he should have given us information before the close of that time. This he could have done by speaking to the post master in season, whose duty it is to inform editors when papers are refused. We mean not, if we can help it, to be trifled with in this way.

Bro. Bassett requested us to send him a few extras of his mother's obituary. We thought we wet enough paper for this purpose, but when we come to make up the packages, we fell some two or three short of the number wanted for our regular list, which we were under the necessity of docking from our exchanges. This thing frequently occurs, owing to the misscount on the part of the paper maker. It would afford us much pleasure to accommodate the request of our brother; and we will yet try and gather up some of the numbers in the neighborhood of the office, when the readers are done with them, and forward to him.

Bro. SHINN's books, we are informed, are at Marietta. The improvements on the Muskingum have, we believe, obstructed all intercouse between that place and this. He had better order them back to Wheeling, or forward to Portsmouth, to the care of some commission merchant, to be forwarded to Zanesville.

CAMP MEETING.—We propose to hold a camp meeting, on the farm of John Walker, 3 miles west of Adamsville, Muskingum county, Ohio, to commence on the 4th of June. We solicit the attendance of Bros. Brown, Springer, Marshall, Wilson, Thrap, Fairchild, Davis, Warren and Stephens. P. INSKEEP, Sup.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FRANCIS MARION.

Francis Marion, colonel in the regular service, and brigadier general in the militia of South Carolina, was born in the vicinity of Georgetown, in the year 1733.

To portray the meteor like course of hardihood and exploit, traced by Gen. Marion and his heroic followers, would constitute a picture, rich in admiration and delight, to the lovers of bravery and romantic adventure. Never was an officer better suited to the times in which he lived, and the station in which it was his fortune to act. For stratagems, unlooked for enterprise against the enemy, and devices for concealing his own position and movements, he had no rival. Never, in a single instance, was he overtaken in his course, or discovered in his hiding place. Even some of his own party, anxious for his safety, and well acquainted with many of the places of his retreat, have sought for him whole days in his immediate neighborhood, without finding him. Suddenly and unexpectedly, in some distant point he would again appear, pouncing upon his enemy like the eagle upon his pray. These high and rare qualities, conducted him immediately into the arms of victory, when the force he encountered was ten fold the number of that he commanded.

Young Marion at the age of 16, entered on board a ship bound to the West Indies, with a determination to fit himself for a seafaring like. On his outward passage, the vessel was upset in a gale of wind, when the crew took to their boat without water or provisions, it being impracticable to save any of either. A dog jumped into the boat with the crew, and upon his flesh, eaten raw, did the survivors of these unfortunate men subsist for seven or eight days; in which period seven died of hunger.

Among the few who escaped was young Marion. After reaching land, Marion relinquished his original plan of life, and engaged in the labors of agriculture. In this occupation he continued until 1759, when he became a soldier, and was appointed a lieutenant in a company of volunteers, raised for an expedition against the Cherokee Indians, commanded by Captain William Moultrie, (since Gen. Moultrie.)

As soon as the war broke out between the colonies and the mother country, Marion was called to the command of a company in the first corps raised by the State of South Carolina. He was soon afterwards promoted to a majority, and served in that rank under Colonel Moultrie, in his intrepid defence of Fort Moultrie, against the combined attack of Sir Henry Clinton and Sir H. Parker, on the 2d of June, 1776. He was afterwards placed at the head of a regiment, as lieutenant colonel commandant, in which capacity he served during the seige of Charleston; when having fractured his leg by some accident, he became incapable of military duty, and fortunately for his country, escaped the captivity to which the garrison was in the sequel, forced to submit.

When Charleston fell into the enemy's hands, Lieutenant Colonel Marion abandoned his State, and took shelter in North Carolina. The moment he recovered from the fracture of his leg he engaged in preparing the means of annoying the enemy, than in the floodtide of prosperity. With sixteen men only, he crossed the Santee, and commenced that daring system of warfare which so much annoyed the British army.

Colonel Peter Horry in his life of General Marion, gives the following interesting incident:—"About this time we received a flag from the enemy in Georgetown, South Carolina the object of which was to make some arrangements about the exchange of prisoners. The flag-bearer, after the usual ceremony of blindfolding, was conducted into Marion's encampment. Having heard great talk about General Marion, his fancy had naturally enough sketched out for him some stout figure of a warrior, such as O'Hary, or Cornwallis himself, of martial aspect and flaming regimentals. But what was his surprise, when led into Marion's presence, and the bandage taken from his eyes, he beheld in our hero, a swarthy smoke-dried little man, with scarcely enough of threadbare homespun to cover his nakedness! and instead of tall ranks of gay dressed soldiers, a handful of sun-burnt, yellow legged militia-men; some roasting potatoes, and some asleep, with their black firelocks and powderhorns lying by them on the logs. Having recovered a little from his surprise, he presented his letter to Gen. Marion, who perused it, and soon settled every thing to his satisfaction.

The officer took up his hat to retire.

"Oh, no!" said Marion, "it is now about our time of dining; and I hope, sir, you will give us the pleasure of your company to dinner."

At the mention of the word dinner, the British officer looked around him, but to his great mortification, could see no sign of a pot, pan, Dutch-oven, or any other cooking utensil, that could raise the spirits of a hungry man.

"Well, Tom," said the general to one of his men, "come, give us our dinner."

The dinner to which he alluded, was no other than a heap of sweet potatoes that were very snugly roasting under the embers, and which Tom, with his pine stick poker, soon liberated from their ashy confinement; pinching them every now and then with his fingers, especially the big ones, to see whether they were well done or not. Then having cleansed them of the ashes, partly by blowing them with his breath, and partly by brushing them with his sleeve of an old cotton shirt, he piled some of the best on a large piece of bark, and placed them between the British officer and Marion, on the trunk of the fallen pine on which they sat.

"I fear, sir," said the general, "our dinner will not prove so palatable to you as I could wish; but it is the best we have."

The officer, who was a well bred man, took up one of the potatoes and affected to feed, as if he had found a great dainty; but it was very plain that he ate more from good manners than good appetite.

Presently he broke out into a hearty laugh. Marion looked surprised. "I beg pardon, general," said he, "but one cannot, you know, always command one's conceits. I was thinking how drolly some of my brother officers would look, if our government were to give them such a bill of fare as this."

"I suppose," replied Marion, "it is not equal to their style of dining."

"No, indeed," quoth the officer, "and this, I imagine is one of your accidental Lent dinners: a sort of ban-yan. In general, no doubt, you live a great deal better."

"Rather worse," answered the general, "for often we don't get enough of this."

"Heavens!" rejoined the officer, "but probably what you lose in meal you make up in malt, though stinted in provisions, you draw noble pay."

"Not a cent, sir," said Marion, "not a cent."

"Heavens and earth then! you must be in a bad box. I don't see, general, how you can stand it."

"Why, sir," replied Marion, with a smile of approbation, "these things depend on feeling."

The Englishman said, "he did not believe it would be an easy matter to reconcile his feelings to a soldier's life on general Marion's terms: all fighting, no pay, and no provisions, but potatoes."

"Why, sir," answered the general, "the heart is all; and when that is much interested, a man can do any thing.—Many a youth would think it hard to indent himself a slave for fourteen years. But let him be over head and ears in love, and with such a beauteous sweet-heart as Rachel, and he will think no more of fourteen years servitude than young Jacob did. Well, now this is exactly my case. I am in love; and my sweetheart is Liberty. Be that heavenly nymph my companion, and these woods shall have charms beyond London and Paris in slavery. To have no proud monarch driving over me with his gilt coaches; nor his host of excisemen and Tax-gatherers insulting and robbing; but to be my own master, my own prince and sovereign; gloriously preserving my national dignity, and pursuing my true happiness: planting my vineyards, and eating their luscious fruit; sowing my fields and reaping the golden grain; and seeing millions of brothers all around me, equally free and happy as myself:—this, sir, is what I long for."

The officer replied that, both as a man and a Briton, he must certainly subscribe to this as a happy state of things.

"Happy," quoth Marion, "yes, happy indeed: and I would rather fight for such blessings for my country, and feed on roots, than keep aloof, though wallowing in all the luxuries of Solomon. For now, sir, I walk the soil that give me birth, and exult in the thought that I am not unworthy of it. I look upon these venerable trees around me and feel that I do not dishonor them. I think of my own sacred rights, and rejoice that I have not basely deserted them. And when I look forward to the long, long ages of posterity, I glory in the thought that I am fighting their battles. The children of distant generations may never hear my name; but still it gladdens my heart to think that I am contending for their freedom, with all its countless blessings."

I looked at Marion as he uttered these sentiments, and fancied I felt as when I heard the last words of the brave De Kalb. The Englishman hung his honest head, and looked, I thought, as if he had seen the upbraiding ghost of his illustrious countrymen, Sidney and Hampden.

On his return to Georgetown, he was asked by Colonel Watson why he looked so serious?

"I have cause, sir," said he, "to look so serious."

"What! has Gen. Marion refused to treat?"

"No, sir."

"Well, then, has old Washington defeated Sir Henry Clinton, and broke up our army?"

"No, sir, nor that neither; but worse."

"Ah! what can be worse?"

"Why, sir, I have seen an American general and his officers, without pay and almost without clothes, living on roots and drinking water; and all for Liberty!—What chance have we against such men?"

It is said Colonel Watson was not much obliged to him for his speech. But the young officer was so struck with Marion's sentiments, and he never rested until he threw up his commission, and retired from the service."

AGRICULTURAL.

Some six or seven years ago, we had a lot of English Plum trees in the yard, which he watched with daily attention while the CURCULIO was committing his depredations. We observed the whole progress of his destructive operations until they were at an end. We still had the prospect of an abundant crop, nearly matured. In this state of the case, there fell a fine shower of rain one afternoon, cleared up warm, so that the whole vegetable kingdom seemed to proceed with rapidity. Still keeping our eye closely upon the plums, we discovered that in a few hours a large portion of them cracked open, discharging their juice on the balance, they rotted, moulded, and ultimately dried and hung on the trees for several years. There was not, probably, a half peck matured out of some fifteen bushels.

If we had not watched these operations so closely, it is highly probable we should have attributed the whole of this destruction to the insect, whereas, but a small part should have been credited to his account.

From the National Ægis.

CULTIVATION OF THE PLUM.

Mr. Editor: Sir—I am induced to offer you some observations of mine on the cultivation of Plums. I have taken an interest in the cultivation of fruit for the last eight years, and now have several good kinds in a bearing state. The plum is one of our hardiest fruit trees. During our cold winters I lost pear, apricot, peach, and several of the Baldwin apple, by the severity of the cold, but not a single plum tree. Plum trees of almost all kinds are good bearers; they usually blossom full, and the fruit sets well, and it is certainly one of the most delicious fruits we have, when in perfection. The fine kinds are wholesome and salutary, and can be indulged in even so satiety, when fully ripe, without harm. They will grow well in rather a low loamy soil; if the soil is rich, they will grow fast and come quick into bearing.

But the grand obstacle in the way of cultivating this fruit, is the depredations of a small insect of the beetle tribe, which commences its operations when the fruit is quite small, and continues them usually till the first of August. This beetle is called by horticulturists the curculio—is about one sixth of an inch long, has two small bunches or protuberances on its back, and a rostrum or beak, and on this two antennæe.

By this rostrum its makes a semilunar incison on the plum, into which it deposits an egg. The egg hatches, producing a worm, or larvæ, which burrows down into the heart of the fruit, eating it through two or three times from end to end. This kills the life of the plum, causing it to wither and fall prematurely: the worm then soon leaves the fruit and enters the ground, where it undergoes a transformation or metamorphosis, common to the insect tribe, and then comes up a new curculio, to deposit its eggs as before described. Its work is not confined to the plum, but extends to the cherry, peach, and apple, though it would seem to prefer the plum to other fruit, on account, probably, of the smoothness of the skin, and the greater ease in making the incision. It is remarkable how general its depredations are on the plum tree when unmolested; for when the tree is loaded with fruit, and large, scarcely a single plum will remain unpunctured, and consequently all will be lost to the cultivator. Some kinds of peach and apple which have a woolly or furry surface, are not attacked. Almost all the wind-fall apples (as they are called) are produced by this beetle, and upon examination will be found to contain the larvæ or worm from the egg of the curculio.

The plum tree is subject to a disease on the limbs, a kind of excrescence or warty appearance, which Dr. Harris says is caused by this same curculio, puncturing the tender bark and depositing her eggs under it. "The swellings, or warts, are diseases of the bark, caused by the puncture of the weevil, and the residence of the grubs. The sap vessels being wounded and irritated by the insects, throw out an increased quantity of fluid; this is re-absorbed by the bark, which is consequently swollen and thickened in substance; the overstretched cuticle bursts, and the swelling becomes irregular, granulated, and full of fissures."

Dr. Harris recommends cutting out and extirpating these excrescenses and burning them before the last of June. The wounds made in so doing should be treated with mortar used in grafting.

The character of the curculio is shy and timorous; so much so, it is seldom seen unless hunted after purposely. He is not often seen in motion on the tree, but occasionally in a small crevice or crack, or the axilla of a limb, and so much does he resemble an old blossom or a bud, or a small piece of bark, that he will commonly remain unnoticed. Should the observer extend his thumb and finger to take him, ten to one if he don't elude him, falling as imperceptibly as a small shot would to the ground.

The habits of this insect are not well known, I still believe, to fruit growers. I have made frequent inquiry of them for a preventive measure. Some have told me the insect crawled up the tree, and most of them have never seen it to know it. It is well to remark, that it flies on the tree.

The following are some of the means of preserving fruit against the attacks of these insects:

First. All the premature fruit that falls to the ground with the worm in it, should be immediately gathered and burned. It will begin to fall as early as the 12th or 15th of June, and continue to, until the middle of August, if not ripe before This course, well pursued, will destroy the next generation of them and save the next year's crop.

Second. Shaking the tree briskly, morning and night, and two or three times during the day, will very much discommode and interrupt them from pursuing their operations—for at each concussion of the tree the insects fall to the ground, and if they re-ascend, will soon become discouraged by this course of treatment.

Third. Let two or three hands take a sheet or sheets, and spread under the tree, and then shake and jar it, and they immediately fall, feigning themselves lifeless, and appearing like a shapeless lump, and by those who are unacquainted with them, would not be taken for an animal until they moved. All that fall on the sheet should be immediately crushed.—This last mode of destroying them should be practiced twice a day while any are found. In the spring of 1837, I cooped a hen and chickens about an Imperial Gage, whose fruit was destroyed the preceding year, and about all the plums matured in this tree. It is probable that the beetles were destroyed by the brood, as they made their way to the surface of the soil. As this little animal is easily annoyed, trees standing before a store or shop, or any frequented place, usually more or less escape injury. I have known trees standing near a hog pen, mature their fruit year after year, while others, standing four rods distant, as surely failed.

Mr. Manning remarks in his Book of Fruits, that plums thrive best near the borders of the sea, and that the curculio is said to avoid the salt air.

If the foregoing remarks should prove of any advantage to horticulturists in the protection of fruit from injuries inflicted by this insect, or lead to minuter investigation into its nature and habits, I shall be well rewarded for this imperfect communication. JOEL BURNETT.

COMMUNICATION.

For the Western Recorder.

THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE PLEASANT HILL CIRCUIT QUARTERLY CONFERENCE, SIGNED JOHN CAREY, JR.

Whatever can be done in opposition to slavery, short of breaking down the governments of the country, and of the churches, we feel willing to do. But when measures are resorted to by brethren, which in our humble judgment, are so ultra in their character and tendency, as to leave us no government at all, through which to operate against slavery, or any other evil, then we feel ourselves brought all up standing in the opposition.

It is true the General Conference of the M. P. Church in Pittsburgh did, as Bro. Carey's preamble states, leave the subject of slavery with the people in their "primary assemblies"—may be too with the Annually Conferences. But we hear nothing of its being left with the quarterly conferences. Will Bro. Carey call quarterly conferences, shutting out as they do, all unofficial members of the church, primary assemblies? It seems from his proceedings that he does. We have felt no little surprise, that this brother, whose intelligence had procured him a seat in our last General Conference, should blunder so egregiously, as to think, when he stood on the floor of the Pleasant Hill quarterly conference, that he was now indeed, and in truth, in the midst of a "primary assembly." No bodies can be named, more apt to be under ministerial influence, or the influence of some hard skulled official member, than quarterly conferences. Bro. C. ought to know the difference between these bodies and "assemblies" of the people, which alone can be called "primary," and he ought to be a little above passing off his resolutions upon the public as the doings of a "primary assembly," when in fact they were merely the doings of a very small official body.

Bro. C.'s first resolution is a good one, but the second is very loosely worded—it would let slip, uncensured, a very great amount of moral evil. To buy, sell, or hold a man, a woman, or a child, would entirely escape condemnation. You must buy, sell, and hold men, women and children, it would seem, in order to incur censure from that resolution.

The third resolution inflicts a just censure, in rather coarse terms, against all divines who employ their powers, in apologizing for slavery, as though it were a gospel blessing. But the fourth looks at once to the breaking up of the churches, &c. "The holding church fellowship and communion" with slaveholders, "is a great evil, one which it is our duty, both as churches and as individuals, to abandon." Here brother C. calls for a division of the M. P. Church, &c.—let the bond of union be sundered—let her be scattered in fragments to the winds of heaven—let no government remain—and let all other churches follow in the wake of our waters, and all go to sticks—then let the union of the States be dissolved, come what will, "so the colored people go free."—Who says amen to all this? I don't—I hang on to religious and civil communion and fellowship to the very end, in hope of working good through the government, to all classes and colors in our country. Just let an universal rupture, in religious matters, take place between us and the south, and a rupture in civil matters might be expected immediately to follow, John Carey and his quarterly conference shouting on! on! brethren on! to the very last.

The fifth resolution is a good one,—confines church action within her own pale. But in the sixth those brethren who believe slaveholding to be a moral evil, and do not go all lengths with the ultraists, for fear of consequences, are declared to be "doing evil that good may come." Of course they mean to say, the condemnation of these considerate men will be just. Now, to have the wrath of heaven hung over us by such men as brother C. and his very Pleasant friends, who do not know the difference between a quarterly conference and a "primary assembly," is truly laughable.—The curse—causeless shall not come.

The seventh resolution is truly patriarchal or pontifical. The quarterly conference, or rather Bro. J. Carey, "calls most earnestly, affectionately, and in the fear of God, on all our brethren to unite with us in bearing their solemn and decided testimony against the cruel and unjust system of American Slavery."—Here is the Church arrayed against the State, and what if the State should retaliate, and array itself against the Church?—Would not the weakest go to the wall? In matters like these, it is an utter scandal to act without brains—men must pay attention to the consequences of action, unless they mean to renounce all claim to intelligence.—Friend Carey I will tell thee what I do not like:

1st. I don't like to see the State arrayed against the Church, as was the case during the ten persecutions in the first three centuries and since the Reformation, in several of the countries of Europe,—and even now, the State might as well persecute the Church as to leave her worship unprotected by law, to be trampled down by the wicked, as is the case, to some extent, in this State.

2d. I don't like to see the church, the spouse of Christ, slumbering in the adulterous bed of the "man of sin," as in the case of the Papacy.

3d. I don't like to see the church wedded to civil power, as in England and other countries of Europe.

4th. I don't like to see the Church arrayed against the State, and uttering its anathemas, bulls and thunders, as Popery did in the dark ages—making all the kingdoms of Europe to tremble,—and as you have attempted to do in your resolutions "against American Slavery;" you aim to overawe the civil government just like Popery—Popery fired cannons, you pop-guns, this is all the difference. Both mean by church influence to control civil governments.

5th. I don't like to see the church of Christ lending her influence and tagging herself on to the tail of slippery, serpentine politicians. Nothing can be done now, in the anti-slavery cause, only in a political way. Churches and ministers may try, but they can only work political effect, multiply voters and petitioners, and thus politically work through the government against slavery. They can't reach the conscience of the south with either verbal or written arguments; all this is hopeless. Abolitionists seem to allow this—hence they have made their cause a political hobby, and bro't out their candidate for President, and question all other candidates for all other offices. Let the church now surrender abolitionism to the civil citizens, to be managed by them as God in his providence may over-rule and direct, and let the church in future mind her own appropriate work.

Very respectfully, I am, &c.

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in city of New York, and devoted to Home and Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by PARK BENJAMIN.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant periodical sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 25. The situation of New York, and its immense commercial intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intelligence received in our "great metropolis." Availing ourself of the advantages derived from this source as many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper intended for "our country, our whole country"—warped by no sectional bias—controverting no mere political opinions—unsullied by any thing of immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of standard English works of value as may be convenient embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of original matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly, the Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazine, Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, LaBelle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.

We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of three celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which copyright is not attached.

The editor will especially aim to make The New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full account of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to our people; while they omit or neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.

We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which fall under the eye of the municipal police. We can see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No ludicrous accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal violations of social order by the ignorant and imbecile.

With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.

Price of The New World, THREE DOLLARS per annum, payable in advance.

All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

A TIME OF UNEXAMPLED PROSPERITY.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING, Author of the "Sketch Book."

n the course of a voyage from England, ce fell in with a convoy of merchant s bound for the West Indies. The ther was uncommonly bland; and the s vied with each other in spreading to catch a light, favoring breeze, un- heir hulls were almost hidden beneath loud of canvass. The breeze went n with the sun; and his last yellow s shone upon a thousand sails idly ping against the masts.

exulted in the beauty of the scene, augured a prosperous voyage; but veteran master of the ship shook his d, and pronounced this halcyon calm weather breeder." And so it proved. torm burst forth in the night; the sea red and raged; and when the day ke. I beheld the late gallant convoy ttered in every direction; some dis- sted, others scudding under bare poles, many firing signals of distress.

have since been occasionally remind- f this scene by those calm, sunny sea- s in the commercial world, which are wn by the name of "times of unexam- l prosperity." They are the sure ther breeders of traffic. Every now then the world is visited by one of e delusive seasons, when "the credit em," as it is called, expands to full riance; every body trusts every y; a bad debt is a thing unheard of; broad way to certain and sudden lth lies plain and open; and men are pted to dash forward boldly from the lity of borrowing.

Promissory notes, interchanged be- en scheming individuals, are liberally counted at the banks, which become so y mints to coin words into cash; and he supply of words is inexhaustible, it y readily be supposed what a vast unt of promissory capital is soon in ulation. Every one now talks in sands; nothing is heard but gigantic rations in trade; great purchases and s of real property, and immense sums le at every transfer. All, to be sure, et exists in promise; but the believer promises calculates the aggregate as olid capital, and falls back in amaze- nt at the amount of public wealth, the exampled state of public prosperity!"

Now is the time for speculative and aming or designing men. They re- their dreams and projects to the ig- ant and credulous, dazzle them with den visions, and set them madding af- shadows. The example of one stim- tes another; speculation rises on spec- tion, bubble rises on bubble; every helps with his breath to swell the dy superstructure, and admires and nders at the magnitude of the inflation has contributed to produce.

Speculation is the romance of trade, d casts contempt upon all its sober re- ties. It renders the stock jobber a gician, and the exchange a region of chantment. It elevates the merchant o a kind of knight errant, or rather a mmercial Quixotte. The slow but e gains of snug per centage become picable in his eyes; no "operatum" is ught worthy of attention, that does not able or treble the investment. No bu- ess is worth following that does not omise an immediate fortune. As he s musing over his ledger, with pen hind his ear, he is La Mancha's hero his study dreaming over his books of valry. His dusty counting house fades fore his eyes, or changes into a Span- mine; he gropes after diamonds, or es after pearls. The subterraneous rden of Aladdin is nothing to the realms wealth that break upon his imagina- n.

Could this delusion always last, the life a merchant would indeed be a golden eam; but it is as short as it is brilliant. t but a doubt enter, and the "season of exampled prosperity" is at an end.— ne coinage of words is suddenly curtail- ; the promissory capital begins to van- into smoke; a panic succeeds, and the hole superstructure, built upon credit, d reared by speculation, crumbles to e ground, leaving scarce a wreck be- nd:

"It is such stuff as dreams are made of."

When a man of business, therefore, ears on every side rumors of fortunes ddenly acquired; when he finds banks beral, and brokers busy; when he sees dventurers flush of paper capital, and full schemes and enterprise; when he per- ives a greater disposition to buy than sell; when trade overflows its accus- omed channels, and deluges the country; hen he hears of new regions of com- hercial adventure; of distant marts and istant mines, swallowing merchandize nd disgorging gold; when he finds joint tock companies of all kinds forming; ail roads, canals, and locomotive engines springing up on every side; when idlers uddenly become men of business, and lash into the game of commerce as they would into the hazards of a faro table; hen he beholds the streets glittering ith new equipages, palaces conjured up y the magic of speculation; tradesmen lushed with sudden success, and vying with each other in ostentatious expense; in a word, when he hears the whole community joining in the theme of "unexampled prosperity," let them look upon the whole as a "weather breeder," and prepare for the impending storm.

The foregoing remarks are intended merely as a prelude to a narrative I am about to lay before the public, of one of the most memorable instances of the infatuation of gain, to be found in the whole history of commerce. I allude to the famous Mississippi Bubble. It is a matter that has passed into a proverb, and become a phrase in every one's mouth, yet of which not one merchant in ten has probably a distinct idea. I have, therefore, thought that an authentic account of it would be interesting and salutary, at the present moment, when we are suffering under the effects of a severe access of the credit system, and just recovering from one of its ruinous delusions.

THE GREAT MISSISSIPPI BUBBLE.—Before entering into the story of this famous chimera, it is proper to give a few particulars concerning the individual who engendered it. John Law was born in Edinburg, in 1671. His father, William Law, was a rich goldsmith, and left his son an estate of considerable value called Lausiston, situated about four miles from Edinburg. Goldsmiths in those days, acted occasionally as bankers, and his father's operations under this character, may have originally turned the thoughts of the youth to the science of calculation, in which he became an adept; so that at an early age he excelled in playing at all games of combination.

In 1694 he appeared in London, where a handsome person, and an easy and insinuating address, gained him currency in the first circles, and the nick-name of "Beau Law." The same personal advantages gave him success in the world of gallantry, until he became involved in a quarrel with Beau Wilson, his rival in fashion, whom he killed in a duel, and then fled to France to avoid persecution.

He returned to Edinburg in 1700, and remained there several years; during which time he first broached his great credit system, offering to supply the deficiency of coin by the establishment of a bank, which, according to his views might emit a paper currency equivalent to the whole landed estate of the kingdom.

His scheme excited great astonishment in Edinburg; but, though the government was not sufficiently advanced in financial knowledge to detect the fallacies upon which it was founded, Scottish caution and suspicion served in place of wisdom, and the project was rejected. Law met with no better success with the English parliament; and the fatal affair of the death of Wilson still hanging over him, for which he had never been able to procure a pardon, he again went to France.

The financial affairs of France were at this time in a deplorable condition.—The wars, the pomp, the profusion of Louis XIV, and his religious persecutions of whole classes of the most industrious of his subjects, had exhausted his treasury, and overwhelmed the nation with debt. The old monarch clang to his selfish magnificence, and could not be induced to diminish his enormous expenditures; and his minister of finance was driven to his wit's ends to devise all kinds of disastrous expedients to keep up the royal state, and to extricate the nation from its embarrassments.

In this state of things, Law ventured to bring forward his financial project. It was founded on the plan of the Bank of England, which had already been in successful operation several years. He met with immediate patronage, and a congenial spirit, in the Duke of Orleans, who had married a natural daughter of the king. The duke had been astonished at the facility with which England had supported the burthen of a public debt, created by the wars of Anne and William, and which exceeded in amount that under which France, was groaning. The whole matter was soon explained by Law to his satisfaction. The latter maintained that England had stopped at the mere threshhold of an art capable of creating unlimited sources of national wealth. The duke was dazzled with his spendid views and spacious reasonings, and thought he clearly comprehended his system. Demarets, the Comptroller General of Finance, was not so easily deceived. He pronounced the plan of Law more pernicious than any of the disastrous experiments that the government had yet been driven to. The old king also, Louis XIV. detested all innovations, especially those which came from a rival nation; the project of the bank, therefore, was utterly rejected.

Law remained for a while in Paris, leading a gay and affluent existence, owing to his handsome person, easy manners, flexible temper, and a faro-bank which he had set up. His agreeable career was interrupted by a message from D'Argenson, Lieutenant General of Police, ordering him to quit Paris, alleging that he was "rather too skilful at the game which he had introduced!"

For several succeeding years he shifted his residence from State to State of Italy and Germany offering his scheme of finance to every court that he visited, but without success. The Duke of Savoy, Victor Amadeas, afterwards King of Sardina, was much struck with his project; but after considering it for a time; replied: "I am not sufficiently powerful to ruin myself."

The shifting, adventurous life of Law, the equivocal means by which he appeared to live, playing high, and always with great success, threw a cloud of suspicion over him wherever he went, and caused him to be expelled by the magistracy from the semi-commercial, semi-aristocratical cities of Venice and Genoa.

The events of 1715 brought Law back again to Paris. Louis XIV was dead.—Louis XV. was a mere child, and during his minority, the Duke of Orleans held the reins of government as Regent. Law had at length found his man.

The Duke of Orleans has been differently represented by different cotemporaries. He appears to have had excellent natural qualities, perverted by a bad education. He was of the middle size, easy and graceful, with an agreeable countenance, and open affable demeanor. His mind was quick and sagacious rather than profound; and his quickness of intellect and excellence of memory supplied the lack of studious application. His wit was prompt and pungent; he expressed himself with vivacity and precision; his imagination was vivid, his temperament was sanguine and joyous; his courage daring. His mother the Duchess of Orleans, expressed his character in a jeu d'espirt. "The fairies," said she, "were invited to be present at his birth, and each one conferring a talent on my son, he possessed them all. Unfortunately we had forgotten an old fairy, who, arriving after all the others, exclaimed: 'He shall have all the talents, excepting that to make good use of them."

Under proper tuition, the Duke might have risen to real greatness: but in his early years he was put under the tutelage of the Abbe Dubois one of the subtlest and basest spirits that ever intrigued its way into eminent place and power. The Abbe was of low origin and despicable exterior, totally destitute of morals, and perfidious in the extreme; but with a simple, insinuating address, and an accommodating spirit, tolerant of all kinds of profligacy in others. Conscious of his own inherent baseness, he sought to secure an influence over his pupil by corrupting his principles and fostering his vices: he debased him to keep himself from being despised. Unfortunately, he succeeded. To the early precepts of this infamous pander have been attributed those excesses that disgraced the manhood of the Regent, and gave a licentious character to his whole course of government. His love of pleasure, quickened and indulged by those who should have restrained it, led him into all kinds of sensual indulgence. He had been taught to think lightly of the most serious duties and sacred ties; to turn virtue into a jest, and consider religion mere hypocrisy. He was a gay misanthrope, that had a sovereign but sportive contempt for mankind; believed that his most devoted servant would be his enemy if interest prompted, and maintained that an honest man, was he who had the art to conceal that he was the contrary.

He surrounded himself with a set of dissolute men like himself, who, let loose from the restraint under which they had been held, during the latter hypocritical days of Louis XIV., now gave way to every kind of debauchery. With these men the Regent used to shut himself up, after the hours of business, and, excluding all graver persons and graver concerns, celebrate the most drunken and disgusting orgies, where obscenity and blasphemy formed the seasoning of conversation.—For the profligate companions of these revels, he invented the appellation of his roues the literal meaning of which is, men broken on the wheel; intended, no doubt, to express their broken down characters and dislocated fortunes; although a cotemporary asserts that it designated the punishment that most of them merited. Madame de Labran, who was present at one of the Regent's suppers, was disgusted by the conduct and conversation of the host and his guests, and observed at table, that God after he had created man, took the refuse clay that was left, and made of it the souls of lacqueys and princes.

Such was the man that now ruled the destinies of France. Law found him full of perplexities, from the disastrous state of the finances. He had already tampered with the coinage, calling in the coins of the nation, re-stamping it, and issuing in at a nominal increase of one fifth; thus defrauding the nation out of twenty per cent. of its capital. He was not likely, therefore, to be scrupulous about any means likely to relieve him from financial difficulties; he had even been led to listen to the cruel alternative of a national bankruptcy.

Under these circumstance, Law confidently brought forward his scheme of a bank, that was to pay off the national debt, increase the revenue, and at the same time diminish the taxes. The following is stated as the theory by which he recommended his system to the Regent. The credit enjoyed by a banker or a merchant, he observed, increases his capital tenfold; that is to say, he who has a capital of one hundred thousand livres may, if he possesses sufficient credit, extend his operations to a million, and reap profits to that amount. In like manner, a State that can collect into a bank all the current coin of the kingdom, would be as powerful as if its capital were increased tenfold. The specie must be drawn into the bank, not by way of loan, or by taxations, but in the way of deposite. This might be effected in different modes, either by inspiring confidence, or by exerting authority. One mode, he observed, had already been in use. Each time that a State makes re-coinage, it becomes momentarily the depository of all the money called in, belonging to the subjects of that State. His bank was to effect the same purpose; that is to say, to receive in deposite all coin of the kingdom, but to give in exchange its bills, which being of an invariable value, bearing an interest, and being payable on demand, would not only supply the place of coin, but prove a better and more profitable currency.

The Regent bit with avidity at the scheme. It suited his reckless spirit, and his grasping extravagance. Not that he was altogether the dupe of Law's specious projects: still he was apt, like many other men unskilled in the arcana of finance, to mistake the multiplication of money, for the multiplication of wealth; not understanding that it was a mere agent or instrument in the interchange of traffic, to represent the value of the various productions of industry; and that an increased circulation of coin or bank bills, in the shape of currency, only adds a proportionally increased and fictitious value to such productions. Law enlisted the vanity of the Regent in his cause. He persuaded him that he saw more clearly than others into sublime theories of finance, which were quite above the ordinary apprehension. He used to declare that, excepting the Regent and the Duke of Savoy, no one had thoroughly comprehended his system.

It is certain that it met with strong opposition from the Regent's ministers, the Duke de Noailles and the Chancellor d' Auguesseau: and it was no less strenuously opposed by the Parliament of Paris. Law, however, had a potent though secret coadjutor in the Abbe Dubois, now rising during the Regency into great political power, and who retained a baleful influence over the mind of the Regent.—This wily priest, as avaricious as he was ambitious, drew large sums from Law as subsidies, and aided him greatly in many of his most pernicious operations. He aided him, in the present instance, to fortify the mind of the Regent against all the remonstrances of his ministers and the parliament.

Accordingly, on the 2d of May, 1776, letters patent were granted to Law, to establish a bank of deposite, discount and circulation, under the firm of "Law and Company," to continue for twenty-years. The capital was fixed at six millions of livres, divided into shares of five hundred livres, each, which were to be sold for twenty-five per cent of the Regent's debased coin, and seventy-five per cent. of the public securities, which were then at the great reduction from their nominal value, and which then amounted to nineteen hundred millions. The ostensible object of the bank as set forth in the patent, was to encourage the commerce and manufactures of France. The louis d'ors and crowns of the bank were always to retain the same standard of value, and its bills to be payable in them on demand.

At the out, while the bank was limited in its operations, and while its paper really represented the specie in its vaults, it seemed to realize all that had been promised from it. It rapidly acquired public confidence, and an extended circulation, and produced an activity in commerce, unknown under the baneful government of Louis XIV. As the bills of the bank bore an interest, and as it was stipulated they would be of invariable value, and as hints had been artfully circulated that the coin would experience successive diminution, every body hastened to the bank to exchange gold and silver for paper. So great became the throng of depositors, and so intense their eagerness, that there was quite a press and struggle at the bank door, and a ludicrous panic was awakened, as if there was danger of their not being admitted. An anecdote of the time relates, that one of the clerks, with an ominous smile, called out to the struggling multitude. "Have a little patience, my friends; we mean to take all your money;" an assertion disastrously verified in the sequel.

Thus, by the simple establishment of a bank, Law and the Regent obtained pledges of confidence for the consummation of further and more complicated schemes. as yet hidden from the public. In a little while, the bank shares rose enormously, and the amount of its notes in circulation exceeded one hundred and ten millions of livres. A subtle stroke of policy had rendered it popular with the aristocracy.—Louis XIV. had several years previously imposed an income tax of a tenth. giving his royal word that it should cease in 1717. This tax had been exceedingly irksome to the privileged orders: and, in the present disastrous times, they had dreaded an augmentation of it. In consequence of the successful operation of Law's scheme, however, the tax was abolished, and now nothing was to be heard among the nobility and clergy, but praises of the Regent and the bank.

Hitherto, all had gone well, and all might have continued to go well, had not the paper system been farther expanded. But Law had yet the grandest part of his scheme to develope. He had to open his ideal world of speculation, his El Dorado of unbounded wealth. The English had brought the vast imaginary commerce of the South Seas in aid of their banking operations. Law sought to bring, as an immense auxilary of his bank, the whole trade of the Mississippi. Under this name was included not merely the river so called, but the vast region known as Louisiana, extending from north latitude 29 deg. up to Canada in north latitude 40 deg. This country had been granted by Louis XIV. to the Sieur Crozat, but he had been induced to resign his patent. In conformity to the plan of Mr. Law, letters patent were granted in August, 1717, for the creation of a commercial company, which was to have the colonizing of this country, and the monopoly of its trade and resources, and of the beaver or fur trade with Canada. It was called the Western, but became better known as the Mississippi company. The capital was fixed at one hundred millions of livres, divided into shares, bearing an interest of four per cent. which were subscribed for in the public securities.—As the bank was to co-operrte with the company, the Regent ordered that its bills should be received the same as coin, in all payments of the public revenue. Law was appointed chief director of this company, which was an exact copy of the Earl of Oxford's South Sea Company, set on foot in 1711, and which distracted all England with the frenzy of speculation. In like manner with the delusive picturings given in that memorable scheme of the sources of rich trade to be opened in the South Sea countries, Law held forth magnificent prospect of the fortunes to be made in colonizing Louisiana, which was represented as a veritable land of promise, capable of yielding every variety of the most precious produce. Reports, too were artfully circulated, with great mystery, as if to the "chosen few," of mines of gold and silver recently discovered in Louisiana, and which would insure instant wealth to the early purchasers. These confidential whispers of course soon became public; and were confirmed by travellers fresh from the Mississippi, and doubtless bribed, who had seen the mines in question, and declared them superior in richness to those of Mexico and Peru. Nay, more, occular proof was furnished to public credulity, in ingots of gold, conveyed to the mint, as if just brought from the mines of Louisiana.

Extraordinary measures were adopted to force a colonization. An edict was issued to collect and transport settlers to the Mississippi. The police lent its aid. The streets and prisons of Paris, and of the provincial cities, were swept of mendicants and vagabonds of all kinds, who were conveyed to Havre de Grace. About six thousand were crowded into ships where no precautions had been taken for their health or accommodation. Instruments of all kinds proper for the working of mines were ostentatiously paraded in public, and put on board the vessels; and the whole set sail for this fabled El Dorado, which was to prove the grave of the greater part of its wretched colonists.

D'Auguesseau, the Chancellor, a man of probity and integrity, still lifted his voice against the paper system of Law, and his project of colonization, and was eloquent and prophetic in picturing the evils they were calculated to produce; the private distress and public degradation; the corruption of morals and manners; the triumph of knaves and schemers; the ruin of fortunes and downfal of families. He was incited more and more to this opposition by the Duke de Noailles, the Minister of Finance, who was jealous of the growing ascendency of Law over the mind of the Regent, but was less honest than the Chancellor in his opposition. The Regent was excessively annoyed by the difficulties they conjured up in the way of his darling schemes of finance and the countenance they gave to the opposition of parliament; which body disgusted more and more with the abuses of the regency, and the system of Law, had gone so far as to carry its remonstrances to the very foot of the throne.

He determined to relieve himself from these two ministers, who, either through honesty or policy, interfered with all his plans. Accordingly, on the 28th of January, 1718, he dismissed the Chancellor from office, and exiled him to his estate in the country; and shortly afterwards, removed the Duke de Noailles from the administration of the finances.

The opposition of parliament to the Regent and his measures were carried on with increasing violence. That body aspired to an equal authority with the Regent, in the administration of affairs, and pretended, by its decree, to suspend an edict of the regency, ordering a new coinage, and altering the value of the currency. But its chief hostility was levelled against Law, a foreigner and a heretic, and who was considered by a majority of the members in the light of a malefactor. In fact, so far was this hostility carried, that secret measures were taken to investigate his malversations, and to collect evidence against him; and it was resolved in parliament that should the testimony collected justify their suspicions, they would have him seized and brought before them; would give him a brief trial, and, if convicted, would hang him in the court yard of the palace, and throw open the gates after the execution, that the public might behold his corpse!

Law received intimation of the danger hanging over him, and was in terrible trepidation. He took refuge in the Palais Royal, the residence of the Regent, and implored his protection. The Regent himself was embarrassed by the sturdy opposition of parliament, which contemplated nothing less than a decree reversing most of his public measures, especially those of finance. His indecision kept Law for a time in an agony of terror and suspense. Finally, by assembling a board of justice, and bringing to his aid the absolute authority of the king, he triumphed over parliament, and relieved Law from his dread of being hanged.

The system now went on with flowing sail. The Western, or Mississippi Company, being identified with the bank, rapidly increased in power and privileges. One monopoly after another was granted to it; the trade of the India seas; the slave trade with Senegal and Guinea; the farming of tobacco; the national coinage, &c. Each new privilege was made a pretext for issuing more bills, and caused an immense advance in the price of stock. At length, on the 4th of December, 1718, the Regent gave the establishment the imposing title of "The Royal Bank," and proclaimed that he had effected the purchase of all the shares, the proceeds of which he had added to its capital. This measure seemed to shock the public feeling more than any other connected with the system, and roused the indignation of parliament. The French nation had been so accustomed to attach an idea of every thing noble, lofty, and magnificent, to the royal name and person, especially during the stately and sumptuous reign of Louis XIV., that they could not at first tolerate the idea of royalty being leagued in any degree with matters of traffic and finance, and the king being in a manner a bank. It was one of the downward steps, however, by which royalty lost its illusive splendor in France, and became gradually cheapened in the public mind.

Arbitrary measures now began to be taken to force the bills of the bank into artificial currency. On the 27th of December, appeared an order in council forbidding, under severe penalties, the payment of any sum above six hundred livres in gold or silver. This decree rendered bank bills necessary in all transactions of purchase and sale, and called for a new emission. The prohibition was occasionally evaded or opposed; confiscations were the consequence; informers were rewarded, and spies and traitors began to spring up in all the domestic walks of life.

The worst effect of this illusive system was the mania for gain, or rather for gambling in stocks, that now seized upon the whole nation. Under the exciting effects of lying reports, and the forcing effects of government decrees, the shares of the company went on rising in value until they reached thirteen hundred per cent. Nothing was now spoken of but the price of shares, and the immense fortunes suddenly made by lucky speculators. Those whom Law had deluded, used every means to delude others. The most extravagant dreams were indulged concerning the wealth to flow in upon the Company from its colonies, its trade, and its various monopolies. It is true nothing as yet had been realized, nor could in some time be realized from these distant sources even if productive, but the imagination of speculators are ever in the advance, and their conjectures are immediately converted into facts. Lying reports now flew from mouth to mouth, of sure avenues to fortune suddenly thrown open. The more extravagant the fable, the more readily was it believed. To doubt, was to awaken anger, or incur ridicule. In a time of public infatuation, it requires no small exercise of courage to doubt a popular fallacy.

Paris now became the centre of attraction for the adventurous and avaricious, who flocked to it not merely from the provinces, but from neighboring countries. A stock exchange was established in a house in the Rue Quincampoix, and became immediately the gathering place of stock jobbers. The exchange opened at 7 o'clock, with the beat of drum and sound of bell, and closed at night with the same signals. Guards were stationed at each end of the street to maintain order, and exclude carriages and horses.—The whole street swarmed throughout the day like a bee hive. Bargains of all kinds were seized upon with avidity.—Shares of stock passed from hand to hand, mounting in value, one knew not why.—Fortunes were made in a moment, as if by magic; and every lucky bargain prompted those around to a more desperate throw of the die. The lever went on, increasing in intensity as the day declined; and when the drum beat and the bell rang at night, to close the exchange, there were acclamations of impatience and despair, as if the wheel of fortune had suddenly been stopped, when about to make its luckiest evolution.

To engulf all classes in his ruinous vortex, Law now split the shares of fifty millions of stock each into one hundred shares each; thus as in the splitting of lottery tickets,accommodating the venture to the humblest purse. Society was thus stirred up to its very dregs, and adventurers of the lowest order hurried to the stock market. All honest, industrious pursuits and modest gains, were now despised.—Wealth was to be obtained instantly, without labor, and without stint. The upper classes were as base in their venality as the lower. The highest and most powerful nobles, abandoning all generous pursuits and lofty aims, engaged in the vile scuffle for gain. They were even baser than the lower classes; for some of them, who were members of the council of the regency, abused their station and their influence, and promoted measures by which shares arose while in their hands, and they made immense profits.

The Duke de Bourbon, the Prince of Conti, the Dukes de la Force and D'Antin were among the foremost of these illustrious stock jobbers. They were nicknamed the Mississippi Lords, and they smiled at the sneering title. In fact, the usual distinctions of society had lost their consequence under the reign of this new position. Rank, talent, military fame, no longer inspired deference. All respect for others, all self-respect were forgotten in the mercenary struggle of the stock market. Even prelates and ecclesiastical corporations, forgetting their true objects of devotion, mingled among the votaries of Mammon. They were not behind those who wielded the civil power in fabricating ordinances suited to their avaricious purposes. Theological decisions forthwith appeared, in which the anathema launched by the church against usury, was conveniently construed as not extending to the traffic in bank shares!

The Abbe Dubois entered into the mysteries of stock jobbing with all the zeal of an apostle, and enriched himself by the spoils of the credulous; and he continually drew large sums from Law, as considerations for his political influence.—Faithless to his country, in the course of his gambling speculations, he transferred to England a great amount of specie, which had been paid into the royal treasury; thus contributing to the subsequent dearth of the precious metals.

The female sex participated in this sordid frenzy. Princess of the blood, and ladies of the highest nobility, were among the most rapacious of the stock jobbers. The Regent seemed to have the riches of Crœsus at his command, and lavished money by hundreds of thousands upon his female relatives and favorites, as well as upon his roues, the dissolute companions of his debauches. "My son," writes the Regent's mother, in her correspondence, "gave me shares to the amount of two millions, which I distributed among my household. The King also took several millions for his own household. All the royal family have had them; all the children and grandchildren of France, and the princes of the blood."

EPISCOPAL METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.

THE BOOK CONCERN AS REBUILT.—On Thursday morning, February 18, 1837, the spacious buildings of this noble institution, with nearly all its valuable stock of every description, were destroyed by a calamitous fire. All over our land were excited the most generous sympathies of the members and friends of the church, who gave substantial evidence of their high estimation of the importance of the Concern to the church and to the community, by their contributions for its restoration. The agents in behalf of the church, have felt, and still feel, a deep sense of the kindness of those generous friends, and deem it proper to give them a plain account of the Concern, as rebuilt, and show its adaptation to answer the design of its institution.

The front building is one hundred and twenty-one feet long, thirty feet wide, five stories high, including the basement, has iron doors and window-shutters thro'out, front, rear and inside, and the roof is covered with copper. Near the centre of this building is a cartway, nine feet wide which gives access to the yard.—The walls on each side of the cartway run up through all the stories, and about two feet above the roof; and the roof over this cartway is composed of iron rafters covered with copper, so that in the event of one end of this building taking fire it is believed there will be little or no danger of its being communicated to the other. In the north end of this building are eight large safety vaults, having double walls and double iron doors, believed to be perfectly fire-proof. These vaults are in the basement, first, second, and third stories, two in each, and are designed for the safe keeping of account books, valuable papers, stereotype plates, etc. In the upper story, and immediately over these vaults is a large cistern, so constructed as to receive the water from the roof, which is conveyed by leaden pipes to different parts of the building where it is needed in the operations of our business—such as wetting paper to prepare it for printing, washing stereotype plates, &c. It would also be of great advantage in case a fire should take place in the building. The cistern will hold two thousand three hundred and eighty-five gallons of water. There is a similar cistern in the back building, though not so large and also three large cisterns in the yard to receive the surplus water; which may be raised again when neeed to the cisterns in the buildings, by a forcing pump. The stair-way from which this building is entered by the workmen runs up between it and the wing of the rear building, and is constructed of iron supporters and hard plank steps. The roof over the stairs is of iron rafters covered with copper. In this building the book store and printing operations are arranged with great convenience. Here, also, the agents, editors, and clerks are well accommodated in their respective offices.

The rear building, which is sixty-six feet long, twenty-eight feet wide, with a wing of the same number of stories as the front building. It has iron doors and window shutters, and the roof is covered with tin. This building is occupied as a book-bindery and depository of stock of different kinds. Both buildings are of brick, built in the most substantial manner, and are well arranged for the business to which they are appropriated.

MANNER OF WARMING THE BUILDINGS.—These extensive buildings are warmed by steam, which, after having performed its work upon the engine, is conveyed through copper pipes into all the apartments where the workmen are employed, and finally returns, in a condensed state, into a large cistern, from which it is reconverted into steam. This method of warming thebuilding saves a large amount of fuel, much labor in making and keeping up the fires, and greatly diminishes the risk of accidents by fire.

THE BOILERS.—We have two boilers, which are used alternately a week each. This affords opportunity to clean and keep them in good order and is calculated also, in case of accident to prevent the necessity of stopping the works. In order to avoid, as far as possible, the danger from fire or explosion, the boilers are in a strong vaulted room and stone in the yard, with a room for coal and another which serves for the engineer's apartment.

THE STEAM ENGINE, rated at eight horse power, is of the very best workmanship, and performs to admiration.—It is situated in the basement story of the south end of the front building.

POWER PRINTING PRESS.—Until within about one year past, we were under the necessity of doing most of our book work upon hand presses; but are now happily relieved from this laborious and tedious mode of operation. We have eight power presses, all moved by steam; one Napier cylinder press on which the Christian Advocate and Journal is printed, and which will print one side at the rate of one thousand per hour; two medium power presses for printing books; two medium and a half, and three double medium.—For the better information of those who may not understand the terms medium, medium and half, and double medium, as applied to printing presses, and to give a correct idea of the amount of work these presses are capable of performing, we will farther state that a double medium press will print at one impression eight pages quarto, (the size of our large Bible,) sixteen pages octavo, (such as Wesley's Sermons,) twenty-four duodecimo, (such as Mrs. Fletcher's Life,) and so in proportion, books of a smaller page; and this too at the rate of fourteen impressions per minute. In other words, such a press will print a hundred and twelve pages of the quarto Bible, two hundred and twenty-four pages of Wesley's Sermons, or three hundred and thirty six pages of Mrs. Fletcher's Life in a minute! The pearl Hymn Book, the sheets of which have seventy-two pages on each side, are printed on a medium and half press, at the rate of fourteen impressions, as before, or one thousand and eight pages per minute.

The whole of these presses will print on an average forty-five reams of paper in a day of ten hours' work, two hundred and seventy reams in a week, or fourteen thousand and forty reams in a year; and if the business should require it, it is easy to continue the presses from one to three hours longer in the day, or if necessary, the whole, or part of them, could be run all night, as the steam engine does not tire or need sleep or rest, like the operators at hand presses. To the above we may add, should the present number of presses prove insufficient to print the necessary supply of books of every description proper to be issued from the Concern for the use of the members and friends of our church, we have the necessary arrangements in our building—and our engine was made with this view—to double the amount of our operations. So far, then, as the simple fact of manufacture is concerned we could very readily furnish double the amount of what we now do. But it should be borne in mind that something else besides facilities for manufacture is necessary to enable the conductors of this establishment to issue large editions and supply the quantity of books which may be called for. By a reference to the Discipline, p. 181, it will be seen that "the agent, or general book steward, shall have authority to regulate the publications, and all other parts of the business of the Concern, except what belongs to the editorial departments, as the state of the finances will admit, and the demands may require." Hitherto all demands have, to the full extent of the finances, been faithfully met; and if there has been any deficiency in the supplies of books, it has been owing, not to the ignorance on the part of the agents as to what books were needed, or to any incapacity of the establishment since its restoration to furnish them, but to the want of the requisite funds.

Upon the whole, notwithstanding the unprecedented embarrassments of the monetary affairs of the country, while this Concern, phœnix-like, has been rising from its ashes, we are happy to say to its friends, it now possesses capabilities of usefulness beyond any former period of its existence. We therefore thank God and take courage, and pray that it may still grow and prosper, and by its multiplied publications spread the hallowing influence of truth and righteousness over, not only these lands, BUT THE WORLD.

T. MASON & G. LANE,
November 8, 1839. Agents.

Now, we ask, where did Christ and His Apostles ever make such a splendid establishment as this? We ask again, what advantage to the poor members of the church, is this Mammoth Concern? We believe no books in the country are sold higher, or are a greater tax on the poor of Christ's flock, than those issued from the Methodist Book Concern.

As long as this Concern is under the entire control of the clergy, as it now is, it certainly can be nothing more than a source of temptation and corruption to them. If the church were to admit laymen into her councils, so as to watch and check these tendencies to abuse and oppression, such an establishment might be safe and beneficial. But, as the government is now contructed, entirely in the hands of the clergy, and ultimately in the bishops', it can be little more than a nucleus around which ambitious men and the creatures of power will hover.

We are well aware that any such suggestions as this is repelled with a very considerable amount of grave indignation, as illiberal and unbecoming the charities of the New Testament. So did Rome repel such insinuations when she was laying the foundation of that wealth and splendor which has rotted her to the very core. Human nature is the same in every church and age.

GENERAL CONFERENCE.

BALTIMORE, May 1, 1840.

Our General Conference met this morning in this city agreeably to appointment, and was opened in the usual form by reading the Scriptures and singing, by Bishop Roberts, and prayer by Bishop Hedding. The names of the delegates were called over in order and their certificates of membership presented and read. Most of the names of the delegates were given in our columns last week.—The Conference then proceeded to the election of a Secretary, when the Rev. John A. Collins, of the Baltimore Conference, was chosen. After some discussion the Rev. B. Haughtaling, of the Troy Conference, and Rev. —— ——, were chosen Assistant Secretaries.

At this period the Rev. Robert Newton, of the British Connection, and Rev. Mr. Stinson, President of the Canada Conference, and Rev. Mr. Ryerson of said Conference, were introduced. The Rev. gentlemen severally addressed the General Conference in a very appropriate manner, in which they avowed their attachment to the great principles of Methodism. Their addresses were very cordially reciprocated by the General Conference.

A resolution was also adopted to employ a reporter to report the doings of the Conference for the several papers published under its direction. This resolution was discussed at some length by several members. Some of the elderly members opposed it on the ground that the moneys of the Book Concern ought not to be so used—but it finally prevailed.

BALTIMORE, May 2, 1840.

In adopting the rules and regulations of the General Conference, yesterday, an attempt was made, to make a provision for taking the yeas and nays. This proposition was brought forward by Rev. H. Slicer, of the Baltimore Conference; but it was violently opposed by several members, and finally, on motion of Wm. B. Christie, of the Ohio Conference, was laid on the table. It was contended by one or more, of the speakers, that it was improper to let the public know how the members might vote on all questions! So it seems that in the judgment of the majority, questions are to be decided at this Conference on which it would be inexpedient to publish the yeas and nays!!

The resolution, which passed yesterday, to employ a reporter, is a new thing in Methodism. It was introduced by Dr. Bangs. His object in this, it is not difficult to "guess." When several members objected to the measure, in view of its being improper to report every thing that might be said and done, it was replied, that the reporter would be instructed as to what matters it was suitable or not suitable to report. We may, therefore, expect him to be under the influence of a supervisorship, which will give the right tone to every thing which appears. A fair and impartial reporter we are in favor of, and so stated yesterday; but a reporter for the whole body who will give peculiar prominence, and a favorable coloring to certain things, we are not in favor of. Such we fear may be the case, though we know not who is to be the man. We should greatly rejoice to find ourself disappointed in these anticipations. The reporter is to be paid by the Book Agents, though Dr. Bangs informed us in a late number of the Advocate, that the "avails" of the Book Concern "cannot be diverted for any other purposes than the support of necessitous, worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and orphans!"

This morning, after the journals were read and approved, the President introduced to the Conference the Rev. Mr. Howard, chairman of the Lower Canada District, who he said accompanied Dr. Coke when he first went out on a mission to India. Mr. Howard then made some appropriate remarks to the Conference.

Petitions and memorials were called for. The Conferences were called in order, commencing with New York. Dr. Bangs presented a memorial from several persons in Liberia, praying that Mr. Seys, missionary to that country, may be ordained a bishop! The memorial was read and referred to the committee on Episcopacy. The prayer will most likely be granted. Next a bishop will be wanted for Oregon. And the Episcopacy will probably be strengthened, in this country, by the ordination of two or three new bishops at this Conference. So it seems we are likely to plant our bishops in all climes.

A petition was next presented by O. Scott from New York city, on the subject of temperance, signed by about 1050 names. This was referred to the committee on Temperance. Another petition was then presented by the same from New York city, on the subject of Slavery, signed by about 1150 members of our church. It was proposed to refer this memorial to a select committee, when Rev. John Early of the Virginia Conference, (himself a slaveholder,) moved the appointment of a standing committee on the subject of slavery, to whom all papers touching that subject should be referred. The resolution was adopted; and after some discussion, it was resolved, that the committee consist of 28 members, one for each Annual Conference, to be appointed by the several delegations. This important measure was carried by a very large vote—and should there be full liberty for discussion in this large committee, and then in the Conference, our brethren will at least show that they are not afraid to look this subject in the face. And this appears to be the general disposition now in all parts of the house. There is however no hope of the adoption of any effective measures against slavery at this Conference. It has too much influence over the church to allow us to expect this. But if the subject can be freely and fully discussed, SLAVERY MUST, EVENTUALLY, DIE! The committee will probably consist of four abolitionists, twelve anti-abolitionists, and twelve from slaveholding States, two-thirds of whom will be likely to be slaveholders!

The memorial from New York referred to this committee.

Rev. J. A. Merrill then presented a memorial from a large number of our members in Springfield, Mass., on the subject of slavery, which was referred. Rev. P. Crandell next presented a memorial from several members of the M. E. Church in Fall River, Mass, praying for a "moderate Episcopacy." Read and referred to the Committee on Episcopacy; after which a memorial was presented by the writer, from the New England Conference, on the subject of slavery, which was read and referred. Rev. John Parker, of the Genesee Conference, presented a memorial on slavery from within the bounds of the Michigan Conference, signed by 95 names, which was referred.

Thus ended the chapter on memorials for to-day. But scores and perhaps hundreds will be presented next week, on various subjects, mostly on the subject of slavery.

A petition was also presented by a brother whose name we did not learn, from several members of our church, praying that the discipline may be so altered that committees for the trial of our members shall not be constituted of members of the quarterly conferences. Referred to the committee on Revisal. A committe of five was then raised on Sabbath Schools.

Dr. Bangs now presented a series of resolutions which proposed some important alterations in the discipline, and which produced considerable feeling through the conference.

The 1st. resolution provides that the discipline may be so amended that a superannuated preacher living without the bounds of his conference may not only be suspended, but expelled for improper conduct, by the conference within whose bounds he may reside.

The second provides that when a preacher shall be tried by an annual conference, if the presiding bishop differ in opinion from a majority of the conference, he may refer the case to the General Conference for final adjudication.

The 3d gives the same power to a presiding elder to refer the case a of local preacher to an annual conference.

The fourth relates to a supernumerary preacher; and if we mistake not, provides that such preacher refusing to do the work assigned him by the authorities of the church, may be tried, censured, or expelled.

These resolutions at the request of Dr. B. were laid on the table for the present. They are soon to be taken up, when Dr. Bangs will give his reasons for offering them, and they will probably, finally, become a law! Let all our readers mark and inwardly digest.

Rev. George Peck, of the Oneida Conference, introduced a resolution instructing the committee on temperance to ascertain as soon as possible from the records of the several annual conferences, whether we have a constitutional majority in favor of the restoration of Mr. Wesley's original rule on temperance. Adopted.

A committee of three was also ordered to ascertain the amount raised in all the annual conferences as centenary subscriptions.

The secretaries were also ordered to furnish a report of yesterday's doings for our official papers, as soon as possible.

Appointments were then made for the Sabbath, when the conference adjourned. —American Wesleyan Observer.

THE METHODIST MISSIONABY CAUSE.—The Methodist Missionary Society of New York celebrated their twenty-first anniversary in that city on Monday evening last. The Commercial Advertiser gives a detailed account of the proceedings.—The society has three hundred and sixty missionaries, proper, in its service, who preach in about thirty different languages. It has seven presses in foreign stations—sixty thousand children and adults in its schools—and about eighty thousand church members. The following table gives an interesting view of the several Indian Missions—also the state of the African Mission:

The Treasurer has been compelled to borrow upward of twenty thousand dollars, to meet the heavy demands against the society. The receipts during the year were one hundred and sixteen thousand, nine hundred and forty-one dollars and ninety cents, which, with a balance at the close of the previous year, makes a total of one hundred and forty-eight thousand,eight hundred and one dollars and sixteen cents.—Bicknell.

THE RELIGIOUS WORLD AND THE JEWS—THE MILLENIUM.

We sometime since noticed in our columns, a curious article from a foreign review, in which the writer attempted to shew, that the period for the Second Advent of our Saviour, was fast approaching. We also alluded to a similar doctrine entertained by some of the Philadelphia clergy, and called upon such as felt an interest in the subject, to communicate their thoughts and calculations. The matter was at first ridiculed by the multitude, and little attention was paid to it. The recent remarkable movements in the East, the disposition of the Jews to re-possess Jerusalem, and the extraordinary conversions to christianity among our people, have awakened a deep degree of interest and we now find that in this community the matter is talked of with gravity, and not considered so utterly absurd as the scoffers were at first disposed to assert. We only allude to the subject because it has excited a considerable degree of attention, and not without delicacy, for we confess that upon matters of this kind we think the human mind likely to become confused and to go estray. Our attention has been arrested just now by the appearance of a sheet from Boston entitled "The Signs of the Times"—and devoted exclusively to the merits of this question. We learn from this sheet, that a Mr. Miller has been preaching in several of the New England States, on the second coming of our Saviour, and has produced quite an excitement in the religious circles. We learn also that there are two classes of believers, who feel a deep interest in this subject. The first believe, that the reign of Christ will be a Literal Reign upon the earth after the Resurrection. They deny the popular notion of the "Jews return to Palestine," the "temporal Millenium," &c., and hold that the "Second Coming" is at hand.

The second class, believe that the reign of Christ will be Spiritual. That we are not to expect a literal appearance of Christ a "second time."—That there will be a temporal Millenium, or a peaceful, universal reign of Christ on the earth a "thousand years." That the Jews will return to Palestine as a nation—and that the Resurrection and General Judgment are far distant—that the time cannot be definitely fixed, &c.

Mr. Miller belongs to the former class, and from one of his arguments, we copy the following:

Daniel's vision of 2300 days long.

I have in some former lectures shown clearly that Daniel's vision concerning the four great monarchies, which were or were to come, included the whole history of the world so far as God saw fit to reveal it, down to the judgment day, and the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds. I then showed that the question was asked, how long should be this vision? The answer was given—2300 days. I then proved that days were to be counted years, by the command of God, by the example of Jacob, and by the fulfilment of a part of the vision. I then showed you when this vision began by the angel Gabriel's own declaration, who was commanded to instruct Daniel in the vision. According to this instruction, I showed you that four hundred and ninety years were accomplished of this vision, to a day, at the crucifixion of Christ, both events happening on the 12th day of the first month, four hundred and ninety years apart. And then I inquired, that if four hundred and ninety years of two thousand three hundred was fulfilled when our Saviour was crucified, how much of the vision remained after his death. I answered, one thousand eight hundred and ten years. I then inquired, what year after his birth that would be; and the answer was in the year 1843. I then begged the privilege, and do now, for any person to show me any failure of proof on this point, or where, possibly, according to scripture, there may be a failure in the calculation I have made on this vision I have not yet, by seventeen year's study been able to discover where I might fail.

Another writer argues that the second or Final Coming of Christ is an event yet future, and enforces his views thus:

1. His coming will be open, manifest, visible, and sudden, even as the lightning which cometh out of the east and shineth into the west. Nothing of this kind took place at the destruction of Jerusalem. 2. The Sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light. Nothing of this kind took place at Jerusalem. 3. The stars shall fall, i. e. there shall be a shower of meteors. Historians tell nothing of such phenomena being witnessed when the battering rams of the Roman army beat down the triple walls of the Holy City. 4. The heavens, or visible atmosphere, to be dreadfully agitated and pass away with a great noise. Nobody heard this noise or witnessed anything of the kind at Jerusalem. 5. Immediately after the tribulation of the last days, the Son of Man is to be seen in the clouds in power and great glory. 6. The last trumpet is to sound; "he shall send forth his angels with a sound of a trumpet."

7. His saints will be gathered together to meet him in the air. The history of the world furnishes us no account of the transaction of any of these things. There is not a particle of evidence that anything of the kind happened when Pagan Rome broke up the Jewish polity and burnt up their city and temple. But the objector will ask what will you do with the 34th verse; "verily I say unto you this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." This passage has perplexed many, and with its aid the Universalists have managed to apply prophecies to the destruction of Jerusalem, which every body knows were not in any sense fulfilled by that bloody event. But what is a generation? The children of our father are a generation. The wicked are said to be of their father, the devil, and they are "a generation of vipers," and that generation still lives.—The righteous are the children of God and they are a generation, "a seed shall serve him, it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation," Ps. 102: 25.—Again. "But ye are a chosen generation, royal priesthood, a holy nation," 1 Pet. 2. 9. Here we have the key to this passage. The children of God, Christians are "accustomed unto the Lord for a generation." But of his little flock of spiritual children the Son of God says. "Verily I say unto you this generation, (my Church, my disciples) shall not pass till all these things (signs) be fulfilled." Blessed be God the same generation still lives and many of them are now "looking for the bright appearing of the Great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," and "when he shall appear" they will pass away and "appear with him in glory."—Bicknell.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.—There appears to be a very general desire that the rates of letter postage should be reduced—and how much longer the government will neglect to act upon the subject, remains to be seen. To men of extensive business and correspondence, letter postage is a great tax. It is a well grounded opinion on all sides, says the Salem Observer, that the government would lose nothing in revenue from this source, by a reduction of the post office rates to one-third what they now are. Low rates would encourage epistolary intercourse of all kinds, and thus facilitate business and writing intercourse—and at the same time remove the inducements which now exist of making use of other modes of letter conveyance than that provided by government. Low postage will operate like low rates of travelling—increasing it in a great ratio inversely to the charge.

THE FLY.—We said last week there was com- int of the fly injuring the present wheat crop. ce, we have examined the state of the crop several townships in the western part of this nty, and at no period since the settlement of country has there been such ravages commit- by this insect. We can make no calcula- s from present prospects what will be the re- , not being acquainted with the depredations he fly, but judging from appearances there be a large portion not worth cutting, and all ore or lss injured. We have heard from the tern part of this county, and from some of the rounding counties, and the same complaint the destructive operations of the fly is made. have noticed that the early sewed and that ch is sewed on rich or well manured land s the best promise, while that which was sew- late, or on neglected soil is nearly destroyed. n the early part of the spring the wheat nev- ooked finer. But for some time past it began turn yellow and to become uneven. This hout examination was attributed to the wet ther, and it was not until within some ten s past the true cause of these appearances has n generally discovered.

f these destructive operations of the fly are eral throughout the west, wheat must rise in e as soon as this fact is settled. We would ommend all who have old wheat to hold on to it for the present; it will not likely go lower, but there is every prospect of its going higher.

The following extracts from private business letters from a citizen of Mississippi to his friend in Charleston, S. C., is given in the Mercury of the 9th inst. They shew a deplorable state of things in that State.

Extract of a Letter of the 25th of March.

"In order to remit to you, it will be necessary to purchase Louisiana money (at a heavy discount) and therewith procure a New Orleans draft on your city. We are in an awful condition, the days of the Brandon Bank again! Union money (standard) 35 to 40 per cent. below par.

"From present appearances, we shall not have a bank in the State in six months. My great fear is, that when the vacuum is created, the New Orleans Banks will expand to fill it by dealing in cotton and negroes, and then a tremendous explosion in that city!

"The anxieties and responsibilities attending collections here are so great that life itself is almost irksome, no one can lie down at night under any assurance that his money will buy meat and bread in the morning."

From another Letter of the 21st April.

"The remittance from New Orleans sent you by * was made at 50* per cent.

"We are rapidly coming to the specie standard. The bank or anti-bank bill of the last session will prostrate every bank in the State in six months. Resumption is obligatory, on notes of ten dollars on the 1st of July, of twenty's 1st of November, of all notes on the 1st of January, 1841. I can scarcely believe there is any one institution able to pay even its tens in July, assuredly they will fall under the pressures of their twenties, in November. I have no sympathy for them, so steeped are they in fraud and folly.

"Our court (a mere farce) has been going on for five weeks. No judgments are obtained, or but few, from the utter inefficiency of the Judge, and when obtained, nothing is realized.

"Of the three thousand cases (old and young) now on the docket, I seriously assert that not more than one hundred or one hundred and fifty can possibly ever produce any money. Such universal insolvency the most fertile imagination never dreamed of.

"The State Treasury is many thousands behind hand, all public work suspended, and all public officers unpaid. Treasury warrants (State Treasury) hawked about the streets at 50 pr ct. discount. An indebtedness in State Bonds of seven millions! five on account of the Union Bank, two on account of the Planters Bank, and the interest payable every six months. How can we pay it? Taxation must become intolerable."

*A traveller who left since that date, reports 70 per cent. as the discount.

It is a fact, generally speaking, that the preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church will have nothing to do with the Methodist Protestant Church; will neither preach in our pulpits when invited, nor ask any of our ministers to theirs. We know, however, there are honorable exceptions to these remarks, and we are happy to hear that they are, at present, on the increase.

The reason we have universally heard assigned for this course is, that we still continue the old controversy, and that they will have nothing to do with us while we continue to stricture them in our periodicals. Now, if this were in reality the reason, how comes it to pass, on all occasions that require it, they ask the Presbyterian ministers to their pulpits, when the periodicals of these respective churches have been in conflict, and sometimes very severely, with each other, from the introduction of Methodism down to the present?

In conversation with an old friend, in this town, a man of intelligence, he assigned the above reason for the Episcopal ministers not preaching for us, and added, he could scarcely pick up one of our papers, but he met with an attack upon them; whereas, their periodicals never made any allusions to us, or to the controversy.

Now, suppose we were to admit the correctness of the above statement, might we not find the cause to exist in something else, than the fact that our Episcopal brethren are more mild and pacific than their neighbor? 1st. They have never gained any thing by paper conflicts, but have usually been worsted, not for the want of talent, for of this they have plenty, but because they have had the wrong end of the tale. 2dly. They are at this time in a more distracted state than they have probably ever been before, and of course, have need of all their ammunition at home, without wasting on those abroad.

But, we think, however, our friend has not read the papers of his church very closely, for we believe they continue to attack us, both directly and indirectly. We had at that very time a paper in our pocket, which we had not examined, that gave extracts from two of the journals of the M. E. Church, who were down on us quite heavy. Let us give one of these extracts; it relates to a correspondent of the Olive Branch (a paper published by a minister of our church) who writes over the signature of "Junius," and who is said to be one of the oldest Methodist ministers in America. He is a man of learning and a strong writer, though upon the merits of his essays, we give here no opinion. The Virginia Conference Journal, we believe an official Episcopal Methodist paper, speaking of this said "Junius," has the following magniloquent sentence:

"Would it be wrong to suppose him to possess a spirit such as might be concocted out of the ferocity of the tiger, the bray of an ass, the strut of a peacock, the hiss of a goose, the grunt of a sow, mixed up with the slime of a serpent and the spittle of toads."

The Methodist preacher, who proposed riding down on a thunderbolt through a crab apple tree without getting scratched, could not beat this.

Now, it is a fact, that we do occasionally oppose what we think wrong in our old Episcopal brethren, and we do it in all frankness, and it costs them nothing. But, grace has so far, saved us from that spirit of intolerance, which would induce us to treat a worthy minister of that church with contempt and neglect. Should his lot be cast among us, we would cheerfully invite him to our pulpit, and treat him with all christian courtesy. And this should not be done with a formal stiffness, to save appearances, but, if we know ourself, it would be done from a feeling of christian benevolence.

It is true that we have written some tolerably strong things against the M. E. Church; but have they not written equally as strongly against us? We will risk the whole on this issue. Let us compare accounts, and if theirs do not more than balance ours, we will agree that what we have said against them is a sufficient reason for their treating us with contempt. If writing severe things is a sufficient reason for withholding fellowship and excluding from their pulpits, why is not such men as Henry B. Bascom and others, excluded. We challenge the whole church to produce as severe and caustic satire, written by any member of our fellowship, in reference to the claims of Methodist episcopacy, as was written by the gentleman above named. Now, he has never made the least concession for this severity, nor professedly abandoned a single principle, yet, because he still lives in the old fold, he is hailed every where as a beloved brother, and all the pulpits in the land thrown open to him with great readiness; while the honest man, who was convinced by the arguments of the Rev. Bascom, but who would not suffer himself to be "bought up by the sale of indulgence," to follow his principles, has retired from the M. E. Church, to share the fate of his expelled brethren, is treated as a Turk or an infidel. Any church guilty of such ridiculous inconsistencies as this ought to be told of it.

Again. Our Episcopal Methodist brethren profess to be a special class of moral reformers. They tell us, in their discipline, that they are satisfied they were raised up by Providence to "spread scripture holiness over the land." Now, men who are favored with a special dispensation of grace, are certainly expected to exhibit a large amount of that "charity" which "suffers long and is kind." It is recorded of Philip of Macedonia, who had decided the case of one of his subjects, in the market place, according to the custom of the princes of the East, against his interest, that he cursed the king all day, threw up to him every act he had done, to which exception could be taken, and that he followed him in the evening to the very gates of his palace with reproaches. When the servants of the king heard this, they asked permission to dispatch him for his insolence. No! replied the noble minded monarch, he is my friend, he tells me of my faults, and that is more than you do. Now, after all their pretentions to extra goodness, will our old brethren permit a heathen to out do them in christian forbearance?

COMMUNICATION.

For the Western Recorder.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS FOR THE WORK ON DIVINE BENEVOLENCE.

Mr. Editor: I did not know, till informed in your periodical, that A. H. Bassett had subscribed for any of my Books. Upon gaining this information, I had the number specified put into a small box, and directed to Bro. Bassett, care of E. Crow, Louisville, Ky.

I was informed by Bro. Clarke, that subscribers were taken at the Ohio Conference; but I have received no returns, and of course, could not know to whom the books were to be directed.—Friends who have subscribed in the neighborhood of Cincinnati, will please call on Mr. George Conklin, book-seller in Cincinnati, for the number of copies for which they had subscribed.

I sent a box of two hundred to Zanesville, for Wm. Marshall and O. White, directed to the care of a book-seller in Zanesville, as recommended in the Western Recorder, to be delivered to the subscribers in that region of country; and I sent their names in a letter to Bro. Marshall.

I sent a box of fifty copies to Bro. Clancy and another of the same number to Bro. Ostrom, according to their directions. Two boxes were sent to Steubenville, with directions to Bro. Burns, how the Books were to be distributed. There is a small surplus, both in Zanesville, Steubenville and New Lisbon, so that purchasers who had not subscribed may be furnished with copies, if they desire it. The books were sent to Bros. Gibbons, Hopwood and Phillips, according to their directions, and I hope they have arrived, or will arrive without injury, to the respective places of their destination. A few are still remaining in Pittsburgh, and can be had by applying at the store of Shinn, Sellers and Wilson, or at the book-store of Mr. Kay, or at that of Forrester and Campbell, all in Wood street.

Those friends who have kindly engaged to assist me in this matter, will endeavor to be in readiness to make payment at the sitting of our Annual Conference in Steubenville, as I shall have large payments to make shortly after that time.

I have devoted my leisure hours, since my return from Philadelphia, and shall continue it until our Annual Conference, in preparing for the press, a work to be entitled "Calvinism and Arminianism compared: with a view to remove 'Difficulties' which stand in the way of Christian Harmony." The more attention I devote to this subject, the more manifest does it appear to me, that it is a necessary Appendix to the previous publication; and all intelligent readers will find that the two must be examined in connection, in order for the mind to be advantageously in possession of the whole subject. If our Conference will sustain me with a liberal energy, I shall be able to put this work to press in the course of the coming year, and I am not without hope that the satisfaction and edification it will furnish to the minds of my intelligent friends, will fully equal their anticipations.

I feel a great desire to employ the short remnant of my earthly pilgrimage, in casting in my mite of mental labor, to clear away the mists of error in which the religious world has been so long enveloped; and I am thankful to a gracious Providence, to find so many of my friends disposed to assist me. I feel under great obligations to our Annual Conference, to the Pittsburgh Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and to the Book Committee, of Baltimore; and I trust the public patronage will be such as to relieve us all from difficulty or embarrassment. If we will candidly and harmoniously persevere in the course of investigation which has been begun, I am persuaded we shall soon be prepared to make a more efficient attack upon infidelity, than has been witnessed for the last thousand years.

Yours, with respect and esteem,

A. SHINN.

P. S. If my friends and the public will have patience to hear me out, I hope to convince them thoroughly, not only that the principles which I advocate are true, but that they are truths of essential importance to the best interests of mankind. A. S.

CEYLON MISSION.—Mr. Ward thinks that a great change is coming over the minds of the people on the subject of religion. They read much and are changing their views perceptibly on important points.

The ship Belvidera, Capt. Oliver, sailed from Baltimore on Thursday for Trinidad, with one hundred and thirty-five colored emigrants. They appeared to be satisfied, and highly pleased with the prospect.

The newspapers still abound with highly gratifying accounts, in relation to the Temperance Reform in Ireland. On a recent visit to Dublin, Father Matthew administered the pledge to no less than 70,000 persons.

WHISKERS.—The Bavarian monarch, aware that many men cultivate their whiskers more than their intellect, has ordered that whiskers be banished from the countenances of all school masters within his dominions.

LOGICAL.—The Baltimore Sun contends that if money—that is specie—be the "root of all evil," shin-plasters must be the LEAVES; and thence draws the inference that Baltimore and Philadelphia must be "in full leaf."

SIN IS HEAVY.—A gentleman weighing a lady, not finding a sufficiency of weight, put his foot into the scale, when he observed, "sin weighs heavy." "It does, indeed," said the lady, "for one FOOT weighed me down."

Paris has no Sabbath. It is the day of the god of this world. It has about 2000 protestant hearers, and fourteen faithful sermons are preached there every Sabbath day. 800 children are in Sabbath schools, two-thirds of them Roman Catholics.

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.—A bishop not over remarkable for moral rectitude, once met a poor tradesman, a great wag, extravagantly dressed: "Sir," said the bishop, "that dress does not suit you." "Neither my lord, do you SUIT your dress," said the wag.

The New Orleans Bee states that a Mexican girl named Gaudalope Lass, said to have been the most beautiful woman in Texas, lately killed herself in consequence of her mother insisting upon her marrying a man she did not love. She shot herself through the heart with a pistol.

MORUS MULTICAULIS.—The New York Journal of Commerce says: "The Morus Multicaulis fever is entirely over. Thirty thousand of them in good order were offered by auction the other day at twenty-five dollars for the whole, but none would take them. The lot would have sold a year ago for some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars."

MR. JACOB FRY.—From inquiry we have learned that no doubt exists that this young man who recently put up at Mr. Thompson's Hotel, Callowhill street, and who left on Saturday last in a mysterious manner, has gone off of his own accord. No blame can be attached to the proprietor of the hotel and drove yard, as he has resorted to every means that could lead to a discovery. —Pennsylvanian.

A merchant from Detroit, lately arrived in New York, says there were 25,000 barrels of Flour there, waiting to be shipped to New York as soon as the Lake was clear of the ice at Buffalo. The ice is now all gone, and the above Flour from Detroit is part of it on its way down.—Three years ago Michigan imported Flour from Buffalo; now they have it to sell, in large quantities.

THE COMMERCE OF AFRICA.—The trade of Africa is beginning to be looked upon as quite important. It is stated on competent authority, that of the single article of palm oil, the value of over $7,000,000, has been imported into England from Africa in a single year. Camphor wood, which is worth $90 per ton, can be obtained in abundance at Liberia. A letter in the Merchants' Magazine, states that as soon as roads are cut into the interior, ivory, gold dust, and many other valuable articles, may be obtained in abundance for the purposes of trade and traffic.

PAY YOUR POSTAGE.—The editor of the Hartford Courant, speaks feelingly on this subject as follows:

"One of the besetting vices of our country, is that of writing to people about our own business, and leaving those whom we trouble with our affairs to pay the postage! Regard it as we may, this practice is nothing more or less than plundering—and those who pursue it may rest assured, that for every two shillings tax they thus impose upon others without their consent, they lose a dollar's worth of reputation."

MARRIAGE OF THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND. —When Napoleon was Emperor, there was always a chicken roasted for His Majesty in the palace kitchen, in order that he might not be kept waiting a moment when he wanted to eat.

As soon as one fowl was removed another was put in its place.

So it is with the Princes of Cobourg—there is always one upon the spit very tender, quite roasted, quite ready to marry the Queens of England.

If there is a position unworthy of a high-minded man, it is that of the husband of the Queen of England. Reversing all laws, both human and divine, it is the man in such an alliance, who owes submission and obedience to his wife—the woman who gives protection to her husband. The act of naturalization which he has obtained, gives him the title of an English citizen, and makes him the subject of his wife. A pretty situation, that of a husband whose least infidelity may be considered high treason, and whose wife has a right to hang him for incompatibility of disposition!

By the terms of the law, Prince Albert can never command the forces of England—he can never be a legal counsellor of the Queen—he can never sit in Parliament. The aristocracy have refused him precedence over the princes of the blood. His children, if he have any—and he must have some, or he will be hung—will walk before him in all ceremonials. The House of Commons has razeed the revenue asked for him. One must love honors a vast deal, to pay for them thus at the price of honor.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.—William Marvin, to be Judge of the United States for the Southern District of Florida.

Vinton Butler, of Florida, to be District Attorney of the United States for the District of West Florida, in the place of George Walker, resigned.

I. G. Seary, to be Marshal of the United States for the Middle District of Florida, in the place of S. W. Duvall, deceased.

Charles F. Ryan, to be Consul of the United States for the port of Copenhagen, in the place of Charles J. Hambro, resigned.

James E. Freeman, of New York, to be Consul of the United States for the port of Ancona, in the Roman States.

Wade H. Greening, Register of the Land office at Sparta, Alabama, from 14th May, 1840, when his present commission will expire.

Charles S. Wallace, of the State of Ohio, to be Consul of the United States for the port of Matagorda in the Republic of Texas, in the place of John A. Monges, deceased.

Henry D. Peire, Naval Officer at New Orleans, Louisiana, from the 14th of April, 1840, when his late commission expired.

Aloyisius Thompson, Surveyor and Inspector of the Revenue at Llewellersburg, Md. vice H. G. S. Key, resigned.

SURVEYORS OF THE REVENUE.—Nathan Bardin, Bristol, Rhode Island, vice Allen Wardwell, deceased.

Geroge Forbes, Wheeling, Virginia, vice Jefferson L. Sangston resigned.

A MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.—The Baltimore Sun of yesterday, contains a letter, detailing the particulars of a suicide, by a store-keeper in Belvidere, Warren county, N. J. The name of the unfortunate man was James Quick, and the cause of the fatal act, is stated to have been pecuniary embarrassment. The Sun says:

It seems that this man, in company with his son, had purchased for credit, months since, immense quantities of grain from the farmers of Warren and surrounding counties. By offering an advance of prices he monopolized in his neighborhood this article, which was principally sent to the New York and Philadelpha markets. At the time of contracting, the prices for grain were higher than at the present time; the consequence was when it came to market a loss was experienced in its sale. In the meanwhile the time for payment to the farmers was near at hand without the debtors having it in their power to meet the demands against them. The son, to evade the difficulty, absconded, and the old man disappeared at the same time—it was thought he had followed the son, but the next morning, the denouement of the tragedy was completed. The wife of the son, on attempting to enter the room of her father-in-law, where he had been concealed, found the door fastened; her fears were excited. the alarm was given, the room was forcibly entered, and the horror stricken spectators saw before them the disfigured remains of their relative and neighbor. He had made two attempts with a razor, the first gashed his cheek downwards, the second was effectual, his windpipe being entirely severed. The news carried sorrow and embarrassment to many a farmhouse, for expectations unrealized and engagements unfulfilled. The old man was between 60 and 70 years old, but the spirit of speculation, stimulated to madness by a pernicious credit, severed his hold on life, and he now fills a hurried and untimely grave. The amount of his indebtedness to the farmers in his neighborhood, is said to exceed one hundred thousand dollars"

THE FARMER'S CHOICE.

"A little house well filled,
A little wife well willed,
A little land well tilled."

Our ancestors were fed on bread and broth,
And woo'd their healthy wives in homespun cloth;
Our mothers, nurtured at the nodding reel,
Gave all their daughters lessons on the wheel.

Though spinning did not much reduce the waist,
It made the food much sweeter to the taste;
They plied with honest zeal the mop and broom,
And drove the shuttle through the noisy loom.

They never once complain'd as we do now,
"We have no girl to cook and milk the cow;"
Each mother taught her red cheek'd son and daughter,
To bake, to brew, and draw a pail of water.

No damsel shunn'd the wash-tub, broom or pail,
To keep unsoil'd a long grown finger nail;
They sought no gaudy dress, no wasp like form,
But ate to live, and work'd to keep them warm.

No idle youth—no tight-laced, mincing fair,
Became a living corpse, for want of air—
No fidgets, faintings, fits, or frightful blues,
No painful corns from wearing Chinese shoes.

The Post Master at Bellsville, Ohio, says, N. Barkbust does not take his paper from the office. Will Bro. Cady see to this matter?

The appointments of the President of the Ohio Conference were published as soon as they came to hand, and were out before the last communication from Bro. Hibben.

Bro. Woodruff, you requested us to send the paper of John Scott, of McConnelsville, to "Urick's Mills," as he has moved to the "north," but you do not give the county, and even express some doubt about there being such an office. We can find no such office on our post book. We think it best not to change until we have more definite directions from you.

We inform our friend T. J. Finch, of Cincinnati, that, at his former order, we sent him the 15th number, with his name written, both on the paper and on the invelope. We are now out of the numbers he wants except our two files, from one of these we have forwarded him the 15, 31 and 37 Nos. to complete his file.

ORIGINAL PIECES, NO. XI.

NATURE.

What shall we name the Great First cause
  Of all that is the primal spring?
What shall we call those sacred laws,
  The second cause in ev'ry thing?*
From lofty cedars great and tall,
  To smallest things the very same,
And take creation all in all,
  What shall we call her second name?
Which 'gan at first creation's morn,
  And lives till now and can't decay,
And but an hour ago was born,
  Is seen by night unseen by day;
And is the twinkling stars of night,
  The solar and etherial fire,
The briny waves of ocean's might,
  And is Arabia's drougthy ire;
Is cunning in the wily fox,
  And blackness in my shining ink;
'Tis always white in hoary locks,
  This moment I upon it think;
Is red, is yellow, green and blue,
  It is your ear, is ev'ry sound;
It is as large as nature is,
  And yet so small it can't be found.
It's in the air, is ever nigh,
  Wher'er you look 'tis all you see,
By it you laugh, by it you cry,
  And is well known to you and me.
It gave me my peculiar forte,
  It forms† the ice and chills the air,
It gave me toys in boyhood's sport,
  Gives all that's made, all that are;
It forms old Etna's baleful fire,
  Still unconsum'd from age to age,
And forms the ever roaring tide,
  Still murmuring on in sportive rage;
It forms old ocean's costly pearl,
  And is her briny heaving waves,
The Maelstrom in her awful whirl,
  And ev'ry shore which ocean laves.
It forms the warm and genial sun,
  It guides the comets in their course,
It makes the orbs their circles run,
  And is their great projectile force.
It made the Afric's ebon skin,
  The Redman's too of copper hue,
Circassia's ruddy, soft and thin,
  Europa's medley features too.
'Tis every where and no where found,
  It half decays, it can't consume,
It brings sweet nature to the ground,
  And lays us in the silent tomb.

There's one thing more I must tell to men,
Before I lay down by feeble pen;
Pride the fierce monster known in time,
By the names of envy, sin and crime,
Gave birth to a nature of her own,
With features form'd for herself alone;
It lives without the Great First cause,
And feels but will not own His laws,
And by abuse of sacred laws,
First came her birth and life and cause;
Her place is hell, the land of death,
Her votaries breathe a demon's breath.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: Please indulge me with a few remarks in reply to my friend J. Smith, of "Sugar Grove, Ohio."

He complains that I have done him "injustice," and lost both "myself and the subject in the fog." A pretty good beginning this, though not by any means a new way of managing a bad case. It shows however, that the writer has some tact for managing a newspaper discussion. He seems farther, to wish us fully to understand that his mind, being wholly unobstructed by the "fog," admirably qualifies him to furnish his readers with an uncommon intellectual feast.—Referring to my reply he says, "My main position, he passes by in total silence," &c. True. Because, in my opinion, it was addressed to the Rev. John Clark, and for me to have attempted a reply to it would have been exceedingly impertinent, knowing that Mr. C. could defend himself much better than I could do it for him, besides, I did not consider myself responsible for any thing that Mr. C. had written. And another reason why I could not consider the subject of his main position directed to me, was, that I had neither said nor done any thing, that in my opinion, could justify such an application. But as his last communication renders it necessary, I shall say a few things on this subject. And in order to be clearly understood, I shall arrange his admissions, and notice wherein we agree, and wherein we may be supposed to differ from each other. And

1st. He says, "The people have a right to make the abolition of slavery a political question if they see proper," &c. Agreed. "But," he says, "when ever it assumes this attitude, ministers of religion should take no leading part in the matter," &c. Now, if he means "a leading part," so as to become leaders in a "political campaign," we are agreed; but the fact of abolition becoming a political question, surely has no tendency to change the moral features of slavery. Suppose the toleration of the christian religion, in some peculiar form, should become a political question in this, as it has been in other countries, must ministers, therefore, abandon religion as wholly a political subject, and give the lead to politicians? And it would be no more reasonable for them to abandon the cause of emancipation, because it is becoming a political question. If slavery, as it exists in these United States, is a moral evil, as such, it dishonors God, and is at varience with the happiness of those intelligent beings, who are under its obsolute control; and as its abolition would tend to remove one great obstruction to the happiness of those enslaved, by opening the way to mental and moral improvement, therefore, the abolition of slavery, as it is to abandon wrong, must be right. And as it is the duty of all to do right, therefore, the influence of all should be given in favor of emancipation, which would be in fact, to abolish slavery. God wills the happiness of all men, but slavery comes in contact with that will, is therefore wrong and ought do be abolished. It is therefore the duty of ministers of religion, as well as that of the people in general, to oppose slavery until truth shall triumph over error, and justice and mercy over oppression and cruelty.—And whatever politicians may say and do upon this subject, it must ever remain a fit subject of discussion for ministers and the christian press, while it exists, unless it can be made to appear that its becoming a political question, will change the moral features of the principle.

As to its political bearings, it is generally looked upon as an evil of great magnitude; and while it is the duty of the church to purify herself from its moral corruptions, it is also the duty of those who feel an interest in the welfare of this nation, to use all just and proper means to abolish it as a political evil, and thereby save the country from political ruin. And on this, as well as on any other political subject, ministers of religion have a right to exercise the elective franchise, but should never do it in a way to give just ground for the cause of Christ to suffer.

2. He says, "I admit his right to be a modern abolitionist," &c. Agreed.

3. "I admit his right to be an abolition lecturer," &c. All right,—and more than I have, as yet, exercised.

4. "I also admit his right to vote for his abolition President." &c. Agreed. And as for the charge of wishing to make the pulpit and the religious press subserve the interests of such an election, it is wholly gratuitous and without foundation in truth. And all his eloquence, in striving to make the impression that I am aiming at political distinction, is but the product of his own jealous heart and heated imagination, and gives ground to suspect that he is himself the political aspirant. I do assure the gentleman that I am no aspirant for political office; and if I were, it would surely become me, through feelings of sympathy, to resign all such pretentions in his favor.

Again, he objects that I "advertise" myself "to be a party man," &c. And why did he not tell us what party? If he did not know, I will inform him. It is the Methodist Church.—And that I am no more anti-slavery in my notions, than the Methodist Church has always been in theory, I have in my possession, documentary evidence abundantly to prove, which I shall adduce, provided this discussion shall continue.

Again. He talks about "fog," "injustice" and "illiberal inference," &c.; and behold what a specimen he has given us in the following sentences. He says, "All great agitators are generally found to reside in the large cities," &c.—"Their location gives them a ficticious importance with the public." "Then they, in turn, on the success of their parties, usually receive the richest reward." "These considerations cannot well help exciting the zeal of our Pittsburgh friend," &c. Behold what clearness of intellect! What unparalleled justice, and thorough knowledge of our ecclesiastical polity is manifested here; one peculiarity of which polity is, that no minister shall be stationed longer than two years in succession, in the same station. For the sake of consistency, I hope he will examine the church "polity" which he so "highly" approves, with a little more care.

Again. He complains that I have classed him with "infidels," and thinks "it smells mighty much like popery," and yet admits before he is done with it, what I am sorry to see. He says, "If he ever convert me to christianity," &c. Now, if he is yet to be converted to christianity, I should like to know what his religion is. Is he a Jew? I cannot suppose him to have imbibed any of the heathen religions. Whatever his religion may be however, I cannot suppose it to be equal to christianity. And may I not indulge a hope, that when he is converted to the christian religion, he will be better qualified to dictate to ministers of the gospel, that course of conduct which will qualify them to "be useful to all parties." I hope, therefore, his christian friends will use their best endeavors for his speedy conversion. But all this, he will be likely to say "smells mighty much of popery." Well, he may have it so. But what does the following smell like? He says, "If the church were to turn him out to beat the brush awhile, it might have a salutary influence in regulating his temperament," &c To be sure! To be sure!! What a champion of ecclesiastical liberty my "Sugar Grove" friend must be! I suppose his "brush beating" system don't smell "mighty much" like the Spanish Inquisition? O no! It comes from a man who highly approves of ecclesiastical liberty. Yea, he knows of no other subject so absorbing. "Priestly tyranny," he says, "has reduced more nations to bondage," &c., and "has caused more blood to flow, by a thousand fold, than was ever caused by American slavery, bad as it is," &c. Still it seems, we protestants have gone a little too far with our modifications of ecclesiastical polity, and now the church is very gravely reminded, that a mild course of "brush" beating, might have a "salutary influence in regulating" the "temperament" of those ministers who take it upon them to think and speak for themselves. Will not this unexampled effort of our friend, J. Smith, in behalf of ecclesiastical liberty, cause his name to glow upon the page of history, and be handed down to generations yet unborn, with immortal fame?

In conclusion, permit me to say, that my only object in writing on the slavery question at first, was to record my testimony against it; in this, my friend J. Smith thought me imprudent, and therefore, proceeded to administer his fatherly corrections. Thinking his admonitions unmerited and uncalled for, so far at least, as I am concerned, led to what I have written since.—And seeing his last communication admits all that I have contended for, with very few, if any exceptions, I cannot see what point is at issue between us. As for the propriety of discussing the slavery question in the "Recorder," it is not susceptible of debate, inasmuch as at the first, it was the clear and unequivocal understanding of all parties, that it would be open for the discussion of this question; and in view of this fact, the Annual Conference which sat at New Lancaster, Ohio, pledged herself to use her influence in its support, and adopted it as a Cenference paper. If I am wrong in this I wish to be corrected. And should it be shown that I am in error on this point, I shall ask pardon for the past, and promise never to trouble the "Recorder" with another article on slavery. I thank the editor for the indulgence I have already received. It has been my aim to conduce to the interest of his paper, but in this, I presume, I have not been as successful as those better skilled in writing. I wish to say, also, that I have no unpleasant feelings in my heart against my friend J. Smith, and have no doubt, but that if we shall ever meet, we shall feel that we are friends and not enemies to each other. Yours, truly, JOEL DALBEY, JR.

Pittsburgh, May 2, 1840.

For the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: I have been taught from my youth up, that to confess and forsake our sins, is the only way to obtain forgiveness. I therefore, desire, through the medium of your excellent paper, to confess one sin which I have been guilty of for some years past, though I have been convicted for it again and again, I have, like other sinners, put off repentance by making many excuses, more than I shall name in this communication. And now, for the sake of bringing others to reflection and repentance who are guilty of the same crime, both male and female, I will tell them, it is the SIN of robbing the laborer of his hire; I mean the preacher of the gospel, the everlasting gospel of life and salvation. They forsake fathers and mothers, houses and lands, (if indeed they have any,) wives and children, and all temporal pursuits for their support, brook the storms of winter and the heat of summer, to impart unto us the bread of life, and urge us and our children on to glory and to God. Now, I have reflected on it thus: Do I love the true God as well as the Pagans do their false Gods? They spend ten times more in sacrificing to their idols, than we give to the promotion of christianity. Do I love the cause of christian liberty, which I so frequently talk so fluently about? Do I love poor sinners, bought with the precious blood of that Redeemer, through whose merits I found pardon for my former sins? In the next place, have I manifested a liberality corresponding with my profession of love to God, His ministers and success of His cause? I confess I have not. And now for my excuses:

1st. Their salary is too high; 2d, others might pay more; 3d, I have bought another farm and I am in debt; 4th, I am in a pretty good way to lay up something for my children, as I now clear several hundred dollars each year; 5th, I am building a new house, and it must be set off with suitable furniture, and I cannot give the preacher any thing this year; 6th, my family expenses are great, my boys must dress like others, and so must my girls, &c. And, one more excuse I will name for the last at this time, that is, the preacher has got a farm, therefore, he ought to serve the public for nothing. Now, after all these excuses, and many more, I might mention every thing must be done and have its due, before I could think I ought to do any thing to meet the demands of the preacher. But reason, the word of God and conscience, all told me that their salary was very small, that I would not sacrifice all the comforts of home, &c., for double the sum, and I know that others, not worth one-fourth as much as me, paid more than I did, and that buying another farm and laying up treasure for my children, would not excuse me in the sight of God, while the poor preacher's children were wanting the comforts of life, and growing up without education. I found, in a word, that I was robbing God. I therefore, have come to the conclusion, even in these hard times, that I will no longer give way to covetousness, which is idolatry, and render (as the law will compel me to do) unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and that of my own free will, render unto God the things that are God's, and try to be a consistent christian, in praying and liberality for the support of the gospel, and I hope all others will do the same. CANDIDUS.

Stir up their pure minds by way of Remembrance.

1st. Do the superintendents of circuits and stations remember the resolution passed in the Ohio Conference, to read the general rules, at least, once a quarter in each class. And 2d, that each superintendent were to obtain subscriptions for the Preacher' Fund, and the relief of brother Haughton, in the college case; and 3d, to raise money in stock subscribed, to send on for a supply of Books for each circuit; and 4th, in the last quarter, to know what the circuit will raise for the support of a preacher the ensuing year; 5th, the resolution about holding love-feasts.

Brethren, the wind work is easy done, and no doubt we shall all find it very hard to do much in money matters these tough times. But surely, while the M. E. Church, i. e. the preachers, have begged their thousands and tens of thousands, yea, hundreds of thousands, we as a free people ought to raise several hundred for these noble purposes, yea, if OLD WILL was at home, we are able to raise one thousand or more, in this district. May God help us to be more liberal, is the prayer of A LOVER OF THE GOOD CAUSE.

JAMESTOWN, O., MAY 7, 1840.

Friend Springer: I have just read the fourth number of an extract from the "Methodist Protestant and Family Visitor," written by "John G. Wilson," in which he asserts some things that in this age of investigation require proof; something more than his say so, or his think so, is required. Will you allow me to ask him for the proof through your paper?

1st. I want him to prove (if he can) that the Greek word "baptizo" expresses the mode of the thing and not the thing itself. I will, if required, try to prove the reverse, that is to say, I will try to prove that baptizo expresses the action itself, and not the mode of the action. If baptizo means to immerse, then to talk of the sprinkling mode of immersing, or of the pouring mode of immersing, is nonsense. Or if baptizo mean to sprinkle, then to talk of the pouring mode of sprinkling, or of the immersing mode of sprinkling, is also nonsense.—But the writer has asserted that the Greek word baptizo will translate sprinkle and pour, as well as immerse; this he says he has proven in No. 1, but I doubt the ability of his translator, and will give him a passage to translate in the septuagent. Leviticus XIV chap. 15 and 16 verses, where all three of the words in dispute occur together. The King's translators have rendered it thus: "And the priest shall take some of the log of oil, and (——) pour it into the palm of his own left hand, and the priest shall (——) dip his right finger in the oil that is in his left hand, and shall (*——) sprinkle of the oil with his finger seven times before the Lord."

Now, if the writer can shew any Lexicon in which the Greek word baptizo has been literally rendered either sprinkle or pour, he will do more than I think he can. He may possibly find sprinkle and pour as the seventh or eighth figurative meaning of the word, but never as the primitive or literal meaning. Just in this way I can do away the use of bread in the Lord's Supper.—Bread means food, and food means any thing that is eaten. So that by taking a second or third meaning instead of the first, or literal one, we may destroy every ordinance of God.

But the writer asserts that bapto is a stronger word to express immersion than baptizo is; in this he differs from all the learned men that I have read after. The following is what a very learned man says about it: Dr. George Campbell says:

"*——, limits us to a particular mode of washing; *—— denotes to plunge, to dip."†

And Professor Stewart, of Andover, has clearly proven that the word baptizo never did mean any thing else than to plunge, dip, immerse, &c. either in the classics or in the Scriptures. He has written one hundred pages or more on the word. Yours, affectionately,

M. WINANS.

*For the want of Greek letters we have been compelled to substitute a dash for the word intended for these places.—Printer.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

WARREN COUNTY, OHIO, APRIL 29, 1840.

Bro. Springer: I expect the brethren in this district wonder why I have not travelled more extensively since our Conference. I therefore, think it my duty to inform them. First, that my health has been such that I could not venture to take a long ride; secondly, what labor I was able to give, appeared to be wanted near home, as some of the circuits around me were destitute of preachers, or nearly so, and to aid the superintendents at their quarterly and protracted meeetings.

Having recovered my health a little after my return from the protracted meeting in Cincinnati, I set out on the 7th of March, with intention to visit Lawrenceburgh, Madison and Charlestown circuits; but when I got to the city, I read a letter from brother Crall, pressing for help at a protracted meeting at Withamsville, it being appointed for the President's visit; he also urged me to go with him, I consented; we reached there on Friday, and commenced on that evening. Bro. Flood left on the Tuesday following. I intended to leave the next day, but was constrained to stay another week, and the result of this meeting brother Crall has communicated. I have passed through there since and preached twice, 10th and 11th of April, two more were added to the church. I then went on a tour to Kentucky,—visited Ruddle's Mills. Here more than one-half of our church has moved away to Indiana, and the few that remain appear dead and cold. I tried to preach for them three times,—they were cheered up a little. I had three appointments, as I passed down thro' Broad Ridge circuit, and blessed be God for the manifestations of His convicting power, though none professed to received pardoning grace.

On Friday, the 24th, I rode twenty-two miles to Cincinnati; Saturday, rode seven miles to a protracted meeting held by our unstationed brethren from the city, preached for them at night, nineteen had joined our little class here, as the fruits of the labors of these brethren. O! that God would keep them in the spirit of such a glorious work. Sunday morning I rode to Sharon, preached twice, received two more to that small class. Monday, returned home, being gone two weeks and four days, and my health better than when I left. Praise the Lord, O, my soul! for all His benefits bestowed upon me.

I am well convinced if the membership would do their duty in supporting the ministry, and would give their assistance at our Qr. & protracted meetings, we would get along much better. But, oh! the love of gain; O, that we were as zealous for God and His cause, as we are for the things that perish! O, that our affections were on the eternal treasure in heaven! as much as they are on houses and lands, goods and chattels. May the Lord save us from idolatry! I hope my brethren will bear with me for these remarks, they are made through zeal for the prosperity of the good cause; if they will do one-fifth part according to their ability, to what the preachers have done, and are still doing, we shall go ahead. May the Lord inspire us all with more zeal.

Yours, in the best of bonds,

A. MCGUIRE.

OHIO, MAY, 1840.

Bro. Springer: According to previous arrangement I attended a quarterly meeting on Xenia circuit; brother Dobbins, superintendent, brother Edwards, assistant, and brother W. W. Paul were in attendence. The meeting was tolerably well attended, and I think some good impressions were made on the hearts of non-professors, while believers were comforted. The following Saturday and Sabbath on Washington circuit a quarterly meeting at Jamestown, we had a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. We were favored with the labors of Bro. Stephens from Springfield. Thence to Highland circuit, brother Euins, superintendent. We had a very agreeable quarterly meeting. Some were added to the church, and I was well pleased to find the people so well satisfied with their preacher. Thence I went to Eagle circuit, brother James Rose, superintendent, and attended a two days' meeting, and a number of other appointments on the circuit, at all of which we had profitable times. I next visited Ruddle's Mills, Kentucky, and found a number of pious people, like sheep without a shepherd, being without a preacher this year, which perhaps was for the want of a delegate at Conference last fall. They have been greatly imposed upon by unprincipled men in the garb of ministers of the gospel. From thence I went to Broad Ridge circuit and attended a two days' meeting at brother Smith's, a man of worth and weight in the church. We were favored with an agreeble meeting there, and at several other places that I visited on the circuit. They have had to labor under a disadvantage from the absence of their preacher, brother Williams, who had been sick from perhaps in December, but has now returned to his field of labor. I next visited Cincinnati station, and with much affliction attended a few meetings and preached the best I could for them. The Lord has blessed the church in that place with a revival and no doubt would do greater things for them if each would stand in his proper place and do his appropriate part of the work. Br. Barnes, as a minister, has found favor in the eyes of the people. May the Lord bless him with the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove.

I there fell in company with my beloved brother McGuire, who was on a missionary tour. He went with me to Cincinnati circuit to a protracted meeting, the result of which you have been informed of by brother Crall. I next visited Rehobeth circuit, a part of brothers Dobbins and Edwards' charge, and we had a good two days' meeting, as well as several other meetings.

Yours, &c. JONATHAN FLOOD.

OBITUARY.

JOHN HOWARD, the subject of this memoir, was a native of North Carolina. He was born and raised a member of the society of Friends, and was distinguished in that society as a minister for more than thirty years. He was by bequest made heir to a competent fortune, which consisted in the muscles and bones of men.—Young and inexperienced as he was when he found himself by law exalted as lord and master over his fellow man, his sense of moral right and the moral obligations he was under to God and to his fellow, brought him at once to see that he could not in good conscience avail himself of the labor of his fellow men. He therefore determined at once to manumit his slaves, this being the only course that could be pursued to restore them to the privilege of reaping the reward of their own labors. And this involved his own personal reponsibility. But every difficulty was overcome by his untiring vigilance, and the whole family of slaves were set at liberty. Some forty years after their liberation he paid them a visit. It was on that occasion he had the greatest feast he ever enjoyed. The aged sire with the sprightly youth seemed to rival each other in bestowing upon their former master, deliverer and benefactor the tribute of love, honor and thanksgiving If such deeds of mercy, disinterestedness and benevolence distinguished him in youth, how much more might be expected when age and experience lend their aid? Such was the character of JOHN HOWARD.

If there was any enthusiam about him it was the enthusiasm of doing good. The change in his religious opinions was not, as some have concluded, the result of precipitance or fanaticism, but was the result of long, cool, candid and deliberate investigation. Fifteen years ago the writer had a lengthy interview with him on the subject of christian theology, at which time the change had considerably advanced and was completed by a thorough investigation of the Book of God, as he stated before a large congregation the day he received the ordinance of baptism, and was admitted into the Methodist Protestant Church as a minister coming from the society of Friends.

In riding in his vehicle over one of the beautiful plains of Illinois, suddenly his horse took fright, ran away, upset the vehicle and fractured his scull, so that in a few hours our much esteemed friend and brother closed his eyes in death, leaving behind him an amiable wife, a large and respectable family, and a great circle of acquaintances, together with the church to lament his loss. But our loss is his eternal gain.

SPRING IS HERE.

Spring is here with her azure sky,
The wintry clouds from her presence fly,
And the sun shines forth with cheering light,—
Spring is here with new life and delight.

Spring is here with a voice of mirth,
Imparting gladness and joy to earth,
And spreading o'er nature a verdant dress,—
Spring is here with all her loveliness.

Spring is here with her gorgeous flowers,
Decking the meadow's, the hills and the bowers,
Scattering fragrance abroad through the air,
And gladness and beauty ev'ry where.

Spring is here with a joyous train
Of forest-minstrels—o'er mountain and plain,
Their glad notes are sounding wildly and free—
Yes, Spring is here with sweet melody.

Spring is here with a voice of praise
To Him who is perfect in all His ways,
Whose smiles make creation again rejoice,
And Spring to utter her cheering voice.

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in the city of New York, and devoted to Home and Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by PARK BENJAMIN.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant period cal sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 25.—The situation of New York, and its immense commerc al intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intell gence received in our "great metropols." Availing ourselves of the advantages derived from this source and many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper intended for "our country, our whole country"—warped by no sectional bias—controverting no man's political opinions—unsullied by any thing of a immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of such English works of value as may be conveniently embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of orginal matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from all the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly, the Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazines, Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, LaBelle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.

We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of three celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which no copyright is not attached.

The editor will especially aim to make The New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full accounts of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to our people; while they omit to neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.

We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which lie under the eye of the municipal police. We can see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No ludicrous accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal visitations of social order by the ignorant and imbecil.

With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient, and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.

Price of The New World, THREE DOLLARS per annum, payable in advance.

All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

A portion of its columns will be open to Advertisements and Prices Current—another portion to sustain the interests of the Methodist Protestant Church in the West. These two latter objects will not likely occupy more than one page.

The RECORDER will take a firm stand against Clerical Supremacy.

The English and Dutch merchants, who ...purchased a great amount of bank paper at ...prices, cashed them at the bank and carried ...money out of the country. Other strangers did the like, thus draining the kingdom of its specie, and leaving paper in its place.

The Regent perceiving these symptoms of decay in the system, sought to restore it to public confidence by conferring marks of confidence upon its author. He accordingly resolved to make Law Comptroller General of the Finances of France. There was a material obstacle in the way. Law was a Protestant, and the Regent, unscrupulous as he was himself, did not dare publicly to outrage the severe edicts which Louis XIV., in his bigot days, had fulminated against all heritics. Law soon let him know that there would be no difficulty on that head. He was ready at any moment to abjure his religion in the way of business. For decency's sake, however, it was judged proper he should previously be convinced and converted. A ghostly instructor was soon found, ready to accomplish his conversion in the shortest possible time. This was Abbe Tencin, a profligate creature of the profligate Dubois, and, like him, working his way to ecclesiastical promotion and temporal wealth by the basest means.

In February, 1720, shortly after Law's instalment in office, a decree came out uniting the bank to the India Company, by which last name the whole establishment was now known. The decree stated that, as the bank was royal, the king was bound to make good the value of its bills; that he committed to the company the government of the bank for fifty years, and sold to it fifty millions of stock belonging to him, for nine hundred millions; a simple advance of eighteen hundred per cent. The decree farther declared, in the king's name, that he would never draw on the bank, until the value of his drafts had first been lodged in it by his receivers general.

The bank, it was said, had by this time issued notes to the amount of one thousand millions, being more paper than all the banks of Europe were able to circulate. To aid its credit, the receivers of the revenue were directed to take bank notes of the sub-receivers. All payments, therefore, of one hundred livres and upwards, were ordered to be made in bank notes. These compulsory measures for a short time gave a false credit to the bank, which proceeded to discount merchants' notes, to lend money on jewels, plate and other valuables, as well as on mortgages.

Still farther to force on the system, an edict next appeared, forbidding any individual or any corporate body, civil or religious, to hold in possession more than five hundred livres in current coin; that is to say, about seven louis d'ors, the value of the louis d'or in paper being, at that time, seventy-two livres. All the gold and silver they might have, above this pittance, was to be bro't to the royal bank and exchanged either for shares or bills.

As confiscation was the penalty of disobedience to the decree, and informers were assured a share of the forfeitures, a bounty was in a manner held out to domestic spies and traitors; and the most odious scrutiny was awakened into the pecuniary affairs of families and individuals.—The very confidence between friends and relatives was impaired, and all the domestic ties and virtues of society were threatened, until a general settlement of indignation broke forth, that compelled the Regent to rescind the odious decree. Lord Stairs, the British Ambassador, speaking of the system of espoinage encouraged by this edict, observed that it was impossible to doubt that Law was a thorough Catholic, since he had thus established the "inquisition," after having already proved "transubstantiation" by changing specie into paper.

Equal abuses had taken place under the colonizing project. In his thousand expedients to amass capital, Law had sold parcels of land in Mississippi, at the rate of three thousand livres for a league square. Many capitalist had purchased estates large enough to constitute almost a principality, the only evil was Law had sold a property which he could not deliver. The agents of police, who aided in recruiting the ranks of the colonists, had been guilty of scandalous impositions. Under pretence of taking up mendicants and vagabonds, they scoured the streets at night, seizing upon honest mechanics, or their sons, and hurrying them to their crippling houses for the sole purpose of extorting their money from them as a ransom. The populace was aroused to indignatian by these abuses. The officers of police were mobbed in the exercise of their odious functions, and several of them were killed, which put an end to this flagrant abuse of power.

In March, a most extraordinary decree of the council fixed the price of shares of the India Company at nine thousand livres each. All ecclesiastical communities and hospitals were now prohibited from investing money at interest, in any thing but India stock. With all these props and stays, the system continued to totter. How could it be otherwise, under a despotic government, that could alter the value of property at every moment? The very compulsory measures that were adopted to establish the credit of the bank, hastened its fall; plainly showing there was a want of solid security. Law caused pamphlets to be published setting forth, in eloquent language, the vast profits that must accrue to holders of the stock, and the impossibility of the king's ever doing it any harm. On the very back of these assertions, came forth an edict of the king, dated the 22d of May, wherein, under pretence of having reduced the value of his coin, it was declared necessary to reduce the value of his bank notes one half, and of the India shares from nine thousand to five thousand livres!

This decree came like a clap of thunder upon share holders. They found one half of the pretended value of the paper in their hands annihilated in an instant; and what certainty had they with respect to the other half? The rich considered themselves ruined; those in humbler circumstances looked forward to abject beggery.

The parliament seized the occasion to stand forth as the protector of the public, and refused to register the decree. It gained the credit of compelling the Regent to retrace his steps, tho' it is more probable he yielded to the universal burst of public astonishment and reprobation.—On the 27th of May the edict was revoked, and bank bills were restored to the previous value.—But the fatal blow had been struck; the delusion was at an end. Government itself had lost all public confidence, equally with the bank it had engendered, and which its own arbitrary acts had brought into discredit. "All Paris," says the Regent's mother, in her letters, "has been mourning at the cursed decree which Law has persuaded my son to make. I have received anonymous letters, stating that I have nothing to fear on my own account, but that my son shall be pursued with fire and sword."

The Regent now endeavored to avert the odium of his ruinous schemes from himself. He affected to have suddenly lost confidence in Law, and on the 29th of May, discharged him from his employ, as Comptroller General, and stationed a Swiss guard of sixteen men in his house. He even refused to see him, when on the following day, he applied at the portal of the Palais Royal for admission; but having played off this farce before the public he admitted him secretly the same night, by a private door, and continued as before to co-operate with him in his financial schemes.

On the first of June, the Regent issued a decree, permitting persons to have as much money as they pleased in their possession. Few, however, were in a state to benefit by this permission. There was a run upon the bank, but a royal ordinance immediately suspended payment until farther orders. To relieve the public mind a city stock was created of twenty-five millions, bearing an interest of two and a half per cent., for which bank notes were taken in exchange.—The bank notes thus withdrawn from circulation, were publicly burnt before the Hotel de Ville.—The public, however, had lost confidence in every thing and every body, and suspected fraud and collusion in those who pretended to burn the bills.

A general confusion now took place in the financial world. Families who had lived in opulence, found themselves suddenly reduced to indigence. Schemers who had been revelling in the delusions of princely fortunes, found their estates vanishing into thin air. Those who had any property remaining, sought to secure it against reverses. Cautious persons found there was no safety for property in the country where the coin was continually shifting in value, and where a despotism was exercised over public securities, and even over the private purses of individuals. They began to send their effects into other countries, when lo! on the 20th of June, a royal edict commanded them to bring back their effects, under penalty of forfeiting twice their value; and forbade them, under like penalty, from investing their money in foreign stocks.—This was soon followed by another decree forbidding any one to retain precious stones in his possession, or to sell them to foreigners; all must be deposited in the bank, in exchange for depreciating paper!

Execrations were now poured out, on all sides, against Law, and menaces of vengeance. What a contrast, in a short time, to the venal incense that was offered up to him! "This person," writes the Regent's mother, "who was formerly worshipped as a god, is now not sure of his life. It is astonishing how greatly terrified he is. He is as a dead man; he is pale as a sheet, and it is said he can never get over it. My son is not dismayed, though he is threatened on all sides, and is very much amused with Law's terrors."

About the middle of July, the last grand attempt was made by Law and the Regent, to keep up the system and provide for the immense emission of paper. A decree was fabricated giving the India Company the entire monopoly of commerce, on condition that it would, in the course of a year, reimburse six hundred million of livres of its bills, at the rate of fifty millions per month.

On the 17th, this decree was sent to parliament to be registered. It at once raised a storm of opposition in their assembly; and a vehement discussion took place. While that was going on, a disastrous scene was passing out of doors.

The calamitous effects of the system had reached the humblest concerns of human life. Provisions had risen to an enormous price; paper money was refused at all the shops; the people had not where-withal to buy bread. It had been found absolutely indispensable to relax a little from the suspension of specie payments, and to allow small sums to be scantily exchanged for paper. The doors of the bank and the neighboring street were immediately thronged with a famishing multitude, seeking cash for bank notes of ten livres. So great was the press and struggle, that several persons were stifled and crushed to death. The mob carried three of the bodies to the court yard of the Palais Royal. Some cried for the Regent to come forth, and behold the effect of his system; others demanded the death of Law, the impostor, who had brought this misery and ruin upon the nation.

The moment was critical: the popular fury was rising to a tempest, when Le Blanc, the Secretary of State, stepped forth. He had previously sent for the military, and now only sought to gain time. Singling out six or seven stout fellows, who seemed to be the ringleaders of the mob: "My good fellows," said he, calmly, "carry away these bodies and place them in some church, and then come back quickly to me for your pay." They immediately obeyed: a kind of funeral procession was formed; the arrival of troops dispersed those who had lingered behind; and Paris was probably saved from an insurrection.

About ten o'clock in the morning, all being quiet, Law ventured to go in his carriage to the Palais Royal. He was saluted with cries and curses, as he passed along the streets; and he reached the Palais Royal in a terrible fright.—The Regent amused himself with his fears, but retained him with him, and sent off his carriage, which was assailed by the mob, pelted with stones, and the glasses shivered. The news of this outrage was communicated to parliament in the midst of a fourious discussion of the decree for the commercial monopoly.—The first president, who had been absent for a short time, re-entered, and communicated the tidings in a whimsical couplet.

"Messieurs, Messieurs! bonne nouvelle!
Le cariosse de Law est reduite en carrelle!"
"Gentlemen, Gentlemen! good news!
The carriage of Law is shivered to atoms!"

The members sprang up with joy:—"And Law!" exclaimed they, "has been torn to pieces?" The president was ignorant of the result of the tumult; whereupon the debate was cut short, the members hurrying to learn the particulars. Such was the levity with which public affairs were treated, at this dissolute and disastrous period.

On the following day there was an ordinance from the king prohibiting all popular assemblages; and troops were stationed at various points, and in all public places. The regiment of guards were ordered to hold itself in readiness; and the musqueteers to be at their hotels, with their horses ready saddled. A number of small offices were opened, where people might cash small notes, though with great delay and difficulty. An edict was also issued, declaring that whoever should refuse to take bank notes in the course of trade, should forfeit double the amount!

The continued and vehement opposition of parliament to the whole delusive system of finance, had been a constant source of annoyance to the Regent; but this obstinate rejection of his last grand experiment of a commercial monopoly, was not to be tolerated. He determined to punish that intractable body. The Abbe Dubois and Law suggested a simple mode; it was to suppress the parliament altogether, being as they observed, so far from useful, that it was a constant impediment to the march of public affairs. The Regent was half inclined to listen to their advice; but upon calmer consideration, and the advice of friends, he adopted a more moderate course. On the 20th of July, early in the morning, all the doors of the parliament house were taken possession of by troops. Others were sent to surround the house of the first president, and others to the houses of the various members, who were all at first in great alarm, until an order from the king was put into their hands, to render themselves at Pontoise, in the course of two days, to which place parliament was thus suddenly and arbitrarily transferred.

This despotic act, says Voltaire, would at any other time have caused an insurrection; but one half of the Parisians were occupied by their ruin, and the other half by their fancied riches, which were soon to vanish. The president and members of parliament acquiesced in the mandate without a murmur; they even went as if a party of pleasure, and made every preparation to lead a joyous life in their exile. The musqueteers, who held possession of the vacated parliament house, a gay corps of fashionable young fellows, amused themselves with making songs and pasquinades, at the expense of the exiled legislators; and at length, to pass away time, formed themselves into a mock parliament; elected their presidents, kings, ministers, and advocates; took their seats in due form; arraigned a cat at their bar, in place of the Sieur Law, and after giving it a "fair trial," condemned it to be hanged. In this manner, public affairs and public institutions were lightly turned to jest.

As to the exiled parliament, it lived gaily and luxuriously at Pontoise at the public expense; for the Regent had furnished funds, as usual, with a lavish hand. The first president had the mansion of the Duke de Bouillon put at his disposal, all ready furnished, with a vast and delightful garden on the borders of a river. There he kept open house to all the members of parliament. Several tables were spread every day, all furnished luxuriously and splendidly; the most exquisite wines and liquors, the choicest fruits and refreshments of all kinds abounded.—A number of small chariots for one and two horses were always at hand, for such ladies and old gentlemen as wished to take an airing after dinner, and card and billiard tables for such as chose to amuse themselves in that way until supper.—The sister and the daughter of the first president did the honors of the house, and he himself presided there with an air of great ease, hospitality, and magnificence. It became a party of pleasure to drive from Paris to Pontoise, which was six leagues distant, and partake of the amusements and festivities of the place. Business was openly slighted; nothing was thought of but amusement. The Regent and his government were laughed at, and made the subject of continued pleasantries; while the enormous expenses incurred by this idle and lavish course of life more than doubled the liberal sums provided. This was the way in which the parliament resented their exile.

During all this time the system was getting more and more involved. The stock exchange had some time previously been removed to the Place Vendome; but the tumult and noise becoming intolerable to the residents of that polite quarter, and especially to the chancellor, whose hotel was there, the Prince and Princess Carinces, both deep gamblers in Mississippi stock, offered the extensive garden of their Hotel de Soissons as a rallying place for the worshippers of Mammon.—The offer was accepted. A number of barracks were immediately erected in the garden, as offices for the stock brokers, and an order was obtained from the Regent under the pretext of police regulations, that no bargain should be valid, unless concluded in these barracks.—The rent of them immediately amounted to a hundred livres a month for each, and the whole yielded these noble proprietors the ignoble revenue of half a millions of livres.

The mania for gain, however, was now at an end. A universal panic succeeded. "Sauve qui peut," was the watch word. Every one was anxious to exchange failing paper for something of intrinsic and permanent value. Since money was not to be had, jewels, precious stones, plate, porcelain, trinkets of gold and silver, all commanded any price in paper. Land was bought at fifty years' purchase, and he esteemed himself happy who could get it even at this price. Monopolies now became the range among the noble holders of paper. The Duke de la Force bought up nearly all the tallow, grease and soap;—others the coffee and spices; others hay and oats.—Foreign exchanges were almost impracticable. The debts of Dutch and English merchants were paid in this fictitious money, all the coin of the realm having disappeared. All the relations of debtor and creditor were confounded. With one thousand crowns, one might pay a debt of eighteen thousand livres!

The Regent's mother, who once exulted in the affluence of bank paper, now wrote in a very different tone: "I have often wished," said she in her letters, "that these bank notes were in the depths of the infernal regions. They have given my son more trouble than relief. Nobody in France has a penny — * * * My son was once popular, but, since the arrival of this cursed Law, he is hated more and more. Not a week passes without my receiving letters filled with frightful threats, and speaking of him as a tyrant. I have just received one threatning him with poison. When I showed it to him he did nothing but laugh."

In the mean time Law was dismayed by the increasing troubles, and terrified at the tempest he had raised. He was not a man of real courage; and fearful for his personal safety, from popular tumult, or the despair of ruined individuals, he again took refuge in the palace of the Regent. The latter as usual, amused himself with his terrors, and turned every new disaster into a jest; but he, too, began to think of his own security.

In pursuing the schemes of Law, he had, no doubt, calculated to carry through his term of government with ease and splendor, and to enrich himself, his connections and his favorites; and had hoped that the catastrophe of the system would not take place until after the expiration of the regency.

He now saw his mistake; that it was impossible much longer to prevent an explosion; and he determined at once to get Law out of the way, and then to charge him with the whole tissue of delusions of this paper alchymy. He accordingly took occasion of the recall of parliament in December, 1720, to suggest to Law the policy of his avoiding an encounter with that hostile and exasperated body. Law needed no urging to the measure. His only desire was to escape from Paris and its tempestuous populace.

Two days before the return of parliament he took his sudden and secret departure. He travelled in a chaise bearing the arms of the Regent, and was escorted by a kind of safeguard of servants, in the duke's livery. His first place of refuge was an estate of the Regent's about six leagues from Paris, from whence he pushed forward to Bruxelles.

As soon as Law was fairly out of the way, the Duke of Orleans summoned a council of the regency, and informed them that they were assembled to deliberate on the state of the finances, and the affairs of the India Company. Accordingly, La Houssaye, Comptroller General, rendered a perfectly clear statement, by which it appeared that there were bank bills in circulation to the amount of two milliards seven hundred millions of livres, without any evidence that this enormous sum had been emitted in virtue of any ordinance from the general assembly of the India Company, which alone had the right to authorize such emissions.

The council was astonished at the disclosure, and looked to the Regent for explanation. Pushed to the extreme, the Regent avowed that Law had emitted bills to the amount of twelve hundred millions beyond what had been fixed by ordinances, and in contradiction to express prohibitions; that the thing being done, he, the Regent, had legalized or rather covered the transactions by decrees ordering such emissions, which decrees he had antedated.

A stormy scene ensued between the Regent and the Duke de Bourbon, little to the credit of either, both having been deeply implicated in the cabalistic operations of the system. In fact the several members of the council had been among the most venal "beneficiaries" of the scheme, and had interest at stake which they were anxious to secure. From all the circumstances of the case, I am inclined to think that others were more to blame than Law for the disastrous effects of his financial projects. His bank, had it been confined to its original limits, and left to the control of its own internal regulations, might have gone on prosperously & have been of great benefit to the nation. It was an institution fitted for a free country; but unfortunately it was subject to the control of a despotic government, that could at its pleasure alter the value of the specie within its vaults, and compel the most extravagant expansions of its paper circulation. The vital principle of a bank is security in the regularity of its operations, and the immediate convertibility of its paper into coin, and what confidence could be reposed in an institution, or its paper promises, when the sovereign could at any moment centuple those promises in the market, and seize upon all the money in the bank?—The compulsory measures used, likewise, to force bank notes into currency, against the judgment of the public, was fatal to the system; for credit must be free and uncontrolled as the common air. The Regent was the evil spirit of the system, that forced Law on to an expansion of his paper currency far beyond what he had every dreamed of. He it was that in a manner compelled the unlucky projector to devise all kinds of collaterial companies and monopolies, by which to raise funds to meet the constantly and enormously increasing emissions of shares and notes. Law was but like a poor conjuror, in the hands of a potent spirit that he has evoked, and that obliges him to go on desperately and ruinously with his conjurations. He only thought at the outset to raise the wind, but the Regent compelled him to raise the whirlwind.

The investigation of the affairs of the Company by the council, resulted in nothing beneficial to the public. The princes and nobles who had enriched themselves by all kinds of juggles and extortions, escaped unpunished, and retained the greater part of their spoils. Many of the "suddenly rich," who had risen from obscurity to a giddy height of imaginary prosperity, and had indulged in all kinds of vulgar and ridiculous excesses, awoke as out of a dream, in their original poverty, now made more galling and humiliating by their transient elevation.

The weight of the evil, however, fell on more valuable classes of society; honest tradesmen and artisans, who had been seduced away from the safe pursuits of industry, to the specious chances of speculation. Thousands of meritorious families, also, once opulent, had been reduced to indigence by too great confidence in government. There was a general derangement in the finances, that long exerted a baneful influence over the national prosperity; but the most disastrous effects of the system were upon the morals and manners of the nation. The faith of engagements, the sanctity of promises in the affairs of business, were at an end. Every expedient to grasp present profit or to evade present difficulty, was tolerated. While such deplorable laxity of principle was generated in the business classes, the chivalry of France had soiled their pennons; and honor and glory, so long the idols of the Gallic nobility, had been tumbled to the earth, and trampled in the dirt of the stock market.

As to Law, the originator of the system, he appears eventually to have profited but little by his schemes. "He was a quack," says Voltaire, "to whom the state was given to be cured, but who poisoned it with his drugs, and who poisoned himself." The effects, which he left behind in France, were sold at a low price, and the proceeds dissipated. His landed estates were confiscated. He carried away with him barely enough to maintain himself, his wife, and daughter with decency. The chief relinque of his immense fortune was a great diamond, which he was often obliged to pawn. He was in England in 1721, and was presented to George the First. He returned shortly after to the continent; shifting about from place to place, and died in Venice in 1729.—His wife and daughter, accustomed to live with the prodigality of princesses, could not conform to their altered fortunes, but dissipated the scanty means left to them, and sank into abject poverty. "I saw his wife," says Voltaire, "at Bruxelles, as much humiliated as she had been haughty and triumphant at Paris." An elder brother of Law remained in France, and was protected by the Duchess of Bourbon. His descendents have acquitted themselves honorably in various public employments; and one of them is the Marquis Lauiston, some time Lieutenant General and Peer of France.

SOUND—Of all kinds, it is ascertained, travels at the rate of thirteen miles in a minute: the softest whisper travels as fast as the most tremendous thunder.—The knowledge of this fact has been applied to the measurement of distances.

Suppose a ship in distress fires a gun, the light of which is seen on shore, or by another vessel, twenty seconds before the report is heard, it is known to be at the distance of twenty times one thousand one hundred and forty-two feet, or little more than four miles and a half.

Again, if I see a vivid flash of lightning, and in two seconds hear a tremendous clap of thunder, I know that the thunder cloud is not more than seven hundred and sixty yards distant, and should instantly retire from any exposed situation.

THE WIFE.—That woman deserves not a husband's generous love who will not greet him with smiles as he returns from the labors of the day; who will not try to chain him to his home by the sweet enchantment of a cheerful heart. There is not one in a thousand that is so unfeeling as to withstand such an influence, and break away from such a home.

ZANESVILLE:

WEDNESDAY, ... MAY 27, 1840.

From the Natchez Free Trader,—Exrta.

DREADFUL VISITATION OF PROVIDENCE.

Friday Evening, 6 o'clock.

About one o'clock on Thursday, the 7th instant, the attention of the citizens of Natchez was attracted by an unusual and continuous roaring of thunder to the southward, at which point hung masses of black clouds, some of them stationary, and others whirling along with under currents, but all driving a little east of north. As there was evidently much lightning, the continued roar of growling thunder, although noticed and spoken of by many, created no particular alarm.

The dinner bells in the large hotels had rung a little before two o'clock, and most of our citizens were sitting at their tables, when suddenly the atmosphere was darkened, so as to require the lighting of candles, and, in a few moments afterwards, the rain was precipitated in tremendous cataracts rather than in drops. In another moment the tornado in all its wrath was upon us. The strongest buildings shook as if tossed with an earthquake; the air was black with whirling eddies of house-walls, roofs, chimnies, huge timbers torn from distant ruins, all shot through the air as if thrown from a mighty catapult. The atmosphere soon became lighter, and then such an awful scene of ruin as perhaps never before met the eye of man became manifest.—The greater part of the ruin was effected in the short space of from three to five minutes, although the heavy sweeping tornado lasted nearly half an hour. For about five minutes it was more like the explosive force of gunpowder than any thing else it could have been compared to. Hundreds of rooms were burst open as suddenly as if barrels of gunpowder had been ignited in each.

As far as glasses or the naked eye can reach, the first traces of the tornado are to be seen from the Natchez bluff down the river about ten miles, bearing considerably west of south. Sweeping across the Natchez island it crossed the point below the plantation of David Barland, Esq., opposite the plantations of P. M. Lupice, Esq., in the parish of Concordia. It then struck the Natchez bluff about a mile and a half below the city, near the mansion called the "Briers," which it but slightly injured, but swept the mansion late of Charles B. Greene Esq., called the "Bellevue," and the ancient forest in which it was embosomed into a mass of ruins.

It then struck the city through its whole width of one mile and included the entire river and the village of Vidalia on the Louisiana shore—making the path of the tornado more than two miles in width. At the Natchez landing on the river the ruin of dwellings, stores, steamboats, and flat boats was almost entire from the Vidalia ferry to the Mississippi Cotton Press. A few torn fragments of dwellings still remain, but they can scarcely be called shelters.

In the upper city, or Natchez on the hill, scarcely a house escaped damage or utter ruin. The Presbyterian and Methodist churches have their towers thrown down, their roofs broken and walls shattered. The Episcopal church is very much injured in its roof. Parber's great Southern Exchange is level with the dust. Great damage has been done to the City Hotel and the Mansion House, both being unroofed, and the upper stories broken in. The house of Sheriff Izod has not a timber standing, and hundreds of other dwellings are nearly in the same situation. The Court House at Vidalia, Parish of Concordia, is utterly torn down, also the dwelling houses of Dr. M'Whorter, and of Messrs. Dunlap and Stacey, Esqrs. The parish jail partly torn down.

But now the worst remains to be told. Parish Judge Creton, of Concordia, was instantly killed while at dinner at the house of Mr. Stacey. He was a noble and esteemed man. No other person was killed in Vidalia, although some other persons were hurt. At the Natchez landing, out of fifty or sixty flat boats, only six are now afloat. Those best acquainted suppose as many as one hundred flat boat men were drowned in the river, which swelled instantly to the height of six or eight feet.

The steamboats Hinds, Prairie and the St. Lawrence, were destroyed and sunk at the landing, and the Vidalia ferry boat on the river—more or less persons being lost in the two first named boats.

From the ruins of the Steamboat Hotel, Mr. Alexander, the landlord, his lady and barkeeper, were dug out alive, as also Timothy Flint, the historian and geographer, and his son from Nachitoches, La., besides Doctor Taliaferro, and many others. Mrs. Alexander is considered dangerously injured. Two of her children were killed in her arms. As many as nine dead bodies have been dug from the Steamboat Hotel. The number of burials which have taken place to-day is about fifty, and many are still in a dying or dangerous condition.

As soon as possible we shall publish a list of the names of the killed, wounded, and those missing whose bodies have not yet been found.

Meanwhile we beg the indulgence of our kind friends and patrons for a few days, in which time we shall be able to get our office in some order. The Free Trader office building has been crushed in and much shattered. We are all in confusion, and surrounded by the destitute, the houseless, the wounded and the dying. Our beautiful city is shattered as if it had been stormed by the cannon of Austerlitz. Our delightful China trees are all torn up. We are peeled and desolate.

A public meeting has been held by the citizens in the court house to-day, at which Col. James C. Wilkins presided, and F. L. Claiborne, Esq. was Secretary. Addresses were delivered by J. M. Hewitt and J. M. Duffield, Esqrs., and resolutions offered by the latter gentleman, and others appointed relief committees, &c.

The City Hotel, through the kindness of the proprietor, Noah Barlow, Esq., has been thrown open to the wounded. Dr. Pollard, with his usual promptitude, has taken the Tremont House for an additional hospital, Stephen Duncan, Esq., having generously offered to be responsible for the rent.

The neighboring planters are generously sending in large gangs of slaves to assist in clearing the streets, and digging the dead from the ruins.

Mr. Ruffner and S. J. Boyd, Esqrs., have been at the trouble to go over the whole extent of the city, and make a practical and careful estimation of the damages, which we endorse, and, as far as our observation extends, present them to our readers:

HORRIBLE STORM—NATCHEZ IN RUINS.

Our devoted city is in ruins, and we have not a heart of stone to detail, while the dead remain unburied, and the wounded groan for help. Yesterday, at one o'clock, while all was peace, and most of our population were at the dining table, a storm burst upon our city and raged for half an hour with most destructive and dreadful power. We look around and see Natchez, yesterday lovely and cheerful, in ruins and hundreds of our citizens without a shelter or a pillow. Genius cannot imagine, poetry itself cannot fill up a picture that would match the ruin and distress that every where meets the eye.

'Twas the voice of the Almighty that spoke, and prudence should dictate reverence rather than execration. All have suffered, and all should display the feelings of humanity and the benevolence of religion.

"Under the Hill" presents a scene of desolation which sickens the heart, and beggars description—all is swept away, and beneath the ruins lay crushed the bodies of many strangers. It will take volumes to depict the many escapes and heart rending scenes; one of the most interesting was the rescue of Mrs. Alexander from the ruins of the Steam Boat Hotel; she was found greatly injured with two children in her arms and they both dead!

The destruction of flat boats is immense; at least sixty were tossed for a moment on a raging river and then sunk, drowning most of their crews. The best informed produce dealers estimate the number of lives lost by the sinking of flat boats at TWO HUNDRED! No calculation can be made of the amount of money and produce swallowed by the river. The steamboat Hinds, with most of her crew went to the bottom, and the Prairie from St. Louis was so much wrecked as to be unfit for use. The steamer St. Lawrence, at upper cotton press is a total wreck.

There is no telling how wide spread has been the ruin. Reports have come in from plantations twenty miles distant in Louisiana, and the rage of the tempest was terrible. Hundreds of negroes killed, dwellings swept like chaff from their foundations, the forest uprooted, and the crops beaten down and destroyed.—Never, never, never, was there such desolation and ruin.

We cannot even attempt a description of the mangled condition of Natchez.—Hundreds of houses, yesterday on firm foundations and the abode of comfort and beauty, now choke up our street with mingled materials, in a state of utter destruction.

We can do nothing to-day but bury the dead, and bind up the wounds of those yet struggling for life.

THE OVERFLOW OF THE MISSISSIPPI.—At our last dates, the whole country from Little Rock to the mouth of the Arkansas was overflowed. At Vicksburg, on the 2d instant, several warehouses had to be abandoned on account of the rise, and the editor of the Sentinel predicts an overflow as great if not greater than the memorable flood of 1828. At Natchez, as we learn from the Free Trader of the 28th ult., the only thing which kept the streets from positive inundation, was the carting of sand to prevent its inroads. That paper says "one foot more of water will do damage on the Louisiana side of the river to the amount of millions."—The New Orleans papers congratulate themselves that the weather has been calm, as a high wind at the existing stage of the water, would inevitably have driven it over the banks.

THE FLOOD IN THE MISSISSIPPI.—The Cincinnati Gazette of the 12th says:—"We have the most distressing accounts from a gentleman who left New Orleans on the 1st of May, in the steamboat General Brown, of the Flood in the Mississippi. Nearly the whole country, from the mouth of the Ohio to New Orleans, is under water. The town-plat of Cairo is completely submerged, and great fears are entertained of the destruction of New Orleans."

The Vicksburg papers also contain alarming accounts.

THE BELGIAN GIANT.—Take it all in all, there probably never has been so great a man, or a man more followed in this city, than the Belgian Giant, Monsieur Bihin, whose levee in Broadway has been daily and nightly beset by crowds of ladies and gentlemen, for two months past. He made a large fortune in England and on the continent, but was induced by a great offer and a wish to see America, to engage to undergo the scrutinizing gaze of the Yankees in our principal cities. He is really seven feet eight inches in height, so that a six footer is just able to reach the top of his head with the tips of his fingers, and when the Giant holds out his arm straight, a man five feet eight can walk under without touching. This is all remarkable enough, but the most interesting matter is that, unlike Porter and some other big people, Mr. Bihin is one of the best formed and most symmetrical, as well as the strongest man known to exist; his weight is 340!—Correspondent North American.

THE BANKS OF CINCINNATI.—The Cincinnati Gazette of a late date says:—"On Friday last, the Supreme Court, on the application of the prosecuting attorney, Crapsy, granted rules upon the Miami Exporting Company, the Commercial, the Franklin, and the Lafayette banks of this city, to show cause on Monday, why informations, in the nature of writs quo warranto should not be issued against them to show their authority for continuing to exercise their corporate franchises. No cause was shown, and the informations were filed, of course, and the cases respectively continued until next year, to make up issues upon the charges for trial. It is almost needless to say that these proceedings will not in the least, affect the credit of these banks." They were instituted against the banks on account of their suspending specie payments.

CONVICTIONS FOR VIOLATION OF THE NEUTRALITY LAW.—Rennselear Van Rennselear, was sentenced to six months imprisonment, and fined $250, to stand imprisoned until the fine be paid. It having been satisfactorily shown that he is wholly unable to pay the fine, the President has remitted the same.

William Lyon Mackenzie, was sentenced to eighteen months imprisonment, from the 20th of June last, and $10 fine. The residue of his punishment has, we understand, been also remitted by the President.—Albany Argus.

MONEY AT INTEREST.—The Supreme Court of Ohio sitting in Hamilton Co. a few days since made an important decision in relation to loaning money. We learn from the Cincinnati Gazette that a Mr. Thompson of that city deposited money in the Trust Company and took a certificate of deposite on interest. This money was assessed for tax under the laws of the State, and payment being refused, the Treasurer sued for it. The court held that money so deposited was not subject to tax under the laws now in force.—Zanesville Gazette.

LATEST FROM THE MORMONS.—It is known that these people, since their dispersion in Missouri, have collected in great numbers in and around Commerce, in this State, on the Mississippi river.—The name of Commerce, as we have heretofore stated, they have changed to Nauvoo, from the Hebrew or Egyptian, though of the signification of the term we are ignorant.—They hold two great conferences every year,—in the spring and fall; and that appointed for the present spring took place last week, commencing on the 6th and ending on the 9th inst. We learn that between 2000 and 3000 persons were present, and that considerable accessions were made to the church from the surrounding neighborhood.—Our informant states that the number was 74, all received by baptism, and that at the same time 30 of the ablest men were ordained to preach the gospel.

The preachers present were Joseph and Hiram Smith, John Page, Orson Hyde, and two others. Messrs. Page and Hyde, with ten others, (probably chosen elsewhere) were commissioned to go to the Holy Land to preach the gospel to the Jews. They are to meet at Quincy next Sabbath, and from thence take their departure for Palestine.

About 300 houses have been put up in Nauvoo since last October. Some of them are neat frame buildings, but the greater portion are log cabins, designed for temporary habitations merely. The ground assigned to each is generally one acre, though to some there are five acres.

The increase of population by emigration is very great. Our informant states that several families arrive here every day. A gentleman living on the road from Quincy to Nauvoo, assured him that on some days at least 15 families passed his house, all bound to the latter place.—Peoria Register.

ARRIVAL OF AN ARABIAN SHIP—Trade between the United States and Muscat.—What a remarkable city this New York is! so full of excitement, fun, curiosities and wonders. They never cease. When one goes, two or three more appear.—We are astonished, surprised and delighted from the beginning of the year to the end thereof.

Since last Thursday, a perfect wonder to us Americans, in the shape of an Arabian ship, has arrived. She lays at the foot of Rector street, on the North river, and has been thronged, and the pier crowded with people, anxious and pushing to get a peep at the Arabian sailors and Arabian horses that are on board.—So great has been the crowd that police officers are required to keep things in order. The poor Arab sailors are almost killed by the pushing, and pressing, and squeezing of the mob; and undoubtedly some lives will be lost by the swarms from the shore out-swarming the swarms on deck— the legitimate swarms that infest the ship.

The name of this ship is the "Sultanee." She is a government vessel, pierced for fourteen guns, and is one of the sixteen vessels of war belonging to the Imaum, or Sultan, or High Priest of Muscat. Her model is English, and she is a remarkably fast sailor. Her size is three hundred and five tons—was built at Bombay, about six years ago, of Teakwood, the most durable extant; far more so than our live oak. She is manned by fifty-six Arabs, and commanded by Ahmed Bin Numan. There are also two French sailors, and one Portuguese, attached to her—and five seapoys. Capt. William Sleeman, an Englishman, formerly of the British navy, but now "Head Navigator" to the Imaum, is also on board. Capt. Sleeman commanded, for a time, the "Prince Regent" the most splendid yacht ever launched, which was presented to His Mightiness of Muscat, by William IV. of England, in return for the line of battle ship "Liverpool," given to William by the Imaum, about four years since.

When any of the Arabs pass through our streets, they are followed by the great crowds, who cry out to them "Alla! Alla!" The Arabs look round, curl up their mustaches, look at each other, and wonder at the depravity of the natives.

The "Sultanee" is loaded with fine Mocha coffee, dates, hides, ivory, and drugs, the property of the Sultan, and worth about $20,000. There are also on board two beautiful Arabian stud horses, intended as a present to his Highness the Sultan President of these United States.

His Highness the Imaum, is a remarkable man; as ambitious, and as enterprising as Mehemet Ali of Egypt. He is in peaceful possession of an extensive country on the Indian Ocean and Persian Gulf, and in Africa he holds the island of Zanzibar, whence the "Sultanee" came.—The area of his dominion is 52,000 square miles, with a population of nearly two million souls. They produce fruit, honey, wax, cinnamon, cassia, manna, spikenard, frankincense, myrrh and coffee in abundance, and export large quantities of the latter.

Heretofore we, as a nation, have traded very little with that country, and we have had no commercial treaty with the Sultan till within about two years back. Up to about a year ago the Salem people enjoyed all the benefits of the trade—and they stumbled upon it accidentally, as it were. Several of the ships trading in the Indian ocean with clocks and Lynn shoes, visited Siam and Muscat, exchanged their notions with the Arabians for dates, ivory and drugs, came home, quietly sold their cargoes, made money, and kept it all a secret. None dreampt of the trade till Mr. Roberts made a treaty between the two countries, and Messrs. Scovill & Britton, a young and enterprising firm of this city, despatched Mr. Bottsford in the Archibald Gracie, Capt. Sagary, with a cargo of dry goods, valued at $20,000, which sold well. Mr. Bottsford, for Scovill & Britton, then attempted to enter into a negotiation with the Imaum for the commencement of a regular trade with New York. He at first refused to have any thing to do in the matter. But the agent of Scovill & Britton was not to be thrust aside. He sat his wits to work and at last hit upon an expedient. He had with him one of Colt's famous repeating rifles, which he purchased when here at No. 145 Broadway. This he presented to His Highness, who was so astonished and delighted, that he immediately granted the young American agent an audience. His Highness could hardly contain himself, so surprised was he on witnessing the firing of the rifle which made 8 successive discharges, with but one loading. Said he to one of his ministers, "Those Americans must be a curious people, if this rifle is a sample of them. We must open and encourage a trade with their country—grant an audience instantly." When he heard Mr. Bottsford, he ordered the "Sultanee" to be loaded and sent off to New York, to be consigned to Mr. L. L. Britton, who now manages the affairs of Scovill & Britton—New York Herald.

A severe hurricane passed over Gallipolis, on the 3d inst. Several houses were thrown down in the town and others much injured. In the vicinity, hundreds of fruit and other trees were torn up by the roots, and fences, haystacks and outhouses, were thrown down and scattered in all directions.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF THE BRITISH QUEEN.

Interesting News from the Old World.

FOURTEEN DAYS LATER.

The noble steamer British Queen, Lieut. Roberts, arrived at New York on Saturday last.—She left London on the 30th ult., and Portsmouth on the 2d inst.,—thus making the passage from the latter port in fourteen days. Her news cannot be said to be particularly important, but it nevertheless possesses much interest.

Levis, the absconding cashier of the Schuylkill Bank, has been arrested in Paris, and was in charge of the police of that city.

The London money market was easy.

Cotton has advanced one-eighth.

The British Queen on her voyage out, was off Portsmouth on the 16th ult.

American Securities were still exceedingly dull.

The steamer Liverpool is not to continue to run between Liverpool & New York any more; but it is intended to send her up the Mediterranean.

BOUNDARY QUESTION.—In the House of Commons on the 29th ult., Mr. Hume asked whether there would be any objection, as great anxiety existed on the subject, to give the house some information respecting the negotiations with America on the Maine boundary question, what was the present state of those negotiations, and whether a favorable result might be anticipated?

Lord J. Russell said he would answer the question to-morrow.

CHARTIST IN AMERICA.—G. R. Batchelor, the great Chartist and friend of Frost, has left England for America.

THE WAR WITH CHINA.—A great and important meeting has been held in London, the Earl of Stanhope in the chair, to protest against the Chinese war.

Chief Baron O'Grady of Ireland is dead.

The Jews are still persecuted in Europe and the East in a most horrible manner, on account of the alleged murder at Damascus.

Some doubt still appears to rest on the announced discovery of the murder of Father Thomaso and his servant at Damascus.

There has been a tremendous row at the Opera House in London about engaging Tamburini. Some of his friends took possession of the stage and drove off Laporte.

The Princess Mary of Hesse Darmstadt is betrothed to the heir to the Russian throne.

We hear that the money advanced by the Bank of France to the Bank of England has all been paid by the latter establishment.

The removal of the remains of Napoleon from St. Helena to Paris is said to be the subject of a negotiation between M. Thiers and Lord Palmerston.

DON MIGUEL.—Don Miguel has published a letter in his own name, in which he distinctly and emphatically denies his rumored voluntary renunciation of all claim to the crown of Portugal. Whether he does or does not is of very little consequence.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.—An extraordinary rumor has been prevalent for the last two or three days, but which we cannot be induced to credit, namely, that her Majesty's government have consented to pacify the menancing citizens of Maine, and settling the boundary question by a BRIBE of £200,000.—Liverpool Mail, April 25th.

THE QUEEN.—It is whispered, in circles likely to be acquainted with the fact, that her Majesty is in a way likely to prevent the succession to the throne from passing into any other than the direct line.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Courier and Enq.

The News from Turkey, Greece and Africa.

PARIS, APRIL 23.

POSTSCRIPT—5 o'clock, P. M.—The Levent mail, received to-day, brings intelligence from Alexandria and Constantinople of 7th inst.; from Smyrna of 9th, from Algiers of same date, from Naples of 16th, and Malta of 18th inst.

From Turkey there is nothing of importance. From Alexandria we have renewed assurances of Mehemet Ali's determination to resist, and he has just given a proof of it. Col. Hodges, the British Consul General, lately, by instructions from Lord Ponsonby, the British Ambassador at Constantinople, took the liberty of offering passports to Turks who might wish to return to their country from Egypt. "This is," said the old Pasha, "un point fort—Give passports to your own people, if you will, and I will sign them, but do not meddle with my affairs.—I am, if not the Sovereign, the Administrator of this country, and will not allow an usurpation so impertinent."

This circumstance may unburthen the relations of England and Egypt, and have very unfavorable consequences for the former, who seems to be attracting upon her a multitude of enemies.

From Greece there is no news of the slightest interest to you. From Naples and Malta we learn that hostilities on a small scale (the seizure of one or two small vessels by the English) had actually begun, but we know since Saturday last, that the King of Naples has actually accepted the mediation of France, so that the fair will not for the present have very important consequences. The French will thus render themselves useful and important in Naples, as they are likely to become in the East, where the mediation between England other States, will also be accepted.

There is a rumor in town this morning that a serious correspondence has arose between the French and British governments respecting pied a terre the French have secured on the Island of Minorca, under the pretence of establishing a hospital there for the French sick to be brought from Algiers, but I have not been able to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the statement. If the English have not complained they ought, for it is only the entering point of the wedge. You will see Minorca in the hands of France if England be not sharp on the subject.

The campaign has commenced in Africa against Abdel Kader, but nothing decisive is yet known on the subject. The King's two sons, the Duke of Orleans and Aumale, are at the head of the expedition. An important occurrence for the French took place in Africa, namely, an attack made by a native chief, the Scheeck-el Arab, on one of the Lieutenants of Abdel Kader, in which the latter lost nearly 500 men, whose heads (saltck) were forwarded by the Scheeck to the French general.

Abdel Kader will be beaten, but the belief of the best informed is that the French Chambers will not long sanction the retention of the French conquests in Africa, on account of the immense loss of blood and treasure they annually exact to maintain them.

Before I close this long letter, I should inform you that the Chamber of Deputies yesterday voted 1,500,000 francs (300,000) to defray the expense of the blockade, &c., at Buenos Ayres. I can, in addition, assure you that a naval and military expedition against that Republic is under consideration of the government and is likely to take place.

Correspondence of the Commercial Advertiser.

PARIS, APRIL 28, 1840.

A REPUBLIC INEVETABLE IN FRANCE.—The die is cast—the first fruit of the radical mine has been culled—an immense stride has been taken toward republican institutions, for all public functionaries who are deputies will be deprived of all promotion within a year after the close of the session. This, if carried out to its utmost consequences, will lay the axe to the root of corrupt voting, and prevent all government but that in strict accordance with the wishes of the people.

THE RUPTURE WITH CHINA—A NEW VERSION OF THE STORY.—The ship Diana, from Canton, has arrived at London. She brought home the British seamen in irons, who were charged with creating the first row at a Chinese village in Mong Kong Bay, and killing a Chinaman. They were all liberated a short time after their arrival. They tell the following story:

On the 4th of July last, the anniversary of American independence, several American seamen went ashore to a small village, where they got drunk and quarrelled with the Chinese. After committing many acts of disorder they left the place, and in doing so, fell in with some British seamen, to whom however, they behaved in a very friendly manner, with the exception of one man, known as "Baltimore Tom," who boasted of his pugilistic powers, and challenged to fight any seaman on board the British ship, accompanying his challenge with some insulting remarks. The British seamen did not offer to molest Baltimore Tom on that occasion, but a week afterwards, learning that he had gone ashore, several English and Scotch sailors went after him with the determination, for the honor of their common country, to fight him if he would accept of one of them as an adversary. When they got upon the beach at a village abreast of Lin Tin, the British seamen met the American coming toward their boats without the boastful Baltimore Tom. The Americans had their hats decorated with gold leaves, which they said they had taken from the Chinese, whom they had fought and beaten. They also stated that they had broken open a "josshouse," or Chinese place of worship, and knocked the wooden gods and idols about. The British seamen proceeded to the village, which they had no sooner entered than the Chinese, believing them to belong to the party of Americans who had just committed the outrage, attacked them with sticks and stones in a most brutal manner. The British seamen retaliated, and after a desperate conflict, succeeded in defeating the Chinamen, clearing the village, and caused them to fly in all directions.

THE LONDON MONEY MARKET.—The great abundance of money is the most prominent feature of the London city news, but in the stock market little was doing. The foreign mark was particularly dull. The direction of speculation was in the share market, which now seems to engage almost exclusive attention. Confidence has been greatly increased in the mercantile circles, where the acceptances of the northern joint stock bankers have been fully discounted at 3½ and 4 per cent., and the rates upon the deposit of Consols have on some days been no higher than 2½ and 3 per cent. The weather has been extremely brilliant, and so warm an early a spring increases the prospects of an early and abundant harvest, and though rain is reported to be required in some districts, there is thought to be nothing very serious in that complaint, and as the vegetation is full one month in advance of the average of seasons, this is considered to be a doubly important advantage, as the rapid exhaustion of the old stocks of grain is tending to drive up the prices, notwithstanding the extremely favorable appearance of the crops of the present year.

AN ELOPEMENT.—A great sensation was produced at Brighton, England, on the 17th of March, by the elopement of Mrs. Heavyside with—no less a personage than Dr. Dyonisius Lardner, the well known lecturer on the steam engines. Mrs. Heavyside is said to be a very elegant woman, about 30 years old, and mother of three children. The guilty pair were traced to Ostend.

THE RECORDER.

EDNESDAY, ... MAY 27, 1840.

The Hon. John M. Niles, of Connecticut, has en appointed Post Master General, to supply e vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. ndall.

The young men's Whig Convention, lately d in Baltimore, raised ten thousand dollars the family of Mr. Laughlin, who was killed said Convention.

We direct the reader's attention to the to- do at Natchez. This is one of the most dread- —the most destructive of life and property of y with which the United States have ever en visited.

It is said Gov. Shannon has effected a loan in w York, of $400,000, and has made arrang- nts for carrying on the public works next year. essrs. McCracken and Kilgore, Fund Commis- ners, have resigned.

A letter from Gen. Jackson, dated 11th inst., elines the invitation of the Ohio Legislature spend the 4th of July, proximo, in Columbus, celebrating our national independence, on count of ill health.

The publishers of the "Brother Jonathan," of w York, announce that they have engaged pen of N. P. Willis, Esqr.; "and that in ure, this paper alone, will contain the con- butions of that gentleman." This able pen, l, no doubt, much enrich the columns of that eady able journal.

We acknowledge the receipt of "THE NEW ORLD," of the 16th inst. This is a mammoth ekly sheet, issued in New York, and edited Park Benjamin, Esq. It is among the first ss of periodicals of the day.—For the charac- of this paper we refer the reader to the pros- tus on our last page.

Mr. Newton, of the British connection, now in tendance at the General Conference of the E. Church in Baltimore, is said to be very quent, and to give a fine sample of true apos- ical preaching. The following description is en of him from the pen of Mr. Horton, a mber of the Conference:

"Mr. Newton's preaching is marked by great plicity and purity of style. He is most hap- in his quotations from the scriptures, and st powerful in their application. He is emi- ntly a preacher of the Gospel, mighty in the ptures. Metaphysical obstructions, nice dis- tions and philosophical disquisitions, are all ept away before the irresistible tide of script- l truths poured forth. The all-pervading au- rity of God and His inspiration controls the nds of both speaker and the hearers. By times a are almost overpowered by the splendor of h light which breaks up from the sacred pages, expounded and applied by this master-work- n. Whether you will or not, he drags you a tive, chained to the chariot wheels of the spel. He who has a spark of piety, will have blown into a flame; and that man is greatly be pitied who can sit under his preaching un- ved. But he must be heard in order to be preciated."

THE FLY AGAIN.—We believe the ravages of s insect is general throughout the State. But obably, the injury will not be as great as appear- ces indicate. Though the first stalks are de- oyed, the roots remain alive, and we think y will send up another set of shoots, which, ough they may be late, will nevertheless ripen d thus add to the present appearances. Six ars since, about the 15th of this inst., the wheat s nearly all killed through the country with b frost. The general opinion was, the crop uld be an entire failure. Many apprehending amine, bought up old grain at a high price.— t the wheat shot up anew from the root so as make a tolerable crop.

We believe the injury done by the fly is very tensive, and will make the present crop far ort, probably from ¼ to ½ of what prospect in- ated four weeks since, but that there will t be as great a failure as many people suppose. The two following extracts show that the Fly at work in Warren and Champaign, two very portant western counties:

"THE WHEAT CROP.—Within the past week have heard much complaint of extensive inju- to the growing wheat in this quarter, by the ssian Fly. In some instances large fields ve been totally destroyed, others partially in- ed, while some appear not to have been touch- at all."—Lebanon (Ohio) Star.

"THE GROWING CROP.—Never, perhaps, did a ring open with brighter prospects for an abun- nt harvest, than the present; but the hopes the husbandman have been blasted by the ap- arance amongst them of the Hessian Fly, which, regret to learn, is committing serious depre- tions upon their fields, in different parts of is county. If the destruction should prove to as extensive as it has been represented to us, ere will not be one-half of an average crop of ain in Champaign this season."—Urbana Gaz.

GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—We have heard from this dy up to the 6th instant; all, so far, was har- onious. But they had not yet got to the tight aces, as the committees, on the hard questions, d none of them reported.

There is evinced a disposition to treat the all xciting subject of Slavery with proper decorum. standing committee was raised, at the motion a slaveholder, to whom all petitions on that sub- ct were to be referred. And as the petitions e presented a respectable reference is made of em. The way this committee was raised, was the liberal cast. It consists of one member om each Annual Conference, not appointed the Chair, but by the delegates of the Con- rences respectively, which gives several aboli- tionists to the committee on Slavery. No doubt, his liberality, on the part of the Conference, ooks to consequences; there can be no question ut they intended to put an end to the aboli- on discussion in the church, and being con- cious of their ability so to do, they feel inclined o do it in a way to prevent, much as possible, ublic sympathy for the suppressed.

Various petitions had been presented. One to have a Commentary on the Discipline; a number to make the Presiding Elders elective; and a quantity on the subject of Slavery. All of which were referred.

The episcopal address, or message, had been received, and in true parliamentary style, its numerous topics referred to their appropriate committees. It is said to be a strong, well written document, and "pervaded by one grand design, which was to concentrate and consolidate all the powers now claimed and exercised by officers in the church."

A report was made from the Book Agencies of New York and Cincinnati. Says a Methodist paper, "the establishment, at the former place, is worth nearly six hundred thousand dollars; the increase of the capital stock last year between sixty and seventy thousand dollars.—What a small pitance is divided between the several Annual Conferences compared with the increase of the capital stock! And yet, it is called a charity—and all the profits, it is said, go to the superannuated preachers, widows, orphans, &c."

Since writing the above we have seen an abstract of the proceedings of the conference up to the 9th inst. Nothing very interesting had yet taken place. A resolution introduced by S. Lucky, "so to amend the discipline as that ministers appointed chaplains of prisons and military posts may be continued as such more than two years," produced a little excitement. But it did not prevail. This resolution seemed to lay the axe at the root of itinerancy. There can be little doubt but there is a disposition in a portion of the ministry of the M. E. Church to abate the energies of their wheeling operations. But the episcopacy will see to that They will never permit a man to remain long in one place for fear he might gain too much influnce.

A number of petitions have been presented on the subject of Lay-Delegation,—election of Presiding Elders, and for a moderate episcopacy, all of which have been referred to a committe of five. Our brother, of the Letter Press, will soon be able to see whether there are any ministers in the Methodist Episcopal Church who are opposed to Lay-representation.

A correspondent says, "I wish to impress our people with the idea that it was not guaranteed to them, (i. e. to a conference of ministers and laymen) by the Great Head of the church, to make laws for the brethren unless it be in strict accordance with the word of God. It is only such rules that can be enforced upon intelligent men in these enlightened days."

Yes, but we ask the good brother, who is to be the judge in this matter? Suppose a conference of ministers and laymen were to pass a rule which a few might think to be unscriptural,—how must the question be decided? Give the sects and parties the right to interpret scripture, and they will, in turn, prove any thing from the book of God, from the assumptions of popery, through the whole range of ridiculous opinions to the vagaries of Mormonism.

There are in every state of society, civil and religious, two great antagonist principles perpetually at work.—Tyranny in the head and anarchy in the parts. When man is placed at the head of government, the tendency of his nature stimulates him to go forward in his graspings after power, until he lays his hand on the last item,* so that he may enjoy the gratifications of his own will. And from this very identical principle of our nature, the great body of citizens are inclined to throw off all authority—even the just and equitable restraints of government, and, like he who stands at the head, to make their own will the rule of their action. In most of the monarchies, and in all of the ecclesiastical despotisms of Europe, the heads have became so strong they can hold the members of their respective communities, so as not even to permit a struggle. But in all liberal governments, where the people are permitted to speak and act, you will see the two principles above in perpetual conflict. Trace the history of this happy Republic, and you will find, that, the operation of these principles has made almost every important question, or serious difficulty from its first establishment down to the present hour. If rulers were not inclined to assume too much power, and subject to throw off proper restraints, few difficulties would happen in the progress of governments.

It may be readily supposed, considering the circumstances which gave us being, that, as a community, we have a strong disrelish to power in the head, for the exercise of such power was what drove us from the church of our spiritual nativity to seek a home where the God of Providence might direct. These circumstances having produced in us a morbid excitement against power, we would naturally be inclined to indulge in unwarrantable suspicions against all men in authority, and to pay too little respect to the wholesome regulations of discipline. From yielding undue submission to an ecclesiastical despotism, our danger is of throwing off the proper restraints of government, and turning liberty into licenciousness. We may add to this that the spirit of the times, in general, tends to anarchy. From these considerations, it is our opinion, we have more need to be exhorted to respect the decisions of our public functionaries than to be put on our guard against their authority.

In reference to interpreting scripture, every one will explain to suit his own peculiar interest or notions. The pope can prove out of the bible, his absolute authority over the church, and the New Light, or anarchist, can prove with equal clearness, that no man or body of men, has any warrant from the book of God to control him in matters of religion; but that he has a right to believe what he pleases and do as little as he pleases, and still has undoubted claim to church membership.

These views should lead us to hesitate when we pronounce things scriptural or anti-scriptural. We should examine if we are not under the influence of some prejudice or predilection. We have a right to investigate the doings of our functionaries, but it should be done with a full view of the difficulties all round.

*In illustration of this principle, we refer the reader to the resolutions of Dr. Bangs, introduced into the present General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, alluded to in our last paper, especially that one which gives the bishop an appeal from the Annual Conference to the General Conference, on the trial of a preacher. This resolution takes from the itinerant minister the last vestage of liberty. It is no use for us to conceal our opinion of such men as this; he who would be the bearer of such resolutions, must be a heartless tyrant. Give such a man power, and he would make heritics smoke at the stake. Well has it been said of power, "its march is ever onward, and its tremendous tendency to accumulation."

PRICES CURRENT.

BALTIMORE, MAY 16.—FLOUR. The market for flour is unsettled, and the stocks of all descriptions and receipts, light. There does not, however, appear to be as much firmness with holders generally as at the time of making up our last report, and sales of good brands of Howard st. have been made from stores, since that period, to the extent of fully 3000 barrels, at $4 68¾, taken chiefly for shipment. Some holders, however, have sold at 4 75, and continme to demand that price, notwithstanding small sales were made yesterday at 4 65 a 4 62½. The car and wagon prices are at 5 62½ a 5 50 per bbl. Sales of City Mills at 4 75, full, at which 800 bbls. were taken from one house this week; and Susquehannah at the same rates. We regret to understand, however, that many of the barrels of the latter description are not in as good order as desired.

PROVISIONS.—The operations in barrelled descriptions have been to considerable extent, including a small lot of No. 1 Beef at 13 50 per bbl. cash. There have been larger operations also in Bacon, and prices have become more firm with an advance of a fraction. The stock, also, is becoming light. We quote 8¾ a 9 cts. cash or short credit, with interest added, for prime western assorted. Hams, Middlings and Shoulders remain at quotations. Lard has advanced in price, and in much request at 10½ cts. for prime No. 1. Sales of No. 2 at 8½ cts. Some holders demand 8¾ a 9 cts. Butter is only nominal.—Lyford.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 16.—FLOUR. The price of flour has declined about 12½ cents per barrel within the week, and the demand has become quite limited for shipment and home use. Sales early in the week for Pennsylvania and Brandywine at 4 87½—subsequently sales of the former at 4 75. Western has ranged at from 4 62½ to 4 56, and during the last two days sale at 4 50 in large lots,—small parcels 4 56.

PROVISIONS.—Pork has improved in demand, with sales at 15 50 a 16 00 for Mess, and 13 50 a 14 00 for Prime. Bacon is in fair request, at 9½ a 10½ for Hams; 8½ a 9 for sides, and 7½ a 8 cents for shoulders. Lard—sales early in the week of western, at 9, since at 10 cents. It is now held higher and is in request.—Bicknell.

PITTSBURGH, MAY 15.—As the season advances, busines lessens in amount, and our merchants and manufactures are not doing so much. The stocks throughout the city continues fair and the sales moderate.

We notice our merchants are getting a good many scarce goods and preparing to meet the sales for harvest times, and we hope considerable for that purpose will be sold in the ensuing four or six weeks.

Flour is very plenty, and sales through the week for good lots without inspection 2 50, inspected 2 62½, and very choice, a lot of 300 bbls. sold for 2 75, and retail 2 75 to 3 00 per bbl.

Wheat 45 cents in quantity, and small lots 50 cents per bushel.

Sugar is firm and steady. Twenty hhds. sold at 5¾ cents per lb. cash, and sales at 6 cts per lb. per hhd. in quantities; 6¼ to 7½ cts. per lb. per barrel.

Lead has fallen—sales for cash 3¾, and on time 4 cents per lb.—Harris.

ITEMS.

The attempt to pass off the new emission of counterfeit bills of the United States Bank appears to have been simultaneous in this city, New York and Baltimore.—Bicknell.

A band of counterfeiters are evidently abroad. Store keepers and others in the habit of receiving much bank paper should keep a sharp look out for these gentry.—ib.

NEW COUNTERFEIT.—Bank of the United States.—10s, new plate, letter A on both ends, signed for J. Cowperthwaite, cashier, S. Mason; for N. Biddle, president, G. W. Fairman. The centre vignette of the banking house is tolerably well executed, but the heads on the end of the bill are coarsely engraved.—ib.

The Philadelphia Banks discount most of the business paper which is offered, not having more than four months to run.—ib.

Charles and William McMullan, are about to be tried in the Philadelphia Court of Criminal Sessions, for manufacturing counterfeit coin.—ib.

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.—The editor of the Maysville Monitor abused J. N. Maffit, the Methodist preacher, in his paper. Maffit invited the editor to hear him preach; the invitation was accepted, the editor was converted, and became a member of Maffit's church.

THE CHOLERA.—That dreadful scourge, the cholera, is making great havoc among our native fellow subjects in Calcutta. THE HEALING ART.

The science of Medicine has been compared to Virgil's mystical tree at the mouth of the Avernus, thickly covered with visionary leaves and on every leaf a dream, by which comparison is insinuated that it consists of little more than Hypothetical Theories and visionary speculations.—But such is far from being the fact. The science of Medicine is immoveably founded upon the rock of Baconian Induction, it being one of its primary maxims, that Man is ignorant of every thing antecedent to observation and experiment, and that excogitated principles and hypothetical speculations, are detrimental to the interest of true science.

It will readily be admitted by every attentive observer that it is a great and useful art—a noble and elevated science—well deserving the highest appreciation and the most exalted esteem,—for however obscured by ignorance, or perverted by quackery, the science of curing diseases is certainly a source of many blessings to man. And as a science, Medicine is of liberal bearing and full of intellectual greatness, having for its object the developement of the human mind on some of the most interesting topics that can possibly invite investigation. Man, in the organical structure of his frame,—the physical laws which govern that frame,—the diseases so various which afflict his body and mind, and the remedies which a well authenticated experience has proven proper to treat those diseases, all attest the dignity of the science under consideration.

Medicine has a prerogative upon which it is needless for her to insist,—her province is to expaciate upon the immense field of human misery and human suffering,—her prerogative is to uproot the seeds of disease, which are so thickly sown along the path of life, and to stay the hand of the ruthless destroyer, and her deference the noblest gratitude of those whom she has raised from a bed of languishing and pain, to a state of health and enjoyment; and the voice of an approving conscience, sweeter than the shouts of an applauding multitude, her highest reward.

These (the advantages of Medical science) are so numerous and conspicuous, that it is profanity to decry them. Her every pretention is based upon an experience at once discriminative and profound; the accumulated light of ages beams upon her, and this light is continually increasing, as pathological phenomena and therapeutic agents multiply. A few years hence, will, in all probability, invest it with brightness and a glory, compared with which, its present state will appear as the morning twilight. Its history is coeval with the human species, for it is not to be supposed that uninterrupted health was ever enjoyed by the human family. Its foundations were laid when first abnormal phenomena presented themselves, and remedial agents were resorted to, and the superstructure has been gradually arising for near six thousand years, until it furnishes us with a variety of potent weapons with which we may combat and frequently repel the assailants of human health and human happiness.

Medical men have ascertained the relation which the human constitution sustains to the various substances, with which the stores of nature are fraught. They have extorted her secrets and summoned her powers in aid of human distress and infirmity; they have brought from the bowels of the earth, from the caverns of the ocean and the boundless fields of air, the most powerful antidotes to disease. They have extracted remedies from substances deemed essentially noxious, thereby vindicating from rash and presumptuous imputations, the benificence of the Author of Nature, by showing that all that He has made is very good.

Medical men leave it to others to accompany the human race in their revalry and their triumphs, and interpose in the moment of exigence and respond to the call of distress, and with a silent and invisible energy contend with the powers of destruction.

How striking the contrast between the art of Healing and the art of War.

The art of war has for its object the destruction of the human species. The mind of the warrior teems with machinations of ruin and anxiously revolves among different schemes that present themselves, which shall scatter destruction to the widest extent and with the surest aim. His progress is marked by devastation and blood, by depopulated fields and smoking villages. And the laurels which he wears are bedewed by the tears of widows and orphans. The proud and imposing array with which he contrives to guild the horrors of his profession are but the pomp and the retinue of the King of Terrors. On the contrary, the art of Medicine proceeds with a silence and secrecy like the great processes of Nature, to scatter blessings on all within its reach, and the couch of sickness and the silent retreat of sorrow and despair are the scenes of its triumphs.

The little applause bestowed on physicians, compared with what is so lavishly heaped on conquerors, conveys a bitter reflection on human nature, by showing how much we suffer ourselves to be the dupes of our senses, to extall the brilliant rather than the useful. Whereas, a just and impartial estimate would compel us to assign to skilful practitioners of medicine the very first rank among merely human professions.

The post master at Canal Dover, says, that the paper of Geo. McPherson has not been taken out of the office for eight weeks. Will brother Warren see to this, and inform us what is the matter? We have, from some cause or other, been worse bored from Coshocton circuit than any other place, by wrong directions, delinquents, &c. We hope this case will not add another to the number.

Another case.—The post master of Gratis, Preble, Ohio, says, that Mr. Joseph White refuses to take his paper any longer from the office. Does Mr. White expect to get clear with that kind of spunging? We'll see to that.

And still another case.—The post master at London, Ohio, tells us, Geo. Greg does not take his paper. No, nor has he paid us either, and we begin to suspect he does not intend to do so. We did hope, after our repeated cautions to that effect, that our brethren, agents, would not impose such an amount of worthless subscribers on us. Unless this kind of boring is prevented it would break down any paper in the land.

We inform Bro. Thrap, that we cannot attend his appointment at the Springfield chapel, on Sabbath week, as we are pre-engaged.

NOTICE.—Those who subscribed to me for Bro. Shinn's Books, in the bounds of Cambridge and Pisgah circuits, shall have them delivered against the last of June, proximo.

GEORGE CLANCY.

CAMP MEETING.—We propose to hold a camp meeting, on the farm of John Walker, 3 miles west of Adamsville, Muskingum county, Ohio, to commence on the 4th of June. We solicit the attendance of Bros. Brown, Springer, Marshall, Wilson, Thrap, Fairchild, Davis, Warren and Stephens. P. INSKEEP, Sup.

A DREADFUL PICTURE.—The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer alludes to accounts from Pondicherry, of the 22d of January, and from Yanaon, a French factory about 250 miles along the coast from that city, up to 7th December, which contain numerous details of the dreadful hurricane and inundation of the sea on that coast, mentioned by us a short time since. They coincide in stating the force of the wind to have been such as had never before been witnessed there, and the inroad of the sea as dreadful beyond description. Upwards of 10,000 corpses had been found, but many thousand more had, no doubt, been washed away. So many bodies lying unburied had caused a pestilence, and the condition of the survivers, who had lost most of their property, was exceedingly distressing. The British authorities and settlers had shown the greatest kindness; but the factory and the town of Yanaon, which alone had lost 1,500 inhabitants, could not recover from such a calamity for a great many years.

PROVERBS.—Once in ten years, every man needs his neighbor.

Either say nothing of the absent, or speak like a friend.

He that would be well spoken of himself, must not speak ill of others.

He that doth the kindness, hath the noblest pleasure of the two.

He that doth a kindness to a good man, doth a greater to himself.

Keep your mouth shut, and your eyes open.

Shew not all the bottom either of your purse or of your mind.

One lie draws ten more after it.

He who keeps good men company, may very well bear their charges.

He begins to grow bad, who takes himself to be a good man.

Let us do what we can and ought, and let God do his pleasure.

The case of General Gaines and wife against the executors of Daniel Clarke, which we mentioned a few days since as having been decided in favor of Gen. Gaines, involves property to the amount of many millions of dollars. The property acquired by this decision belonged to Gen. Gaines' lady, who was formerly the wife of a Mr. Whitney. The narrative of his lady has all the elements of a romance—a mysterious marriage—separation—a lost will—a cruel guardian—a cast off orphan brought up by ignorance of her claim—and a supposed discovery, by which the heroine is made the richest woman in America.—N. Y. Express.

A COMPLIMENT.—The London Athenæum, in an article on American Travellers, says:

"Whether, like Messrs. Willis, Fay and Thatcher, they move about pencilling European society and distinguished persons, or, like Mr. Stephens, they interweave the interest of their personal adventures, with the distant, but not dim associations, which hallow every inch of the eastern land, or like Irving, they bring to the old country ripe scholarship, ready to appreciate, and poetical enthusiasm waiting but to be kindled, the Americans are among our pleasanest travellers."

A million of mummies, it is stated, have been discovered in the environs of Durange in Mexico. They are in a sitting posture, but have the same wrappings, bands, and ornaments of the Egyptian. Among them was found a poniard, of flint, with a sculptured handle, chaplets, necklaces, &c. of alternately colored beads, fragments of bones polished like ivory, fine worked elastic tissue, (probably our modern India rubber cloth) mocasins worked like those of our Indians, bones of vipers, &c.

MORE AUCTION SWINDLING.—A New York paper states that Samuel Fullerton, of No. 10 Stone street, was shaved on Thursday at the auction store of Bearns & Valkenburgh, 154 Pearl street, of $22,30. The shavers were arrested and held to bail in the sum of $500. Another similar complaint was made by George Clover of Dorchester Mass., against the same auctioneer. It was the old story. A box, sold for one article, and a bill for five hundred.

On the subject of the flour trade with Canada, the New York Star says—

John Bull takes Ohio and other Western Wheat, carries it through the Welland Canal; has it ground, and baptises it as English Flour, and so it goes down the St. Lawrence to England. This loses us a great toll on our canals, and they do not modify their corn laws, because in this way there is no necessity for so doing.

THE COMMERCE OF PHILADELPHIA.—The exports from the port of Philadelphia from the 1st to the 8th of May, amounted in value to $160,488. Among the articles exported were 16,234 barrels of flour, 18,996 bushels of wheat, 11,927 bushels of corn, 318 hogsheads and 3,404 barrels of corn meal, 3,373 barrels of rye meal, 20 tierces of rice, 1,847 barrels and 1,554 kegs of ship bread, 37 hogsheads of bark, 30 hogsheads of tobacco, and 547 bales of cotton.

It is folly for an eminent man to think of escaping censure, and a weakness to be affected with it. Fabius Maximus said, he was a greater coward that was afraid of reproach, than he that fled from his enemies.

THE WEEPING WILLOW.

BY JAMES M. FULTON.

O sacred tree, of burial ground the grace,
How does your figure fill that solemn place!
Simple, majestic, delicate and fair,
No other tree has equal standing there.
Rising with grandeur o'er the solemn scene,
Not with an upstart air but modest mein,
Climbing in age to fifty feet in height,
Forming a shade that turns the golden light,
Your streaming tendrils take a downward course,
Like falling drops from heaven's prolific source,
Or as the flaxen ringlets of some maid,
Unfettered from its fillet and its braid,
Hanging around her neck in careless streams,
Thus thy rich covering to my vision seems.
You truly seem to mourn the dead that lie
Beneath the sod and thy green canopy,
Weeping the young, lamenting over age,
And kindly pitying mourning parentage.
Bright as the genius of humanity,
Thou sympathetic, lovely, graceful tree,
Still by poetic souls may you be set,
Where tenderest griefs the late broke sod have wet.
Still rising gently o'er the solemn grave,
May you your ever-beauteous umbrage wave,
And sigh in pity with each passing gale,
For hopes soon blighted and joys that fail.
When numerous summers' suns have rolled away,
And many a storm of many a winters' day,
When sober autumns have as streaming sand,
Poured down as from some vagrant river land,
And springs as numerous as the falling leaves,
Form waving forests when the zephyr heaves;
Still may you grace the place where mortals lie,
And for the fate of human beings sigh.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: I am much pleased with an article in your paper, over the signature of THEOPHOLIS. He says much to the point on the subject of ministerial duty; and if rightly attended to, could not fail to have a salutary effect.

I have been an observer of the ministry for twenty-five years, and hesitate not to say that many of them differ from the Apostles in their mode of preaching, and attention to pastoral duties. If they can give us a flowry discourse, recited from DICK or BLAIR, they seem to think all is done which pertains to their duty, and my heart has been often pained to witness their neglect of the spiritual interests of the church. Instead of conversing with the people about religion, they laugh and jest with them about the trifling occurrences of the day,—neglect to visit the families, catechise the children, to appoint prayer meetings, or to organize and encourage Sabbath Schools.

Instead of seeking out places to have protracted and sacramental meetings, and pressing them on the people, they wait to be invited to hold them, and two chances to one, after they have agreed for a public meeting, if the church is not mortifyed, by their neglect to attend at the time appointed, while they wait on their indolence thirty minutes or one hour. These lazy drones are apt to be more clamorous about their pay, than the prompt and industrious servant of God.

I esteem preaching but a small portion of the minister's duty. The man who only labors in the pulpit will never promote the interests of the church; he must attend to all the openings to do good, and as they present themselves improve them. If he let the opportunity pass, it never can be recalled; either the seed will be choked and die for want of cultivation, or more industrious laborers will gather the fruit.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

LAWRENCEBURGH CT., IA., MAY 9, 1840.

Dear Brother Springer: I wish to make, thro' your paper, our third quarterly report to the President of the District. Our third quarterly meeting was held on the 11th and 12th of April, at Dellsborough. We had no special excitement, but we think good was done.

We had a two days' meeting, Saturday and Sunday last, in Switzerland county, in the neighborhood of Bro. Clarke's, and notwithstanding the heavy rains, the house was filled on Sabbath, to overflowing. The exercises were very interesting,—two were added to the church.—Our cause, on this part of the circuit, we think to be on the advance, though there is no special excitement. We greatly rejoice to hear of the flourishing condition of our church in other parts of the work, and would be glad if we had the same good tidings to report from our charge.—Brethren, pray that the Lord may revive us abundantly. Yours, in the gospel of peace,

JOSEPH SIMPSON, Sup't.

VAUCLUSE, WOOD, VA., MAY 15, 1840.

Bro. Springer: When I came to this mission last November things appeared rather discouraging, both as it regarded myself and the mission. That part of it on the Ohio side, which was by far the most promising, had at their own request been taken into the Woodsfield circuit. I then confined myself to the counties of Tyler and Wood, Virginia. During the winter season things remained so discouraging, I wanted the people to let me return home, but they refused their consent, for which I am glad, for the winter seems to be truly gone, and the time of the singing of birds, and the voice of the dove is heard in our borders, in a moral point of view.

I have organized five respectable societies, containing in all, thirty-six members, and have two more to organize on my next round, which will probably contain from eight to ten each.—Our prospects for members, are quite encouraging, all things considered,—but what is better than all, the Lord is beginning to raise up a praying people among us. There are nine or ten lately joined, that have professed to obtained the pearl of great price, and our meetings are becoming spiritual and lively. Some of the old ship's crew are beginning to understand their rights as members of the church militant, and are identifying themselves on the side of mutual rights. In consequence of this we are becoming the objects of suspicion and intolerance, and are persecuted to a degree amounting almost to violence. However, a goodly number are friendly, to their honor, as christians, be it spoken.

One thing here worthy of notice is, seven who joined one of our societies, from the age of 12 to 15, have professed religion, and taken up their cross in the public prayer meetings, and when spoken to in class evince the experience of the confirmed christian. The Lord is adding to their number, such as, I trust, will be eternally saved. O, that God may keep them faithful unto the end! and at last pronounce their sentence in mercy, and with a smile that shall brighten heaven, "come ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

This country, through which I travel, is generally thinly inhabited, but our congregations are commonly large and attentive, and the people are the most hospitable and friendly I have ever been among.

Farewell for the present,

J. DEGARMO.

BROWNSVILLE, PA., MAY 12, 1840.

Bro. Springer: Since the commencement of your valuable paper, I have read it with interest, and no part more so, than that portion devoted to religious communications. My heart truly has been made to rejoice, while I have read what the Lord has been doing for us as a church. And while some have contributed largely into the treasury of revival intelligence, I feel it my duty to cast in my mite for Brownsville ct.

The 1st quarterly meeting was held in Bridgeport, Bro. Brown was with us, he labored hard, and I trust to some profit, especially to the lovers of Zion, and no doubt, the hardened sinners felt the force of Gospel truth, though they would not submit to its requirements. There were other preachers from the adjoining circuits to assist us. We had, all things considered, a good meeting.

Our next quarterly meeting was held in Bellview meeting house. We were favored with the labors of Bros. I. Francis and J. Hopwood; we had, truly, a refreshing time among the believers; those that were cold and lukewarm, were quickened to diligence, and we expect the Lord will do something more for us in this place.

The next meeting of importance, was a protracted meeting held in Williamsborough, about three weeks since, it being the only protracted meeting we have had this year. We were favored with the labors of Bro. Dalbey, from Pittsburgh. This was a time of great interest. Bro. D. was encircled by numerous relatives, and probably, had more influence in the place, in behalf of the cause of Christ, than any other—That place and Frenchtown, one mile distant, has been noted for infidelity. Bro. D. commenced his labors with us on Saturday night; on Sabbath we had a crowded house and an attentive congregation. On Monday, at 10 o'clock, we had love-feast; there was an invitation given for all the lovers of Christ to attend. We had no society in the place, and only two or three members. The Episcopal Methodists and the Cumberland Presbyterians, and many that did not belong to any society attended; sectarian bigotry was laid aside,—the presence of the Lord filled the place,—the sacred fire of love burned upon the altar of our hearts. Many were made to rejoice in the God of our salvation.

Monday night, one came forward as a mourner, while great solemnity rested upon the congregation. Next day, at 10 o'clock, we had another meeting. After preaching by Bro. Dalbey, I gave an invitation for mourners,—I think, seven came forward. At night, the number was doubled; from that time until Friday night, we had meeting at 10 A. M. and 4 P. M., and night.—The lovers of the Lord laid aside all worldly business and labored faithfully among those that were seeking religion. It was truly a pleasant sight to see the different denominations so earnestly engaged for the salvation of precious souls.

It is believed that 30 or 40 embraced religion, as the fruits of this meeting. Some were converted that belonged to the M. E. Church as probationers,—some reclaimed. Several have joined the Cumberland Presbyterians and 17 have joined with the M. P. Church, and we expect more.

I can truly say, that was one of the happiest weeks of my life. Praise God and the Lamb for His unspeakable goodness to the children of men! We have good meetings at the different appointments on the circuit, and the prospect is somewhat encouraging. I find on this circuit a social, liberal people; and although the circuit is small, I have been better supported thus far than any circuit that I have travelled previously. I feel grateful to God for past mercies, and can say with the Psalmist, "My heart is fixed" in the cause I have espoused some nine years since.—May the chariot of salvation move forward, until the inhabitants of the earth shall learn righteousness, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Yours, in the bonds of a peaceful gospel,

WM. L. BALDWIN.

VARIETY.

Money is only useful as spur to industry, and as it enables men, mutually, to enjoy the fruits of each other's labor.

A COUNTERFEITER CAUGHT.—A man named Arthur McKeon, who kept a store in the village of Manayunk, was arrested on Thursday afternoon, at the Hunting Park Course, near the city, for passing two dollar counterfeit notes on the Bank of Delaware, at Wilmington, by Mr. Isaac Abrams, of Kensington; but owing to a want of sufficient police to aid him, a rescue was effected by a number of McKeon's countrymen, who were engaged on the Reading rail road that passes near the course. In the course of the melee, Mr. A. was considerable injured, owing to the superiority of numbers against him. —Bicknell.

THE QUEEN'S HUSBAND.—The Liverpool correspondent of the New York Star says: "The Queen's husband continues to bear himself in a manner likely to retain for him the very favorable opinion the English have formed of him. It is believed that he does not in any way put himself forward in politics. His station, in the midst of dignity, is that of a private gentleman, and he confines himself to the duties of that station. When the Queen holds a court, a levee, or a drawing room, he stands by her side. He goes with her to the opera and the theatre, in the most unostentatious way, and I believe that their private life might supply a model of happy married life to all."

LOTTERY SWINDLING.—The Courier and Enquirer says; A lottery dealer who keeps a shop at No. 6 Peck Slip, named Elias Tucker, was yesterday arrested and brought before the Police on charge of selling lottery policies contrary to the provisions of the revised statutes. Three several complaints were made by Joseph Wormwell and Charlotte Lothan, of 130 Cherry street, and by Susan S. Evans of 230 Water street, that they had at various times purchased of the prisoner lottery policies, but without success, until at length they purchased shares in some tickets in the Delaware Bridge Lottery, on which they "hit" him to the tune of $2000, which he refused to pay. Hence the complaint. Officer Thomas M. Lyon learned on inquiry that Tucker had for a long time preyed upon the poorer classes in his neighborhood, and was in the habit of taking from his victims not only money, but rings, brooches, and every article of value he could lay his hands upon. The complainants, upon consulting Mr. Lyon, applied to the police for redress. Tucker was fully committed for trial. It is expected that numerous other complaints will be made against him.

THROWING WATER ON FIRES.—We find the following remarks in relation to the mode of throwing water on burning buildings, in the Pennsylvanian of yesterday. They are sensible and correct, and evince both firemanship and philosophy; and as those merits, as well as the subject which elicited the exercise of them by the writer, are as applicable to the subject matter in this city as in Philadelphia, we copy his commendable essay. He says:

"For some time past I have noticed at different fires in the city and vicinty, that our firemen have a peculiar way of throwing water from their engines or hose into the midst of a mass of flame, or over so as to fall upon it, no doubt supposing that the water being thrown amidst the flame will extinguish it, or that it will reach the burning body. Now, so far is this from being true, that the quantity of heat taken from the flame, (we will say, for instance) by the stream of one engine, when the fire has made some progress, is almost imperceptible. And next, it is evident, especially if the fire be large, and consequently the heat be very great, that nearly all the water will be dissipated into vapor before it can reach its object. These, I think, are the principal reasons why fires are not extinguished sooner than they are. Let but the firemen direct the stream of water upon the burning body itself, and it is obvious, that by striking at the very root, he will be most likely to effect his purpose. The principle will apply in almost every case, but especially where a whole house is enveloped in flame. If the water is directed at the combustibles burning at the lower part of the room or building, it will not only serve to put out the burning body upon which it is thrown, but the greater portion will be converted into steam, which instead of being lost as before, now helps to extinguish whatever is burning above it. So, a vigorous volume of water thrown as last described, will do at least five times more execution than the same quantity thrown in the manner it usually is. As 'laving' is the mania of the day, by using the produce of Fairmount rightly, an immense quantity of labor that is usually wasted, might be husbanded for other purposes, and other incalculable advantages gained."—New York Sun.

A SHOCKING MURDER.—The Baltimore Sun says:—A singular and apparently unaccountable case of murder occurred at Harper's Ferry, on the night of Wednesday last at about half past eleven o'clock. All the particulars we have been able to learn are, that the man who attends the lock of the canal at that place, was met, about the time stated, above the lock, by a strange man, who requested him to return and pass his boat thro' the lock. He told the stranger that he would find females at the house, who would pass him through. Residing with him was his sister, named as our informant believes, Mrs. Davis, a widow lady, and her two children, one a boy about nine or ten years old. The children slept with her, and other persons slept in the same room who on that night were disturbed by some noise made by one of the children, and on getting out of bed and procuring a light, it was discovered that both the boy and his mother were dead, their throats having been cut from ear to ear. None of the persons in the room had heard any one either enter or depart; nor could any of them form any conjecture as to the perpetrator of the horrid deed, till the next morning, when the stranger who had met the lock tender on the previous night, was discovered in an outhouse, with the bloody knife in his possession; and on being arrested, confessed himself to be the murderer. He is said to be a German, but we have not learned either his name or his motive.

IMPROVEMENT AMONG THE WESTERN INDIANS.—The following is from an account of the monthly concert at Boston.

Cheering intelligence has been received from the mission west of the Rocky Mountains. Great enthusiasm prevails among the natives, in respect to engaging in the pursuits of civilized life. They bring their rifles, to exchange for implements of husbandry, and their axes, to have them made into hoes.

They were invited, for some distance around the mission, to come in and assist in digging a millrace, which they did, cheerfully; and in two or three weeks, they dug for the distance of half a mile, fifteen feet deep; having only a few hoes and shovels, many of them working with sticks or with their hands. They worked during the forenoon and attended meeting in the afternoon. Great excitement prevailed among them, during this time, there being as many as two thousand, more or less affected, and, as the missionaries hope, some truly born again.

There has also been a revival at the Methodist mission. Thus is the Lord not only beginning, but carrying on his great and gracious work among the heathen. A circumstance of a most interesting nature has transpired, in regard to this mission. Just as they were beginning to feel a pressing need of a printing press to supply the demand for books, Mr. Hall arrived from the Sandwich Islands, with a press and fount of type, purchased by the voluntary contributions of the native Christians, for this purpose.

A WARM CORPSE.—A couple of resurrectionists started for a subject one cold night, in a small covered wagon, and succeeded in finding one—when they had disinterred the body they dressed it up in a frock-coat, hat, &c., placed it between them in their wagon, and started for home. The weather being very cold, and coming in sight of a tavern, they concluded to stop and "take a drink," which they did, leaving the inanimate companion sitting erect upon his seat, with the horse's reins lying in his lap.—The ostler observing three individuals in the wagon when it was driven up, and noticing that but two went into the house. thought he would inquire of the third why he did not follow his companions. So he walked up to the wagon and asked the reason for his remaining behind.

No answer was returned. After questioning the dumb gentleman some time, he took hold of him, and found that his hand was upon a dead man! Although terrified at first, his mind soon solved the mystery, he recollected that one of the individuals who was sipping, toddy at the bar, was a medical student. "So," says the ostler, "I'll have some fun with these larks." He hoisted the body from the wagon and carried it into the stable, when he took of its clothes, put them on himself, and then placed himself in the wagon; after a short time the students returned—one of them jumped up beside, as he supposed his dead man, and in merriment struck him upon his knee, exclaiming "how would you like some flip, my old fellow?" The moment the words had passed his lips, he observed to his companion, in a low and trembling voice, "Ben, he's warm!" This started Ben, but he recovered his self-possession in a moment, and after reproving his friend for frightening him unnecessarily, stepped up and touched the ostler himself; in an instant, shocked with fear, he repeated what his companion had just said, "He is warm, by Heaven," "And so would you be," said the ostler, "if you had just been stolen from h—, as I have!" The students took to their heels, and never returned to claim their horse and wagon.

MADAME VESPUCCI.—A letter has been extensively circulated, written by this lady on her departure for Europe, in which she declines receiving the very liberal subscriptions which were made up for her, on the ground that it was not a National Gift. She had asked of Congress a grant of land and a certificate of citizenship, as the last descendant of the intrepid navigator to whom America is so much indebted, Amerigo Vespucci.

From the first arrival of this accomplished lady on our shores, we did not cotton to her, as Fanny Kemble would say. We chronicled her movements, praised her beauty, talent and good sense, noticed all the civilities and hospitality with which she was greeted; but that "corner of land" she asked for, and the easy indifference with which she cast aside the liberal subscription made up for her equivalent to the value of the aforesaid corner of land, created a suspicion in our mind that she was not exactly what she represented herself to be.—Shakspeare says, and women also; and by this rule we should infer, all things duly considered, that Miss Vespucci's "corner of land" covered other objects somewhat of a political and personal character. We have not been much conversant with the gay licentiousness of the Court of France since the reign of Louis XV., and altho' in later periods there have been no Madame Pompadours or DeMaintenons, openly exercising influence in their Court circles, nevertheless that gay Court has not been without some scandal—the difference only has been a little more prudence and discretion in making particular displays. It was desirable that one of the Royal Dukes, which one we do not tax ourselves to remember, should form a matrimonial alliance with some Continental Princess, which has since taken place; and we are not without suspicion that Signora Vespucci was rather an obstacle, in some way, to that desirable alliance, and her absence became necessary. How to bring about that event was not a very easy task: on the Continent, or even in England, there was constant intercourse kept up; post offices and post chaises; rail roads and locomotives. America was somewhat more remote, and a capital excuse for a visit to the New World might be found in a claim for a corner of land, given to the descendant of one of the first discoverers of that aforesaid land.

"Men should be what they seem,"

Miss Vespucci arrives in this country; consigned to the polite attention of Mons. Pontois, the French Minister, and through him is introduced into the first society, dines with the President, chats with the Senators, takes tea with the ladies, and is the admired and courted guest of all the polite circles—the Minister's carriage is every day at her door,—and the newspapers teem with glowing descriptions of her beauty, taste and intelligence—the petition for the "corner of land," exceedingly well written, is presented to Congress—the lady travels through the Union, every where received with courtesy and great civility.—Congress, for constitutional reasons, cannot grant her that "corner of land," but a very liberal private subscription is made up for her in money.

Well, in the course of a short time, the Prince marries. Pointois, a gentleman of moderate political influence, is suddenly promoted to be Ambassador to Constantinople, a high diplomatic station, with great outfit and noble title. Miss Vespucci makes her curtesy to the American people, declines receiving their money, because it was not the gift of the nation, and sails off to Europe. Now, as our friend Paul Pry would say, this is "very mysterious" throughout. If Signora Vespucci had been animated by so much attachment to the country discovered by her illustrious ancestor, as to petition for a corner of land, and ask to become an American citizen, why not purchase and settle upon that land, when means to purchase had been so liberally extended to her? Why leave that dear and cherished land, first discovered by Vespucci, and return to dilapidated Europe, when here her path was strewn with roses, with open hands and confiding hearts? She is no doubt a very clever woman, who, having gone through the part assigned to her with a grace now returns home to obtain the reward. Some would call her an adventurer—others may doubt whether she had any claim at all to the name or origin of a Vespucci. We call her a skilful diplomatist, and Monsieur De Pointois a very successful Ambassador, who merits the kind consideration of Le Grand Monarque.

It would have been a rare joke, indeed, if Congress had been caught in the trap and granted her that "corner of land." Mr. Clay, we presume, soon ascertained that she had no intention to squat on our land at all, and must have had some inklings of her final destination.

We are a glorious people to be humbugged by titled foreigners, but on the whole we humbug them in our turn. We nibble at the tails of their nobility, and we make them pay for it in the end.—New York Star.

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in the city of New York, and devoted to Home and Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by PARK BENJAMIN.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant periodical sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 25.—The situation of New York, and its immense commercial intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intelligence received in our "great metropolis." Availing ourselves of the advantages derived from this source and many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper intended for "our country, our whole country"—warped by no sectional bias—controverting no man's political opinions—unsullied by any thing of an immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of such English works of value as may be conveniently embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of original matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from all the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly, the Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazines; Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, LaBelle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.

We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of three celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which a copyright is not attached.

The editor will especially aim to make The New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full accounts of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to OUR people; while they omit or neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.

We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which fall under the eye of the municipal police. We can see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No ludicrous accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal violations of social order by the ignorant and imbecile.

With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient, and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.

Price of The New World, THREE DOLLARS per annum, payable in advance.

All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

ECCLESIASTICAL.

Mr. Editor: A leading object, as I understood, in establishing your periodical, was to support the cause of Protestant Methodism in the west, and to take a firm stand against priestly domination, which, I am persuaded, has brought more nations into bondage, ignorance and superstition, than there are slave States in the Union.—"Undoubtedly, men are now constituted of the same materials they were centuries ago. It is therefore, no less true now, than ever, that power, when once acquired, is held with a tenacious grasp, and its tendency is to accumulate." When we see an assumption of irresponsible power, it is our duty to oppose it in every lawful way. I would, therefore, as heretofore, employ my humble abilities, and occasionally throw in a mite. What I now attempt, is to show, that in a certain ecclesiastical establishment in this land of civil liberty, very similar, if not quite the same principles and power, and practice are acted out, which were exhibited and exercised by the Roman Catholic priests, during many centuries past. I wish all who read the following comparison between the governmental principles of the Roman Catholic Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, not to infer that I believe either the ministers or members of the latter, to be as morally corrupt as those of the former. By no means. Yet, it should not be forgotten, that the Catholic Church was once as pure, if not purer, than the Methodist Church now is. Hence, "let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed, lest he fall." The priesthood of the Catholic Church, according to Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, aspired and continued to aspire for supremacy until they assumed prerogatives and practised abominations, for which, we know no parallel in any Protestant church, at the present day. But on this side of the water, we find, at least, nearly a parallel, as shall appear below:

A STRIKING ANALOGY.

1. It was about the middle of the second century, that by an aspiring priesthood, the laity were deprived of their rights in the church, and of that equality which had reigned in the primitive church, when, also, the priests declared that Christ had empowered them to prescribe to His church authoritative rules of faith and manners. See Mos. Eccl. His., vol. 1. cent. 2. A contest then commenced between the bishops for supremacy, and continued near five centuries, before the bisop of Rome prevailed, and assumed the title of Universal Bishop, Vicegerant of Christ, &c.

It was about half a century after the great revival and spread of the pure doctrines of the Gospel by the instrumentality of the Wesleys, when F. Asbury and T. Coke received the title of Bishop in North America, and with the itinerant ministers, (then few in number,) assumed exclusive control of the legislative, judicial and executive departments of the church, depriving the laity and local ministers of any the least participation in their general councils or Conferences. And what made this assumption of power the more glaring and presumptuous, it took place immediately after the blood of thousands had been poured out to gain civil liberty, and we may say, religious liberty also, a freedom from paying tithes to the priests of the established church. Yes, right on the back of the Declaration of Independence, that "all men are born free and equal."

2. This assumption by the pope, of dominion over the christian world, was in opposition to the will of hundreds and thousands of ministers and members of the Church of Rome.

So, the title and power of bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, has always been, and is still opposed by thousands of ministers and members of said church. The assumption of the title was most decidedly deprecated by Mr. J. Wesley, the reputed father of Methodism. In a letter to Mr. Asbury, he says, "How can you, how dare you suffer yourself to be called BISHOP. Men may call me a knave, fool, rascal, scoundrel, and I am content, but they shall never, with my consent, call me Bishop." See Moore's Life of Wesley, Book Agents Edition, New York, 1826, vol. 2, p. 202.

3. The pope, after assuming these high prerogatives, took it upon himself to appoint all the cardinals. These represent him wherever he sends them, and they are bound to support his authority and interest, or soon be deprived of their office.

So soon as Mr. Asbury assumed the high title of bishop, he began to exercise his power in appointing all the Presiding Elders, who represent the bishop wherever he sends them; and they are bound to support his authority and interest, or would be liable soon, to lose their office. These Presiding Elders answer to cardinals in the other church.

4. The pope, we have said, exercises the exclusive power of appointing the cardinals. When St. Peter's chair is vacated by death, the cardinals in turn, appoint a pope. So, the pope appoints the cardinals and the cardinals appoint the popes.

The bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church appoint the Presiding Elders, and we may say, that for a number of years past, the Presiding Elders have appointed the bishops, for they are elected at the General Conference, and that body is composed of a large majority of Presiding Elders.

5. The pope is elected for life.

So are the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, unless expelled.

6. To whom is the pope amenable for his official acts? Answer. To no one, we suppose, for he claims infallibility.

To whom are the Methodist bishops amenable? Answer. Not to the people, but to the General Conference, and that body, as above stated, is composed of a majority of officers of their own appointing. Query. Does this differ much from appointing their own court? If not, then it cannot differ much from their being amenable to none.

7. Is any grade of the priesthood in the Church of Rome amenable to the laity for their moral or official acts? Answer. No. They are responsible only to the pope and his priestly tribunals.

Is any grade of the itinerant ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church amenable to the laity or local ministers? Answer. They are responsible alone to the Annual and General Conferences. In neither of these assemblies have the laity or local ministry any seat or voice, directly or remotely, though the local minister may have been a travelling minister for forty years.

8. To whom are the laity accountable for their words and deeds in the Church of Rome? Answer. To the priesthood alone. They can expel whom they please, and retain whom they please, for they profess to have the keys and power to bind and loose on earth.

To whom are the laity and local ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church accountable?—Answer. To the travelling preachers, or in other words, to the bishop's agents. It is the duty of the preacher in charge to "receive, try and expel members, according to the form of discipline." He can appeal from the decision of the class, or of a committee of his own appointing, to the quarterly conference; and there by his influence on the majority, who are of his own appointing, (I mean class leaders,) he can carry his point, either to expel or retain. See Discipline chap. 1, sec. 9, chap. 2, sec. 7. Moreover, the writer of this has heard one of these St. Peters say, in preaching at a camp-meeting, Brother Preachers, we have got the keys, and let us keep them.

9. On the trial of heretics in the Church of Rome, the bishops or inquisitors would alternately persuade and threaten, flatter and threaten, promise pardon, and threaten with fire and faggot, those who were brought before them, charged with departure from the faith. See Fox's Book of Martyrs.

A very similar course was pursued by the authorities of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the prosecutions had a few years since against many in Baltimore, Cincinnati and elsewhere, for their opposition to the assumptions of the itinerant priesthood.

10. The priests of the Church of Rome, independent of the people, appoint all the officers of the church, whether to a spiritual or temporal concern.

So the bishop or their agents, appoint or nominate all the officers in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

11. The pope of Rome claims a divine right to expound the holy scriptures, and he says that no man has a right to expound them in a different way. See Miller's Church History.

The bishops and their subordinate ministers, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, claim also, the right to expound the holy scriptures. In a Report adopted by the General Conference at Pittsburgh, in 1828, in reply to Petitions and Memorials from local ministers and laymen, they say: "The Great Head of the church Himself has imposed on US the duty of preaching the gospel, of administering its ordinances, and of maintaining its moral discipline among those over whom the Holy Ghost, in these respects, has made us overseers. Of these also, viz: of gospel doctrines, ordinances and moral discipline, we do believe that the divinely instituted ministry are the DIVINELY AUTHORIZED EXPOUNDERS, and that the duty of maintaining them in their purity, and not permitting our ministrations in these respects to be authoritatively controlled by others, does rest upon us with the force of a moral obligation, in the due discharge of which, our consciences are involved." Let the reader examine and compare, and decide how nearly this is equal to the pretensions of the vicegerant of Christ.

12. The pope and priesthood of the Church of Rome, assume the right to legislate, to judge and execute their laws upon all their members, (more properly subjects,) independent of their voice or consent.

The bishops and travelling preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, have assumed the right, and still tenaciously hold to the authority as of divine appointment, to legislate, judge and enforce their laws and rules upon the local ministers and members, (more properly subjects,) throughout their dominions.

13. The Church of Rome has in force a gag law, for the punishment of any who may dare say any thing against the Holy Mother, or the power of the pope or priesthood.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church has also enacted a gag law, for the purpose of silencing or excluding any who may object to their high prerogatives, or inveigh against their doctrine or discipline. Dis. ch. 2, sec. 7. One of the editors of the Christian Advocate and Journal has published to the world the following sentiment: "As long as these officers of Christ, (meaning the travelling preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church,) move in obedience to his will, i. e. remain good men, so long the people are bound to submit to their authority, in all matters of church government and discipline. Those restless spirits who rebel againt the order God hath established, rebel against God, and shall receive their own punishment. This is not pleading for submission to man, it is the authority of God. This is the order He hath established." We would ask, what becomes of the divine authority implied above, when a travelling preacher locates?

14. The Roman priests sit in judgment upon all cases of offence. From Fox's Book of Martyrs, it appears that the accusations against heretics usually consist of inveighing against some doctrine or tradition of the priesthood, and that the accused are condemned if they refuse to comply with the order of the Holy Mother.

Let the reader compare the manner of proceeding against Luther, Huss, Wickliffe and thousands more, with the manner and spirit of the proceedings had against Reformers in Baltimore, Lynchburgh, Cincinnati and other places. And though the punishment of burning, &c., could not be inflicted in this blessed land of liberty, the very same intolerant, persecuting spirit is manifest. The proceedings were instituted upon the same grounds, and the charges were the same in substance, to wit, rebelling against priestly domination, and contending for mutual rights, liberty of speech, liberty of conscience and liberty of the press.

15. The priests of the Church of Rome dreaded the circulation of books, periodicals and public discourses, which exhibited their superstitious idolatry and assumption of power over the rights of the people, and many were punished even unto death, for taking part in these matters.

Nothing is more dreaded by the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church and their agents, than the publication of periodicals and public discourses on the subject of church government, exhibiting the undue prerogatives of the hierarchy. It was for these crimes, that so many, both ministers and members, were excluded in various places as above mentioned. The Episcopal Methodist preachers have almost invariably refused to hold public debates with Reform preachers, on the subject of church government. And, we have been entreated by many: "O, now, say nothing of church government in public." Now, I ask, if the government be so good, (as some have said it is the best in the world,) why so fearful of its being brought before the public?

16. The Roman priests claim the power to pardon penitent heretics and restore them to the bosom of the church, who will but confess, recant and promise allegiance to the pope, &c.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Pittsburgh, May, 1828, in view of the cases of the expelled brethren, adopted a resolution specifying, in substance, that any who have been thus expelled should be pardoned and restored to the bosom of the church, on condition of confessing their sin, promising to meet no more with the Union Society, nor print, nor patronize any periodical work on the subject of church government. This Resolution was published with the Report of said General Conference, above referred to, in the Christian Advocate and Journal. But these terms were rejected by the expelled brethren, and of course, they remain "bound on earth."

17. Every possible stratagem, and policy, and argument is used by the Roman priests to defeat Reform and strengthen the old hierarchy. False reports have been gotten up and circulated, and a liberal use made of the epithets, heretic, rebel, backslider, scismatic, liar, &c.

Has not the same course of policy and false intrigue been pursued in many instances by travelling preachers in the M. E. Church to defeat and suppress Reform? How repeatedly have they reported such veritable intelligence as the following; "O, it is nothing but an O'Kelly scrape, or Burk scrape. It is all coming to nothing—they are all coming back. Some of their leading men, A— S——, &c., have come back." Now, all this and much more of the like, shows clearly that they wish our downfal and extinction as anxiously as the Roman Catholic priests wish the extinction of all Protestant churches, in order that they may reign without a rival in the earth.

18. The Roman priests would never suffer a Protestant minister to preach in any of their churches.

The Episcopal Methodist preachers would in no instance, we believe, for a considerable time suffer Reformers to occupy their pulpits. And in many places they still withhold the privilege, although we preach the same doctrines. The writer of this was, as lately as last summer, more than once refused the use of their houses. The trustees have their orders doubtless, from their masters, and sometimes grant leave on condition that we hold our peace on the subject of church government.

19. The pope of Rome has the control and oversight of all the temporal and spiritual business of the church.

In like manner the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church are instructed in Discipline, chap. 1, sec. 4, "to oversee" (and a senior bishop has some time since decided that to oversee is to overrule) "the spiritual and temporal business of the church."

20. The Church of Rome boasts of her vast numbers, one hundred and seventy millions.

In like manner the Episcopal Methodist preachers continually boast of their numbers and use it as a solid argument for the excellence of their governmental system. If this argues well for them, it does still better for the Catholics, their number being much the greater. But by the by, it is evident that very few join the church with a knowledge of the governmental principles. If the preachers, when they open the door for reception of members, would be honest enough to let the people know their power, and the humble submission to their authority which must be shown by all who join them, we doubt if they would get many more.

21. Through the plans and schemes of the priesthood of the Church of Rome, that church has become immensely rich, and it is said she is still increasing in wealth.

The ministry of the M. E. Church have under their control a number of rich funds, and some plan always on foot to get more of the people's money, all to be at their disposal, of course.

22. The church property in the Church of Rome is all under the control of the priesthood, though bought and built with the people's money.

In like manner all church property in the M. E. Church, is according to direction in Discipline, deeded to "trustees, in trust—for the use of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America." Now, we ask, who compose this M. E. Church in the U. S. of America? Answer. Those, and those only, who had a voice in the organization thereof under the title of Methodist Episcopal Church, and their successors in conferences composed of travelling ministers with the bishops at the head. For it is an universally received political maxim in both civil and religious bodies, that no man can be a member of any body-politic unless he has a voice in making the laws or rules for its government, of course, we should say, can have no legal claim to property deeded thereto, though he may have given his money for the procuring of that property. Many other proofs might be adduced, from the deed itself, and from the many contentions by the preachers for church property, as also the bishops' authority to overrule all the temporals as well as spirituals of the church. But the conclusion is already abundantly evident that the property belongs to the masters and lords, and not to the subjects.

ANTI-POPERY.

For the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: When I replied, in your 32d No. to Mr. Dalbey, of Pittsburgh, I did not think it would be necessary for me to say any thing more upon the subject of our question. But he has again so perverted me in his late reply that I feel constrained to make one more effort to get the subject out of the "fog." Here is an instance. Says he:

"My only object in writing on the slavery question at first, was to record my testimony against it; in this my friend Smith thought me imprudent, and therefore proceeded to administer his fatherly corrections."

Now, the fair inference from this is, that I opposed his recording or bearing his testimony against slavery, and of course that I wished to bind up his conscience to my own standard. Let us quote from the article to which he refers, and see if this inference is warranted. Here it is:

"My attention was directed to a communication from Mr. Dalbey, from Pittsburgh, which was as perfectly an uncalled for thing as I have lately noticed. If the gentleman wishes to be an abolitionist, it is undoubtedly his privilege to be one; if he desired to make a public avowal of his principles,—why did he not unite with an abolition society and deliver a speech upon the subject? [Or write a communication, if he wanted it recorded, to the Philanthropist?] This, I should have supposed would have satisfied any man's conscience. But to proclaim himself through your columns in the manner he did, went to make an impression throughout the community that he had became heated on the subject of abolition, and of course, would be calculated to provoke against him that prejudice which exists in the public mind against abolitionists, and so far close the door against his usefulness."

It is clear from this, and the whole tenor of my article, that I did not object to his recording his testimony against slavery, but to his manner of doing it. I thought it was a mark of indiscreton, in him, to wish to press the Recorder into this exciting controversy, because it had another interest equally important to serve. And I also thought his advertising himself in your paper, evinced much imprudence, because it circulates throughout the field of his labor, and would provoke against him the prejudice of those opposed to the abolitionists, and thus hinder his usefulness in the cause that it is his prominent duty to serve.

The way the gentleman excuses himself for not attending to my main difficulty is rather laughable than otherwise. He informs me he was of opinion that that part of my communication which related to political abolitionism, was designed for the Rev. J. Clarke, and not for him. The priests often ironize us laymen for our charity; they say when we hear them deliver the lessons of duty, that we are so charitable as to give all to our neighbors and take none to ourselves. It would seem from this specimen that the priests can very adroitly do the same thing; for nothing else but a very great stretch of charity could have made such an inference as the above.

After thus apologizing for his neglect, he attempts at last to meet the main question; that is, he attempts to shew that ministers and the religious press might take a part in certain questions should they even assume a political aspect, but he looses the whole subject in a very dense "fog." If we understand his twisted up paragraph he makes two arguments, 1st, should politicians interfere with the rites and obligations of religion, he thinks they ought to be resisted by the ministry and the religious press, though they had connected religion with politics. If ever politicians should interfere with the duties of religion and conscience, they assuredly ought to be resisted,—but how?—by the weapons of truth, firmness and christian forbearance. Not by getting up a set of candidates for office, and thus bringing the Church in political contact with the State. This would be going into the devil's own territory to fight him, instead of keeping upon gospel ground.

His second argument, if we understand him, is, in substance, that slavery is a moral question, and therefore a subject on which the Church and State might unite. A moral question indeed! Has the gentleman not yet learned that nearly all political questions are moral questions? The politician, or jurist, has to do with the rights of men, the moralist, or divine, with the duties of men. Every right has its correspondent duty, and every duty has its correspondent right,—duty and right are intimately connected, and bear the relation of debt and credit. It has been made a question by politicians, whether a man should be imprisoned for debt. If man has a right to his personal liberty under all circumstances, then, it is the politician's duty to throw off his shackles and let him go free; free from prison, free from servitude. It has also been made a question, whether a man's life should be taken for any capital offence whatever. If man has a right to his life under all circumstances, except when taken away by the act of God who gave it, then it is the duty of the politician to abolish the law which inflicts capital punishment. Now, suppose the churches were all to unite in asking the public authorities to repeal the laws which inflict death for capital crimes, and after teasing candidates for office with a thousand perplexing questions, relating to the matter, finding they were not likely to succeed, should ultimately get up a set of officers who would carry out their designs, and put the religious press and all ecclesiastical councils in requisition to sustain their election. Would this be right? Sure the question is a moral one, and one too of a higher grade than the question of personal liberty, because it involves life and death. If the gentleman answers this question affirmatively, he then throws down all the barriers between Church and State, if negatively he decides against his own argument. The shifts that abolitionists make to try to get out of this predicament is not very complimentary to their heads or hearts, one or the other.

The worthy gentleman still evinces a disposition to make me out an infidel. He fixes upon my expression "convert to christianity," and after wresting my meaning, and giving it one to suit his own purpose, insinutes again that I must be an infidel. As I was writing to a Methodist I used the term "conversion" in a Methodistic sense. The Methodist clergy are always talking about converting people to Christ, or christianity, but they are not understood to mean that these people were all previously infidels, but that they were not in possession of experimental religion. Now, I think, my worthy friend, you ought to be ashamed of this kind of quibbling. It shews you are rather hard run for objections when you have to seek them in this way. I by no means claim an exemption from error, or deny that I am deficient in many duties, but it does not well comport wrth the character of the New Testament for a minister of the gospel to put the most illiberal constructions upon his words, so as to make his neighbor out worse than he really is. I can see no other motive he has in this matter, but to bring on me the suspicion of infidelity, so as to destroy the force of my arguments. Such, should it be his motive, is nothing more than real political trickery.

Again, when I offered the opinion that the church would do well to let the gentleman "beat the brush awhile," he almost raises the murder shout, and cries out "Spanish inquisition!"—Be easy, my friend,—all I meant, is, that the church would do well to attend to the principle of rotine in office or to privilege. I read of one of your brethren shouting from the top of the mountains, and of another being stationed beyond where the bears live; and I simply, sir, gave it as my opinion that the church ought to let you take your turn in "beating the brush;" that to give you an opportunity of breathing the pure mountain air awhile might have a salutary influence in regulating your temperament, as you had become an agitator. And pray, what tyranny was there in this? Why should you not take your turn of the harder appointments with your brethren? Ah! sir, take care, I am somewhat afraid, though you may not even be conscious of it, that under all this flouncing there is a secret desire for privilege and promotion; or why should you thus treat a proposition, which required of you no more than to take your equal share of ministerial toils, with the cry of oppression? As it respects the charge of my being ignorant of your Discipline; it is not to be expected that I have the same opportunity, with yourself, of understanding all its practical operations.

In reply to my charge of his becoming a partyman, he responds that he belongs to the "Methodist party." Indeed! And how much better, pray, are they than other parties? As it respects the Methodist authorities you propose parading, if this controversy should continue, you can save yourself the trouble, for we have all seen them a dozen times. Besides, they are entirely irrevalent to this subject. The abstract principles of slavery is not the question in controversy; about these, if I understand the thing, we are agreed. It is about political action in churches that we differ. If you can furnish any instance where Mr. Wesley used the pulpit, the religious press or his ecclesiastical councils, to promote the election of civil officers, that would be directly to the point.

In conclusion, let us see again where we differ. The gentleman thinks there is little or no difference between us, yet he has written a long article in reply to me. But he has attributed to me sentiments which I did not avow, and then employed himself in answering them. He has been engaged at what some call fighting phantoms. The main difference, if I understand it, between us, is, that he considers the ministry and the church have a right, and that it is their duty, in their official capacity, to do all they can to promote the interest of the present abolition enterprize.

Here we are fairly at issue. When this abolition question was first started, it was proposed to succeed by moral suasion, and the charge of political designs was repulsed with much apparent indignation, as a slander upon the enterprize. While it retained this ground, it was a fit subject for the minister and the religious press. But the inefficacy of moral suasion was ultimately discovered, and the Anti-Slavery Society passed a resolution to question all candidates for office upon their abolition faith, and to vote for them, irrespective of parties, who would return favorable answers. After this, the abolition press was filled with political action. Now, this resolution fairly identified the abolition question with politics. But still farther, a convention was called this spring, for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of organizing a distinct political party. I believe most of the States that had formed abolition societies were represented in this convention; they have agreed on separate political action, and now have their candidates in the field. It is true, we are told by those abolition papers, who find themselves pressed with this difficulty, that the Anti-Slavery Society had nothing to do with this convention more than with the political convention at Baltimore. &c. I reply to this; first, that the act of this convention was of higher authority, than such an act would have been at an ordinary meeting of the society, because the convention was called for the special purpose of considering that very question; secondly, it was only carrying out the act of the Anti-Slavery Society above referred to,—beside, there is no act of the Anti-Slavery Society, protesting against it; nor do I hear much objection in private; but all seem to think that abolition must ultimately assume that attitude.

Now, after all this, to say that the Anti-Slavery Society has not abandoned its original ground, is assuredly disingenuous. If it has not forsaken its original position, and assumed a political phases, I must confess that I am not capable of knowing white from black. Those abolition papers which require us to believe that all things remain as they were at the beginning, certainly presume a good deal upon our credulity.

But this changing the attitude of the Anti-Slavery enterprize, I admit, does not alter the moral nature of the question. It only changes the medium through which we are to operate.—We are not permited, now, through our official ecclesiastical organs, to act upon the subject, without contravening the spirit of our American institutions, and doing violence to public opinion, though each citizen retains the right to operate politically, or through the government, in any way he may think proper. We are not prohibited action, but we are to act as citizens and not as religionists.

To sum up our difference in a word; I think Mr. D. wrong in meddling with exciting questions, foreign from his main duty. I also think him wrong in requiring the religious press to serve a political cause, but, as he remarks, hope that we shall still feel that we are friends.

Very respectfully, in much haste, &c.,

J. SMITH.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

PLEASANT HILL, O., MAY 16, 1840.

Brother Springer: Our third quarterly meeting for this circuit is just closed.—We were favored with the labors of Bro. Brown which proved profitable to the meeting; one antinomian was completely striped of his principles. A sinner who was thought to be gospel hardened was converted, and he and his wife joined the church. We received at this meeting ten on probation.

Since my last, we held a protracted meeting at Hartwood meeting house.—Eleven were received at this meeting, making in all, since conference, one hundred. To God be all the glory.

Your excellent paper has been very useful among us this year. I have no doubt but the cheering intelligence it communicates throughout the district, has had a fine influence in promoting the work of God. Now, as our people are well pleased to have such a medium of intelligence, they ought to do their best to sustain you. I hope to be able, from my circuit, to make a return of all the subscription money for the Recorder, perhaps upwards of $60, before conference. Yours, in Christ,

THOMAS FOSTER, Sup't.

N. B. Brother Clancy will please excuse me for not attending his quarterly meeting, as our quarterly conference has so changed my rout on this circuit that it will be impracticable. T. F.

RUMLEY, SHELBY, O., May 18, 1840.

Brother Springer: We have not that pleasing intelligence to communicate from Miami circuit, that we see from other places, though we are not discouraged. We held a two day meeting on the 11th and 12th of April, at which we had the Divine presence and some good appeared to be done. We held another on Panther creek, second and third of May, at which the word was made powerful to sinners while believers rejoiced.

I have just returned from our third quarterly meeting, on Leatherwood, Seneca county, at which we were favored with the labors of Brothers Guest and D. H. Stephens. They labored faithfully, and I hope the seed sown will produce much fruit.

We have had some additions to the church this year, and have general peace among brethren. Yours, &c.

JOHN PARKE.

SHELBY CO. O., MAY 19, 1840.

Brother Springer: Our third quarterly meeting in Springfield station closed the 11th inst. It was a very profitable meeting, though no accession to the church.

I expect, no preventing providence, to commence a protracted meeting in Springfield the third day of July next. The aid of Brothers Hunt, Moore, Paul, Barnes of Cincinnati, Clemens, Little, Dalbey and Hibben is urgently solicited. Our fourth quarterly meeting is to embrace the first Lord's day in August next. We wish the brethren to bear this in mind also.

Yours, &c. D. H. STEPHENS.

To the President of the Pitt'gh. District.

LIGONIER MISSION, MAY 16, 1840.

Dear Brother: As much of the year has passed without your receiving any information from me, with regard to this mission, I will now drop you a few lines.—We arrived here about the middle of October and found three societies, but two of them were in a disorganized state. Finding that we had the number of societies and members required by our Discipline to hold a quarterly conference, we accordingly appointed our first. This meeting was held in Nov'r., at Knox's school house, at which, we had the assistance of brothers Hazlett and Turner. At this meeting we had no accession to the church; but several who had joined the church under conviction experienced religion.

During the winter, we made but little progress; but since the spring has commenced, we have been greatly blessed. We have lately held two protracted meetings, at which, we have beheld a display of the goodness of our heavenly Father, in the conviction and conversion of sinners. At the first, which was held at Knox's school house, we had the assistance of Bro. Robison. The fruits of this revival were fifteen added to the church. The last of the above meetings which was our third quarterly meeting, was held at Stallstown, where there has been a spiritual dearth. At this meeting we had the assistance of Bro. Shearer, and best of all the presence of our Master. Though we commenced this meeting under unfavorable circumstances, it ended well. Several, we trust, were converted,—five were added to the church.

At this place we have met with much opposition of late, but the Lord has graciously acknowledged us, and if He is for us, why need we care who is against us? Our present prospects are quite encouraging. We have taken in several new appointments, and at some of them, we hope soon, to raise societies. Our last quarterly conference determined that we should hold a camp meeting, at which, we hope, that we shall have your presence. As you have not yet visited us, we shall be glad if you can do so at that time; if not, any other will be acceptable.

I remain your brother in Christ,

W. W. TIPTON.

WESTERN RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

WEDNESDAY, ... JUNE 3, 1840.

A TORNADO IN MISSOURI.—A violent tornado recently occurred in Washington county, Missouri. The log cabins of the inhabitants were torn up and scattered; one little boy who was playing near his father's house, was taken up and thrown against a tree with so much violence that his brains were dashed out.

THE NATCHEZ TORNADO.—The Louisville Journal states that the family of Mr. H. P. Postlethwaite was preserved in this singular way: one of the children became frantic or alarmed and ran into the cellar—the other members of the family followed, and just as they all reached the cellar the house was blown off. The family of Mr. Watt of the firm of Burke, Watt & Co. were accidentally led to leave the dinner table and go out in the yard, and instantly the room they had left was blown down.

The Journal adds:

It is stated that many persons were blown from the streets into the river.—How far the ravages of this storm extended we did not learn. Some say, that it was not felt in its greatest violence any where but in and near Natchez; but this is hardly probable. At Napoleon, Arkansas, 24 hours after the storm at Natchez, a house was blown down and a flat boat sunk with 5 men. A gentleman informs us, that he saw the ravages of a recent tornado above Vicksburgh, and conjectures that it was the same storm. At 5 o'clock on the day following there was a violent hail storm in Louisville, which passed through Frankfort.

The Globe says the terrible tornado which destroyed Natchez, is, we lament to find, described in private letters received in this city, as having been more destructive than the particulars in the newspaper indicate.

TORNADO AT NATCHEZ.—Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Natchez to his friend in Philadelphia, dated Natchez, May 8, 1840.

The horrid account I gave in mine of yesterday of the awful destruction by the tornado, which swept over this city, cannot convey to you any idea of the devastation that has been occasioned by it.—Natchez is overwhelmed—the whole lower town is gone, except Sands cotton, and T. M. Falconer's store. The loss of life in that quarter has been great—the extensive buildings of the Rail Road Company are a heap of ruins; so is also the greater part of the town. The light-house, and dwellings around it, with the Planter's Hotel on the bluff, were blown tirely away. I stood upon an eminence this morning, overlooking the whole city. The sight was heart rending; and it presented, in comparison, as dismal a picture as did New York, after the memorable fire of 1835.

While I write, the town bell is ringing, to assemble the citizens, for the purpose of deliberating upon what course of action may be best to be pursued. The people are houseless: Berlow's Hotel is like an hospital. I have been there; and have witnessed the excruciating pain of poor fellows undergoing surgical operations, in the extraction of splinters from their bodies, setting of limbs, &c. The sight of crushed bodies—the moans of the wounded—the passing by of coffins—and the universal desolation—presents a distressing aspect, and I am perfectly unmanned. It would seem that the hand of Almighty God had fallen upon the South! One scourge follows another, in sad reverse,—and in addition to this fearful calamity, the inhabitants on the other side of the river are apprehending still further devastation, in a threatened overflowing of the river; which is very high, and still rising. Such was the ruin at the landing, "under the hill," that when the boat arrived, at 4 this morning, they all on board supposed they had not reached Natchez. All the New Yorkers here are safe. The plantations around the city are uninjured. With praiseworthy alacrity, many wealthy men, such as Colonel Bingham and others, have repaired to the city with their large gangs of slaves, and are clearing the streets of trees and timbers. You can judge of the force of the storm when I tell you that Parker's Exchange, with brick walls at least thirty inches thick, is crumbled to a mass.

TREMENDOUS EXPLOSION.—A little before twelve o'clock, on last Wednesday night, the citizens of Alton were aroused from their slumbers by an explosion incomparably louder, as well as by far more destructive, than the discharge of one hundred pieces of the heaviest ordnance. Hundreds immediately hurried towards State street, from the direction of which the report seemed to have proceeded; when it was ascertained that it was occasioned by the blowing up of the Powder Magazine, situated on the southern declivity of the bluff, a few rods west of the Penitentiary, and containing at the time upwards of six tons of powder. To describe with some degree of minuteness the damage done by this catastrophe, would fill several columns of our journal. Suffice it, therefore, to remark, in general terms, that scarcely one single building, within the thickly settled part of the city, remains uninjured; and that some of those nearest the site of the magazine have been literally reduced to a heap of ruins. Chimnies demolished—roofs started, and nearly blown off—windows and window frames shivered to atoms—are among the results of the explosion.—But, although fragments of the stones of which the magazine had been constructed were hurled with resistless force in every direction, some of them to the distance of upwards of a mile, perforating houses, and overthrowing every thing which stood in their way, no life has been lost, nor, so far as our information extends, has any serious injury been done to the person of any one.

Of the many hair-breadth escapes which have come to our knowledge, we may briefly notice the following.—Mr. J. H. HODGES and his wife were sleeping in their house on Market street, about one-third of a mile from the magazine. A piece of stone, supposed to weigh about fifty pounds perforated the roof of their dwelling; and forcing its way through the garret floor, descended in a slanting direction within a few inches of their heads, and broke through the partition into an adjoining room without doing either of them the least injury.—Mrs. Tomlinson and her daughter were in like manner asleep in the same bed at their residence on Third street, having between them a child about two years old—belonging to a gentleman of this place who had lost his wife—of whom Mrs. T. was taking care. Seeing the flash, the worthy woman, alarmed for the safety of her precious charge, immediately snatched it up and hugged it to her bosom; when a heavy stone, bursting through the building, fell between mother and daughter, in the very place previously occupied by the child, without touching either of them. Another large fragment of stone forced its way in like manner through the building occupied by the family of Mr. T. Clifford, on State street, and fell in the corner of a lower room where his children had slept for several months past; but his wife, by some unaccountable impulse, having moved their bed a few hours previously to a different part of the house, they all escaped unhurt.—Two young girls, whose names we have not heard, were also sleeping in the same bed, in another part of the city, when a heavy stone fell immediately between them, slightly grazing the limbs of one, but inflicting no material injury on either.

The belief universally prevails that the explosion was the work of some desperate villian or villians; but although every exertion has been used for the detection of the perpetrators, they still remain undiscovered. Two individuals were taken up on suspicion on Wednesday; but discharged after having been subjected to a rigid examination—no evidence, sufficient to justify their detention, being brought forward against them. It will be observed, by an advertisement in another column, that a reward of $500 has been offered by the Common Council for the apprehension and conviction of the offenders.— The damages done to buildings and other property by the explosion are estimated at not less than $25,000.—Alton, Ill. Telegraph, May 23.

THE CHINESE AND THE BRITISH.—The Effects of Opium.—We look with deep anxiety for further details from China, in relation to the difficulty between that power and the British authorities. According to our last advices, the British superintendent had determined upon a blockade, which was about to be carried into effect. A powerful force was also expected from India; and should the Chinese persist in their efforts, something like war will be the inevitable consequence. The general opinion in this country is, that the Chinese, although one of the most ancient nations on the earth, and certainly one of the most populous, are but little acquainted with the arts of war, and unable to stand up and contend with anything like success against British power. In contrast with this notion, we may direct attention to a statement recently made by Sir James Graham in the House of Commons.—He described the Chinese empire, as inhabited by 350,000,000 of human beings, all directed by the will of one man, all speaking one language, all governed by one code of laws, all professing one religion, all actuated by the same feelings of national pride and prejudice, tracing their origin not by centuries but by tens of centuries, transmitted to them in regular succession under a patriarchal government without interruption; and boasting of their education, of their printing, of their civilization, of the art, "the conveniences, and many of the luxuries of life existing there, when Europe was still sunk in barbarism, and when the light of knowledge was obscure in the western hemisphere. But, apart from their numbers, apart from what he had mentioned with respect to that unity which was strength, he called the attention of the House to their immense wealth. They possessed an annual revenue of £30,000,000, regularly collected; they had no debt, they inhabited the largest and fairest portion of Asia; more than one-third of that country they cultivated, under the finest climate, unwearied industry, the soil most fertile was watered by vast rivers, and intersected by a canal 1,200 miles in length, one of the standing wonders of the world; and in every portion of that immense empire there was one uniformity of system, one jealous suspicion of strangers, evinced both on the shores of the Yellow Sea and all along on the confines of Ava, Nepaul, and Bokhara.—Surely, then, he was justified in the outset in asking, the House whether it was not wiser to trade than to quarrel with such a people—whether it was not better to conciliate them by the arts of peace than to vex them with the threats and cruelties of war?"

Despite all this, however, we incline to the opinion that China will speedily yield. We nevertheless believe that Great Britain is engaged in a work of gross moral wrong, and that she is so engaged in violation of the opinions and feelings of a large portion of her own population.—The Opium Trade is justly considered as only inferior in iniquity to the Slave Trade; and the conduct of the Chinese in endeavoring to suppress it, is entitled to the approbation of every Christain on the face of the earth. As early as 1834 the Chinese Government prohibited the trade in opium, took strong measures to suppress it, and thus concluded their edict of prohibition:—

"Let the Hong merchants likewise be commanded to enjoin commands on the English barbarian merchants, that they are mutually to examine and inquire, and that if one vessel smuggle and evade the duties, all the vessels shall be immediately prohibited trading; that thus they may themselves be caused severally to investigate and adopt preventive measures, which will be a plan more sure and perfect."

The result of this difficulty may, however, prove seriously important. A radical English paper, in adverting to the subject, holds this language.—Sir Robert Peel's statement of the dreadful extent of demoralization in the interior of China, produced by this infernal traffic, ought to make a strong impression on our countrymen. When the Chinese connived at this trade it was in its infancy, and confined to one seaport. Latterly it was carried into the rivers far up the country and became every where an intolerable nuisance. Lord Palmerston treats the subject with indecent levity. He considers it as a bullion question arising out of the alarm of the Chinese Government at the export of silver in payment for the opium. He further states that the Chinese themselves begin to cultivate the poppy, and that their law against the trade is a sort of corn law passed in order to protect the home grower.—Whether all this, or any part of this, be true or not, has nothing whatever to do with the question, for we have no right to violate their laws of trade, whatever they may be. What should we feel if the French or Russians seriously advanced a claim of right to import corn into England, because our Corn Laws were palpably founded upon unjust principles. The war may be very serious to us, for although the Chinese may be impotent the contest may involve us in quarrels with the Burmese, the Americans and Russians, as well as the Persians. It is unsafe as it is disgraceful to provoke a war with a foreign power on a calculation that they are unable to resist our strength.

"Those who begin its use at twenty may expect to die at thirty years of age.—The countenance becomes pallid, the eyes assume a wild brightness, the memory fails, the gait totters. mental and moral courage sinks, and frightful marasmus or atrophy reduces the victim to a ghastly spectacle, who has ceased to live before he has ceased to exist. There is no slavery so complete as that of the opium-taker; once habituated to its doses as a fictitious stimulant, every thing will be endured rather than the privation; and the unhappy being endures all the consciousness of his own degraded state, while he is ready to sell his wife and children, body and soul, for the continuance of his wretched and transient delight—transient, indeed—for, at length, the utmost effect produced is a temporary suspension of agony; and finally, no dose of the drug will remove or relieve a suffering which it is utterly impossible to describe. The pleasurable sensations and imaginative ideas arising at first soon pass away: they become fainter, and at last give place to horrid dreams, appalling pictures of death, spectres of fearful visage haunt the mind, the light of heaven is converted into the gloom of hell—sleep, balmy sleep, has fled for ever—night succeeds day only to be clothed with never-ending horrors, incesant sickness, vomiting, diarrhœa, and total cessation of the digestive functions ensue, and death at last brings with it annihilation of the corporeal structure, the sole relief to the victim of sensual and criminal indulgence."—Bicknell.

THE CASE OF MRS. GENERAL GAINES.—We find the following particulars of this interesting case in the New Orleans Bulletin:

This was a suit brought by the complainants for the estate of Daniel Clark, deceased and devised by him to his only child Myra Clark, the wife of Gen. Gaines, by virtue of his last will, dated in July, 1813, against Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, the pretended executors of the said Clark, under a revoked will, dated in May, 1811—a will hastily made on the occasion of his having determined on a sea voyage, and revoked by his will of July, 1813.

The documentary evidence, with the testimony of several respectable witnesses, clearly established the will of 1813, its existence up to the time of Mr. Clark's death, and of the mysterious disappearance of that will, while Richard Relf had improperly possessed himself, at the moment of Daniel Clark's death, of the key of the case where the said last will was deposited, and soon afterwards produced the will of 1811, had it probated, and under it, disposed of and preyed upon, and continued to dispose of and prey upon, the vast estate of Daniel Clark, testator, for near a quarter of a century. For near twenty years of that time the lawful heiress, Myra Clark, resided in and near the city of Philadelphia, in the family of Colonel and Mrs. Davis, as their daughter, under the name of Myra Davis, ignorant of her real name, parentage and rights, until the twenty-fourth year of her age, when Colonel Davis apprised her of these important facts. After this discovery she married Mr. W. W. Whitney, who in taking legal measures to recover her estate, was thrown into prison, and otherwise persecuted with a fury worthy of a Spanish inquisition, until he lost his life. This persecution was continued against the widowed Myra and her orphan children until they and their sufferings were made known to Gen. Gaines who in his youth, and upon his first visit to Louisiana, in 1793, had enjoyed the friendship of her father. In his efforts to learn from her how he could best contribute to vindicate her rights, he made to her proposals of marriage, which were accepted. The evidence and the law were ably and eloquently summoned up and presented to the court by her counsel, Grymes, Chinn, and Peyton, and by Mr. McHenry on the part of the defendants. The decree of the court fully sustained the rights of the plaintiff under the will of 1813, and ordered that the property sold under the will of 1811 should be restored to Myra Clark Gaines the only child of Daniel Clark, and his legitimate and lawful heiress.

We have already stated that since the Canal and Rail Road connections between Baltimore and the Pennsylvania works have been completed, an active competition has been maintained by the several Lines engaged in the transportation business between Baltimore and Pittsburgh and that the rates of freight had been materially reduced. Those who will take the trouble to refer to the advertisements in this paper will find that goods and merchandize are now transported from Baltimore to Pittsburgh at much cheaper rates than they are conveyed from Philadelphia to the same place. In order to prove this, we place in parallel colums the rates of the Lines between the two cities respectively:

A tremendous freshet was occasioned last week in the vicinity of Raleigh, N. C., by a succession of heavy rains. Great damage was done—many mills, bridges, &c., were washed away.

FRANCE AND GREAT BRITAIN.—An English paper states that the revenues of England and France are about the same. The debt of the former absorbs two-thirds; of the latter, one-third. Out of the remainder, Great Britain supports her establishment; but France spends the whole of her income and has an annual deficit of about two millions sterling.

INVASION OF TEXAS.—Letters from Houston, dated the 21st of April, have been received in New Orleans, stating that so strong is the impression that Mexico designs to invade Texas, every third man has been called out by the government and marched to the frontier. The Centralists have defeated the Federalists a second time, at Moretoz, a small town fifteen leagues from the Rio Grande, and are directing their steps toward the Bexar. A letter from that place dated the 5th April, says that the territory of Texas was already invaded by the Centralist army, numbering over two thousand men, and carrying eight pieces of artillery.—It states also that a great many Cherokee Indians have joined the Mexicans.

GEN. GRATIOT'S CASE.—The Jury in this case, which was lately tried at St. Louis, have returned a verdict in favor of the United States for $31,056,93.

The claim of the United States was founded on certain sums of money which came into Gen. Gratiot's hands as Chief Engineer, and for which he had not accounted. In 1836, about the period of the anticipated war with France, an appropriation of $50,000 was made for the purpose of repairing the fort "LaGrand Terre," in Louisiana. The disbursement of this money was to be made by Gratiot, as head of the Engineer Department. He drew the money on two separate warrants, one for twenty thousand and the other for thirty thousand dollars. In settling his account for the appropriation thus made for this distinct purpose, there was a balance of about thirty thousand dollars unaccounted for, and it was found that the money had not been expended on the Fort.

Gen. Gratiot presented a claim, as an offset to this, to the accounting officer at Washington for extra services performed by him many years before, when superintending the disbursements of moneys at Fortresses Munroe and Calhoun. This claim amounted to about ten thousand dollars.

Subsequent to his removal from office by the President, he presented another claim for thirty six thousand dollars, as pay for extra services while head of the engineer department. These claims were however disallowed by the Court, so that the Jury found no difficulty in coming to a conclusion. The defendant's counsel filed bills of exception, and will take the case up to the Supreme Court.—N. York Evening Post.

PLAYING POSSUM.—The particulars of the recent affair at Fort King, are given as follows in the St. Augustine Herald. It is the keenest kind of military tactics on record. "Capt. Raines, commanding that post, prepared a shell with a shirt over it, in such a manner that any attempt to remove the garment would explode the shell. This he placed at a distance from the post. In a little while the shell was heard to explode, and Capt. Raines repaired to the spot, when he discovered Indian signs, a pony track, and some blood. So pleased was he at the success of the experiment, that he placed another shell similarly prepared, covered with a blanket, and retired. It exploded, and on going to the spot, it was discovered that the Indians had tied an oppossum to it, and in its exertions to escape, had expoded the shell. The Indians had stationed themselves, and as they came up, fired upon the troops, killing one sergeant and one private, and wounding Captain Raines mortally, and three privates.—The Indians are variously estimated, from sixty to ninety in number."

BOY'S PLAY.—When a parcel of lads are together, it may be noticed that if one of the most irascible is stepped upon, and resents it, the rest immediately follow suit, for the fun of seeing him fight, or for the mere purpose of bravado. Certain of our contemporaries appear resolved to keep up the memory of their childish sports, and continue as men, what they commenced as boys. Mr. Cooper, the novelist, betrayed an unhappy temper in relation to a newspaper attack; and did what could only be regarded as an act of great foolishness. He commenced a libel suit; and forthwith a great number of papers have fallen into the fashion, and tried their best to provoke him into a libel suit too. If they have succeeded, surely they cannot complain. Mr. Cooper certainly does not pursue the wisest course; nor do the editors. Both parties in this novel controversy, are making themselves sufficiently ridiculous, but Mr. C. may be assured that he will have the worst of it.

Fayetteville, N. C., was visited on Saturday by a terrible storm which continued about ten minutes, and covered a space about 4 miles wide by perhaps 30 in length, in all of which the ground is covered with fallen vegetation, or the leaves and branches of trees. The hail commenced falling in small bodies, but increased to the size of a man's fist; and some stones were measured which were found to be from nine and a half to twenty inches in circumference. It destroyed the greater part of the growing crops and gardens within its range, pelted down all the fruit, and broke perhaps 20,000 to 30,000 panes of glass in Fayetteville alone. Pigeons flying in the air were knocked down dead, poultry were killed, horses standing in the street were frightened, and galloped off in all directions, and a scene of alarm unparalelled was exhibited.

MR. ADAMS' ACCIDENT.—We mentioned on Wednesday that Mr. Adams received a serious injury on Monday, from a fall, and we are happy to be able to-day to state that it was less severe than was feared. The following account is from the correspondence of the N. Y. Courier:

At the moment of the adjournment of the House on yesterday, in crossing the hall, his toe caught in the floor matting, (which was not properly secured) and stumbling, he fell with great force, partly on his right side, and dislocated his right shoulder. He was assisted to a carriage, and conveyed to the apartments of the Hon. James Munro. After some delay, several physicians were in attendance. Great difficulty was experienced in setting the dislocated limb, and consequently great suffering endured. During the whole operation, not a murmur, and scarcely a groan escaped this venerable man.

The twenty-fourth anniversary of the American Bible Society was celebrated yesterday at the Broadway Tabernacle, commening at 10 o'clock. From the annual report we learn that within the past year 20 life directors and 316 members have been added to the Society, by the payment of the requisite sums for that purpose. Twenty-three new auxiliaries have been organized. The receipts of the year from all sources, amount to $87,355 09; being an increase of $2,227 83 over those of the previous year. The number of Bibles and Testaments issued from the Depository in the course of the year, is 157,261; being an increase of 22,324 over the issues of the previous year. These books are in various languages, and have been widely dispersed among our new settlements, among emigrants, seamen, boatmen, and others.—New York paper.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.—The P. M. General, in his annual report, recently made, states that the radical change in the rates of postage on letters recently adopted in Great Britian, has attracted much attention in the United States, and that to enable him to furnish Congress with information on that subject, and on all others connected with the post office establishments in several of the considerable European countries, he has despatched one of the special agents of the Post Office Department to Europe, with instructions to visit them in person, and furnish minute details of their organization and operations. He states that many documents, and some interesting particulars have been received from him, but no detailed report. As soon as such a report is received, it is to be laid before Congress.

COM. ELLIOTT'S TRIAL.—Monday and Tuesday were principally occupied with the examination of witnesses in relation to the case of Midshipman Barton. This young man fought a duel with one of the other midshipmen of the schooner Shark, and received a ball in the leg, sadly shattering the bone. He was taken, at his own request, on board of the Constitution instead of the Shark, and the allegation against Com. Elliott, which is not disputed, is, that he would not permit him to remain there. The whole evidence turns upon his subsequent sufferings, on board the Shark, and on shore, where he was afterwards moved. We shall hesitate to implicate Com. Elliott in any thing but the charge of ordering the removal, till we hear the other side.

New Counterfeits of the United States Bank, of the denomination of $10, have made their appearance simultaneously here and at Philadelphia. Their general appearance is calculated to deceive those not familiar with bank notes. The impression is not so heavy as on the genuine notes, particularly of the heads, and Pennsylvania coat of arms; the latter, at the foot of the notes, nearly indistinct, and the portraits poor imitations. Date January 1, 1823, letter A. payable to bearer. Signatures of S. Mason, and G. W. Fairman, for Cashier and President smaller, and not so free as in the genuine, but still pretty good imitations. The banking house at the top very like the genuine.—New York paper.

MUTINY.—By a letter dated St. Augustine, May 8, we have intelligence of mutinous conduct among the U. S. troops at Pilatka, Fa., under the command of Brevet Major Ashby, who, being absent, the temporary command devolved on Lt. Merrill. This officer's orders respecting the removal of some prisoners being disregarded by a subaltern, the company was ordered to parade, which command was also disobeyed, and Lt. Merrill subjected to personal violence. Dr. Hitchcock at this point interfered, and knocking down several of the mutineers something like restored was order. A carbine levelled at him fortunately missed fire.

W. D. DABNEY.—We learn from the Richmond Star, that on Tuesday Mr. Dabney was arrested at the instance of the commonwealth, and immediately bailed in the sum of twenty thousand dollars. Bail to almost any amount could have been promptly obtained, such is the kindly feeling that prevails towards him. On Wednesday he was introduced as a witness on the part of the commonwealth. His testimony was mainly confined, during the day, to identifying and proving checks, and, therefore, imparted but little satisfaction to the interested crowd in the court room. It was conceded by the counsel of Green, that Dabney was a competent witness.

As the above measures were evidently carried by the votes of the FEMALES, and, convinced that materials of such different affinities could work to better advantage; when apart, over THREE HUNDRED male members withdrew, on the second day of the meeting, and organized the "American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society;" Mr. A. Tappan was appointed President, and the same persons (with one exception) are on the executive committee, as have served the other society for a number of years past. Thus, our frinds will perceive the cause is relieved from an incubus, which has, for a year or more, endangered its prosperity. Of the New Society some farther particulars will be given hereafter.——Zion's Watchman.

GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—We have seen an abstract of the proceedings of this body, up to the 18th ultimo. None of the main exciting questions had yet been directly acted on. Silas Comfort appealed from the decision of the Missouri Conference, who had censured him for admitting the testimony of a colored person on the trial of a white member; the decision of the conference was reversed by a vote of 65 to 46. But the General Conference ultimately passed a resolution, in effect, that the testimony of colored persons should not be received against white members in the slave-holding States, by a vote of 75 to 46.

The bishops, in their onward progress for power, have within a few years past, assumed the right to determine what is conference business, and have refused to put questions to the Annual Conferences, that were displeasing to them, though regularly brought up, as the members think. This has made a new, and somewhat exciting question in the Methodist Episcopal Church, on the subject of conference rights.—Mr. Dorchester, a Presiding Elder of the New England Conference, in the true spirit of his official creator, refused to put resolutions relating to slavery, to the Westfield quarterly conference, for which he was censured by his Annual Conference, from which he appealed to the General Conference, and the decision of the New England Conference was reversed by a vote of 120 to 17. This decision gives some little idea of the latitude and longitude of the question of conference rights.

D. Ostrander offered a resolution "in favor of instructing the Episcopacy to appoint no preacher to those churches not SECURED to the Methodist Episcopal Church, where the trustees have, in any case, refused to received the preachers regularly appointed to them unless they will alter their charters and SECURE THEM TO THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Laid on the table." This gentleman, a few years since, connected his name with a number of ministers, in a certificate, published in the New York Courier and Enquirer, avering that they knew of no controversy in the Methodist Episcopal Church between the ministers and members as to who should control the church property; and that the "preachers" of said church "never had any desire to own or control the property of the church." We did not see, at the time, how it could be possible but that they knew better, though we did not wish to form an uncharitable opinion on the subject. Reader, just look at the bearing of the above resolution.

Since writing the above we have seen minutes of the General Conference up to the 21st ult. Dr. Bangs' resolution giving the bishops an appeal, in the trial of a preacher, to the General Conference, received the go by. But a resolution is up, giving the bishop the right to arrest the proceedings of an Annual Conference, if he should deem proper, which will probably pass.—The following extract shews that the subject of slavery has been under consideration.

"The great battle is now being fought on Slavery. It commenced yesterday afternoon. Dr. Bangs made his report, when O. Scott took the floor and spoke in opposition to it for about half an hour, at which time the conference adjourned. This morning O. Scott resumed and finished his speech, occupying over an hour to-day. He was followed by Dr. Bangs and Mr. Ryerson, and then by Dr. Capers and Thomas Crowder; the two latter occupied about an hour each. The subject will be resumed and probably discussed all this afternon. The house to-day has been full of spectators, attentive and orderly. You will have a full report hereafter.—Wesleyan Ob.

POLITICS AND CHURCH MATTERS.

Brother Springer: The following sentences appeared in the Western Recorder, of May the 6th, near the close of your remarks on my former communication.

"All our members are opposed to, at least, in this region, is mingling politics with church matters. They wish to keep politics and church action separate."

As the above is said in reference to action on the subject of Slavery and Abolition, I should be glad to know definitely, what you and your members in the vicinity of Zanesville, mean by this mingling? Are we to understand you as saying, that a man who acts against slavery in a church capacity, is thereby disqualified to go farther by acting as a citizen, in a political capacity? Or, again; does political action on this subject disqualify a man for church action?

Hitherto, I had supposed that the same man, or body of men, could act in both capacities, either for the promotion of virture, or the suppression of vice, without being subjected to the charge of "mingling politics with church matters." If I am mistaken in this opinion, please to point out the error. Or if you mean something else by this mingling, please to inform us exactly what it is. This politics is a wonderful thing with certain men. One while, it is represented as having such power and authority, as to be a city of refuge for wickedness; any sin brought within its enclosure is not to be named from the sacred desk. At other times, it is regarded as a scare-crow, or something that religious people and especially ministers of the gospel, ought to avoid as they would the plague or cholera.

If a man is likely to fall in with the schemes or measures of the Temperance or Abolition parties, to tell him that they are political things, is regarded as saying evil of them by wholesale. Some say in reference to Slavery and Abolition, "wholly refrain." Others say, let the church alone, take hold of the matter. And others again, tell us the church has no business with it; that it is entirely a political matter. But in my humble opinion, as slavery is both a political and moral evil; both political and moral measures should be used for its entire extirpation from the church and the world.

ROBERT BOYD.

Barnesville, Ohio, May 22, 1840.

We remark, 1st. We did not mean our "members in the vicinity of Zanesville," only; we meant those as far as our paper or correspondence extends, which is as far west of the mountains, as our cause has spread.

2. We did not profess to give our own opinion, but those of our correspondents generally. As for our own part, we have reasons which are satisfactory to us, for not meddling with the subject of Abolition. We have on hand an enterprize against ecclesiastical slavery, which we consider no ways inferior, in point of magnitude, to the other. And, it is our fixed purpose to engage in no exciting controversy whatever, which will disqualify us for the special duty assigned by the order of Providence. Meanwhile, we are agreed to let every other man act for himself, on this and all other subjects, as his conscience dictates to him.

3. You wish to know what is meant by this "mingling." The view that a large portion of our correspondents, as near as we can understand them, entertain, is in substance, this: When the Anti-Slavery Society was organized, being an association distinct from both Church and State, it proposed to procure the abolition of slavery by moral reasoning, and asked the church to co-operate with it for this object; it was considered by most, as a proper question for the action of ecclesiastical bodies; though many at the same time, expressed their fears, that there was a political design, on the part of the leaders of the society, covered up under their operations; but this was repeatedly denied on the part of their lecturers before the public. Well, but it has come to pass that the society has passed a resolution to question all candidates at elections, and to vote for none but abolitionists. And a distinct political organization is now on the way. Now, it is not for us to say whether the society originally intended this or not, or whether they have been driven into it by the perplexities and necessities of their enterprize, but the society has certainly made Abolition a political question, by carrying it to the polls.—Since this event, a considerable portion of our correspondents think the church should not act in her official organs, upon the subject, but leave her members to act as citizens as they might think to be right. It is considered to be impossible to ultimately protect our liberties, unless the Church and State are kept separate, each confining their action to their own appropriate sphere. It is by calling to their aid, the influence of religion, that the despots of Europe, exercise over their subjects the most absolute tyranny.

4. But it appears to us, that a considerable of the difficulty of our Bro. B., grows out of a misapprehension of the province of politics, as we would infer from the following question: "As slavery is both a political and moral evil, both political and moral means should be used," &c. This would seem to imply that "politics" and "morality" covered different ground; whereas, politics are based on morality, and gives as ample field for using moral motives as religion itself. It is thought, in the present attitude of the Anti-Slavery question, an attempt to urge the churches, in their official capacities, into this enterprize, will be only to divide its friends and weaken the cause. We refer you to an article on the first page, from our correspondent, "J. SMITH." We believe his views of the subject, in his former essays, have been generally approved of by our readers.

A TRAGIC STORY.—A correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot, writing from Mississippi, details a tragic story as recently having occurred in that State. A brief notice of the affair has already appeared in our columns, but the following details are not only interesting, but furnish a specimen of the many terrible scenes which have recently resulted from the shocking condition of the times, together with the disregard of law which has characterised Mississippi.—Bicknell.

"Happening some two weeks ago to be in the town of Canton, and sitting with a gentleman in his office, I heard the report of a gun, and simultaneously a yell of savage delight. I rushed to the spot, (some hundred yards off,) and there I beheld a well made young man stretched in the open street, with his face turned toward heaven, groaning and writhing in the agonies of death.—The slugs with which the gun was loaded had penetrated his side between the ribs and hip.—Oh! it was a shocking sight to see. I saw him take his last gasp, and his last struggle.

'I gazed
To try if I could wrench aught out of death
Which should confirm, or shake or make a faith;
But it was all a mystery. Here we are,
And there we go:—but where? five bits of lead,
Or three, or two, or one, send very far!"

For a short time after the young man fell, near his victim, and gazing upon him, stood his murderer, boasting of the horrid deed. He was a large, reddish haired, red faced man—the impersonation of strength and brutality. And as if man had suited the word to the action of nature, his name was Pigg—James Pigg. As far as I could learn the circumstances, they were as follows: Norment (the name of the murdered,) was a deputy marshal. Cook, another deputy marshal, had levied two days before on Pigg's last property of every description, and had taken off all the negroes and such other property as he could remove. Pigg was absent from home; he returned at night, and found his wife and some six or eight children in tears. His fencing as he says, was thrown down, and cattle were eating up his corn. The completion of this scene of wretchedness and ruin wrought him to madness. He was an old frontiersman, and entirely uneducated. He had been engaged in many a deadly strife with the Indian. He found his home as he had found it in the days of yore, desolate.—He thought not of the law—he reflected not that he was living with civilized man, and that he who had taken from him his all was a sworn officer, and acting in the discharge of his duty. He thought only of his desolate condition, and determined to take vengeance on him who had made it so. He loaded his gun and went in pursuit of Cook—he could not find him—on the second day, still in pursuit of Cook, he met with Norment, who expostulated with him, and justified Cook as acting in the discharge of his duty. Maddened by arguments he could not answer, and goaded by fury at not finding Cook, he wreaked his vengeance on Norment, against whom he had no cause of quarrel whatever, and who was in fact (I have heard,) one of the most amiable young men in the country. Had not the more discreet citizens restrained the mob, Pigg would have been hung instantly. Discretion and law prevailed, and Pigg was ironed and lodged in jail to await his trial."

CAMP MEETING.—The annual camp-meeting of the church in this city, commenced on the 23d and ended on the 27th ultimo. It was a meeting of great interest. Many things combined to make it peculiarly so. It was the first that we ever attended, farther south than Virginia. The first to which there was no influx from the surrounding country. It was exclusively from the city; and it was the first held since the organization of the South Carolina Conference, sustained entirely by her own ministers. These things, viewed in themselves, may seem to be matters of little importance, but to us they are of great interest. Every arrangement had been previously made, and on the day prior to the commencement of the meeting, a majority of the brethren went up, so that early on the day of commencement all was ready for action. We have never witnessed, any where, a spirit of more general interest in favor of a camp-meeting, than was manifested by the brethren of this station. They went up with one mind and with a fine tone of religious feeling, all of which argured in favor of a happy time at the tented grove. The ministers in attendance were brothers J. A. Russell, A. McCaine, J. Newbery, S. E. Norton, S. H. Miller and the three brethren of this station. Two of the above ministers, are among the oldest in the cause of Methodism in this country. Brother Russell commenced his career as an itinerant in 1789, and was one of the first preachers in South Carolina. Brother McCaine commenced his itinerant life in 1797, and was, as he told us, the first fruits of Methodism in this city. The labors of these brethren were greatly blessed.—The latter of them preached for us on every day, with all his accustomed zeal and energy, though his head is whitened by the frosts of many winters, yet is he in the full noontide of his preaching abilities. Never have we listened to any man with more general satisfaction. His style is exceedingly perspicuous and searching; and never yet have we heard him without wishing to hear him again. During his continuance with us, he was in fine spirits, and no wonder, for here he witnessed the spread of the principles for which he had suffered so much, far, far beyond what he expected to see in this State. Our meeting was characterised throughout with the best order; although there was a very large number of persons present, particularly on the Sabbath, yet there was not one instance of misbehaviour; all who were with us acted as tho' they had come to be benefitted. We numbered in all over 40 tents; 26 were erected by the whites and the remainder by the colored. The meeting was one of the greatest interest to the church, not so much from the great numbers of conversions as from the heavenly influence which pervaded the ground. To the professors, it was a time of great joy: from the first time we met at the stand, until the last, a gracious feeling of divine love rested on all. And yet the number of conversions was sufficient to more than compensate for our toil and labor, and also enough as an evidence that our good God is still with us. Already have 17 joined the church as probationers since our meeting, and we hope in God that others will yet also come in and go with us to the place which the Lord hath said I will give it thee. Our meeting was protracted during the last week in the city, which has still continued interesting; our love-feast on Friday night was one of unusual pleasantness. God was with us of a truth—we feel encouraged from the past to trust Him for the future, feeling assured that if we are faithful to Him, He will finally bring us to His eternal glory.

CHARLES ELLISTON.

"The touch of kindred ties and love he feels."
Thomson.

"I must leave this place to-night: I can bear their marked neglect, and open taunts no longer," said Charles Elliston, as he left the richly furnished parlor, where, with some fashionable guests, sat Mrs. Merton, and her two oldest daughters, and went forth into the garden. "Yes, I must go," he continued, "no one cares for me: and why should they for the poor and penniless being, whose very origin is unknown? Alas, how hard it is to be thus cast upon the world, friendless and beloved by none—none!" and he buried his face in his hands, overcome with the intensity of his feelings.

"None, Charles?" said a clear silvery voice behind him, and a hand was laid gently on his shoulder. He started, and turning round, said:

"Yes, yes, Helen, pardon me. I spoke unthinkingly. You still love me?" he added inquiringly.

"I do, Charles, and my father—"

"Yes, your father, my noble benefactor, Helen. He still loves me."

"Then, why leave us, Charles?" she said in a tender tone.

"Because, Helen, you know how I have been already the cause of much dissension in your family—God forbid that I should be so any longer! And beside, Helen, you know what treatment I have received from your mother and sisters. I have borne it long out of respect to your father, and love to you, but I can bear it no more. I will go forth into the world in hopes of building up a fortune, and say, Helen, if I should be successful and return, will you—"

"I will love you still," she said interrupting him. "Oh, I will always love you, Charles."

"Farewell!" said he, and imprinting a kiss upon her rosy lips, he tore himself away. In another hour he had quitted that house where he had spent so many happy days with Helen.

Charles Elliston was a dependent on the bounty of Mr. Merton. He had found him one day, when about four years old, wandering about the city, a lost child. He kindly took him home, and used every endeavor to discover his parents; but all to no purpose. At last, finding his inquiries useless, he raised and educated him as his own. Unlike her husband, Mrs. Merton was of a proud and aristocratic spirit, and consequently, could not bear one whose birth was so uncertain as that of young Elliston. She had diffused some of this spirit into her two eldest daughters; but Helen, the youngest, like her father, possessed a noble and kind heart, and looked only with compassion and love, upon the poor, though noble youth. He was about seventeen years of age; and the insults that were heaped upon him he felt severely. It is true when Mr. Merton was present none dare show the least disrespect toward him, but this only served to make him feel it more acutely in his absence. It was on this very mentioned evening, that a new insult had been offered to him, and he determined not to live another day where he was exposed to them. Nor would it have caused him one feeling of regret, had it not been for Mr. H. and Helen; but however dear they were to him, he resolved now to leave them. He left too, without informing Mr. Merton, for he well knew he would insist on his staying, and he would not be the author of discord in that family, where dwelt the only two on earth he could call friends.

It was near the close of a summer day that a steamboat touched the wharf of one of our southern cities, and from its crowded decks poured a stream of wearied travellers, eager, once again, to set foot upon the land. Among the last who stepped on shore was a tall youth with a valice in his hand, who walked slowly from the landing, bent his way toward the shipping warehouses along the wharves. He was in search of employment; but alas! he was a stranger, and he had no recommendations. With a dejected mien, and sorrowful step, he was about giving up all hopes when he came to a large warehouse which he had not before entered. He walked into the counting-house, where sat a gentleman, apparently about forty years of age. To the youth's inquiry, whether he was at the head of the establishment, he replied in the affirmative.

"What do you wish my lad?" he inquired.

"Do you want a lad to assist in your store? I have no recommendations to offer you, sir," he continued modestly. "I have just arrived in the steamboat from the north, and have neither friends nor money. I cannot even pay for a night's lodging." And seeing that the merchant looked incredulously at him, he could contain himself no longer, but said imploringly, "Oh, sir, do not refuse me," and the tears trickled down his cheeks.

The merchant, touched by his grief, and convinced by the openness of his manner, hesitated a moment, and finally took him to his home. A few days proved the truth of the youth's story, and he was employed at once by his new benefactor. In course of time, he rose by degrees, until he became head clerk in the establishment of Mr. Thompson. He also, by his amiableness became the favorite of the wealthy family of his employer, with whom he still resided. All loved him, and he loved them in return, as father, mother and sister. For, altho' Charles, (for it was Charles Elliston) thought that Emma Thompson was almost as beautiful as his own Helen, yet he remained faithful to the latter, and could but think of the former as a sister.

Five years had rolled by, and he had now become proprietor of the large establishment which he had entered as an errand boy, Mr. Thompson having retired from business. One evening he was sitting in familiar converse with the family, when Mrs. Thompson, after looking steadfastly at Charles for some time, remarked how much Emma and he resembled each other.

"Yes," said her husband, "I have often observed it: they look as much alike as though they were really brother and sister. Our lost Charles—poor little fellow!—could not have been more like Emma."

"Your Charles? I never knew you ever had any child beside Emma," said Charles, "when did he die?"

"Would to God he had died!' exclaimed Mrs. Thompson, "then would I have known he was in heaven: but now, perhaps, if he is still alive, he may be buffetted about by strangers, whose hard hearts can seldom feel like a parent's," and she gave vent to her feelings in tears.

"He was lost then?" asked Charles.

"Yes," said Mr. Thompson, "about seventeen years ago, I and Mary, journeyed north for the benefit of our health, and to visit some friends who resided in New York city. We took with us our little Charles, who was scarcely four years old, and then our only child. We arrived there in safety, and after staying with our friends some time, set out on our retnrn home. Anxious to prosecute our journey, we immediately, on our arrival in Philadelphia, took the steamboat to proceed immediately on. I went to see to the safety of the baggage, thinking that Mary and Charles were in the cabin; but what was my surprise, when on going to the cabin some time after the steamboat had left the wharf, to find Mary there alone. She thought I had Charles with me, and she swooned away when I informed her I had not. We searched the boat over, but no Charles could be found, and then it struck us, that he must have wandered on shore before the boat left the wharf, and consequently was left behind. How harrowing our thoughts! to think that every moment the distance was increasing between us and our beloved child. But there was another thought that was still more distressing—perhaps he had fallen overboard unseen, and been drowned! However, I determined on arriving at New Orleans, and leaving Mary with her friends and relations, and return again to Philadelphia, and spare no pains, nor expense in trying to recover our lost child, or, else discover his fate: but the great mental excitement, and bodily fatigue I had undergone, threw me into a fever on the road, and it was several months before I recovered. When I did, and arrived in Philadelphia, no trace could be discovered of our child, and never since have we heard any thing concerning him; but God be praised, Charles, he has given us a son in you!"

"But was there no mark by which he could have been known if he had been left behind as you first supposed?' asked Charles, eagerly.

"Yes, there were the scars of a dog's teeth on his left wrist, and besides he wore a locket—a birth-day present of his father's—around his neck, with "Charles" engraved on it," said Mrs. Thompson with tears in her eyes.

"Then father, mother," said Charles, bearing his arm, and drawing from his bosom a locket which he threw into Mrs. Thompson's lap, "behold your long lost son!"

For an instant they stood amazed—the next they were locked in each others arms: then turning to Emma, he for the first time pressed to his bosom—a sister. How different was his situation now, from the day on which he first set foot in the city of New Orleans. Then he was poor, friendless, with scarce a place to rest his head; now he was wealthy, surrounded by friends, and blest with a mother's, father's, and sister's love. He could claim now, what her noble father would not have refused even to the poor youth, had he asked it—Helen's hand; and her proud mother would not object to receiving for her son-in-law, the heir of the richest merchant in New Orleans.

Mirth and music resounded throughout, and joy, and gladness reigned predominant in the splendid mansion of Mr. Merton. It was the birth-night ball of his lovely and accomplished daughter Helen, given in honor of her nineteenth birthday, and the magnificent saloons were thronged by the youth, beauty, and elite of the metropolis. All paid willing homage to her fascinating charms. Nor beneath their fervent congratulations did there lurk aught of malice or envy; for the sweet disposition, and the gentle manners of Helen Merton had won the good will of all who knew her. And now, as she replied to their warm-hearted wishes she looked more beautiful than ever. She was attired in a plain white dress, looped with roses, and fitting with exquisite neatness to her finely moulded form; her shining chesnut curls were confined by a costly diamond head-band that sparkled on her snowy forehead, rivalling the transparent beauty and clearness of her complexion. At times, when she would mingle in the giddy whirl of the dance, a smile would play upon her lovely features; but when over, and the momentary excitement was past, a melancholy expression would steal into her lately laughing eye, telling of something yet wanting to complete her happiness. She was thinking, perhaps, how he, who years ago, had won her maiden-love, might, while she was surrounded by wealth and luxury, be dragging out the prime of his life, in poverty and distress. Yes, she still thought of the poor friendless youth—the companion of her childhood. Such is a woman's constancy and love. Alas, that it should so often be abused.

The evening was somewhat advanced when Mr. Merton approached Helen, linked arm in arm with a young man, whose dark countenance; raven hair, and eyes, and tall, straight form, indicated a native of the south.

"Mr. Thompson, of New Orleans, my dear," said Mr. Merton, introducing him to Helen,—and then after conversing for a few moments, sauntering to the opposite side of the saloon.

"Who is that handsome young man you just introduced to Helen?' asked Mrs. Merton of her husband.

"That is Mr. Thompson, of New Orleans: the richest merchant in that city, as his father was before him. He arrived here but the day before yesterday. I was introduced to him yesterday, and invited him here to-night, and if the impression of his features is not left on Helen's little heart, which has hitherto been so callous, none ever will be."

"And if they are, I suppose that you will cease to regret the disappearance of your protegee, Charles Elliston," said his wife, sarcastically.

Mr. Merton did not answer: he only turned away.

At first when the stranger was introduced to Helen, there appeared an air of slight embarrassment about him, but it gradually wore off, and he entered into a conversation with unusual vivacity. In the course of it she asked him if he had ever been in the city before. He replied that he had been when he was about seventeen years of age, and that he had become acquainted with several of his own age, whose acquaintance he highly praised. Among those, he mentioned, was that of Charles Elliston, in particular. As he pronounced the name, he bent his dark eye full upon her, and perceived that she started, while for a moment, agitation was visibly depicted in her countenance. After a minute's pause he continued, "but I have made inquiry since my arrival, respecting him, and hear that he has returned the kindness of his benefactor—your father—with ingratitude, by leaving his house, and going no one knew whither."

"Oh, no, sir, do not believe that: it is an idle report. He had reason for leaving my father's house," and her voice trembled, and a tear stood in her eye.

Just then a gentleman advanced to claim her hand for the last cotillion, and the conversation was abruptly terminated. Charles resigned her silently: but his heart was full.

It is strange how the lapse of a few years between youth and manhood, will change the face and disguise the form. The slight stripling that a little while ago clambered on our knee, we can scarce recognize in the full, stately form, and staid demeanor of the man. So it was with Charles Thompson, and no wonder Helen and her father could not see in the rich merchant of the south, the poor lad, who, six years before, had left them with scarce a dollar in his pocket.

It was the morning following the ball; and Mr. and Mrs. Merton, and Helen were sitting in the parlor—the former two engaged in discussing some private affairs: the latter with her head resting upon her hand, apparently in deep thought. The servant entered, and handed Mr. Merton a letter. He opened it, and after having perused it for a few moments, uttered an exclamation of joy. Both his companions looked up. Seemingly overcome with the excitement of some unusually pleasing news he approached his daughter, and patting her gaily on the cheek, said—

"Come, come, Helen dear—cheer up—Charles—our own dear Charles has returned—is in the city, and will be here in half an hour—cheer up my dear!" and he began to pace the floor. "See here," he continued, as a splendid equippage, with servants in livery, drove up to the door, from which a young gentleman alighted, "here is Mr. Thompson too; how glad I shall be to introduce them to one another."

"I don't see how you should be," said his wife "though, perhaps, your Charles, as you call him, may be as rich now as Mr. Thompson. You know he left word he was going to seek his fortune," and she pronounced the last word with a sneer.

"And he hopes he has found it madam!" exclaimed Charles, who entered just at that moment, "thanks to an all-wise Providence that directed my steps to my father's house. It is Charles that stands before you!"

With a shriek of delight Helen threw herself into his out-stretched arms, and wept tears of joy upon his bosom; while the old man stood motionless, but his eyes were wet, and his lip quivered, though not with grief.

When they were somewhat composed, Charles related to them what had occurred since he left them. The joy that beamed in the swimming eye of the delighted girl, as she hung fondly upon her lover's arm, was only equalled by the tenderness with which he returned her look of affection. How deep was the bliss of that moment, making amends by its delight, for the long years of doubt and absence. It was not long before Charles renewed again the boyish vows he had pledged to Helen, and the blushing girl listened, weeping and smiling by turns. Need it be added that in a short time Helen and Charles were united at the altar, and that even the artistocratic mother smiled upon the union of her daughter with the ci devant Charles Elliston.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

HUMAN PHENOMENON.

The last report of the Boston Asylum for the Blind gives a large variety of further intelligence concerning the progress of Laura Bridgman, the little girl of whom our readers have heard something. Besides being deaf, and dumb, and blind, she is also deprived of the sense of smell, and enjoys taste but imperfectly—the touch, alone being the medium of communication between her and the outer world. It is gratifying to know that careful observations continue to be made with a view of ascertaining the order of developements and the peculiar character of her intellectual faculties. We quote the following interesting statements:—Empire State.

The intellectual improvement of this interesting being, and the progress she has made in expressing her ideas, is truly gratifying.

She uses the manuel alphabet of the deaf mutes, with great facility and great rapidity; she has increased her vocabulary so as to comprehend the names of all common objects.

She can count to high numbers: she can add and substract small numbers.

But the most gratifying acquirement she has made, and the one which has given her the most delight, is the power of writing a legible hand, and expressing her thoughts upon paper. She writes with a pencil in a groved line, and makes her letters clear and distinct.

She was sadly puzzled at first to know the meaning of the process to which she was subject, but when the idea dawned upon her mind, that by means of it she could convey intelligence to her mother, her delight was unbounded. She applied herself with great diligence, and in a few months actually wrote a legible letter to her mother; in which she conveyed information of her being well, and of her coming home in ten weeks.

She has improved very much in personal appearance, as well as in intellect—her countenance beams with intelligence—she is always active at study, work or play—she never repines, and most of the time is gay and frolicsome.

She is now very expert with her needle; she knits very easily, and can make twine bags and various fancy articles, very prettily. She is very docile—has a quick sense of propriety—dresses herself with great neatness, and is always correct in her deportment. In short it would be difficult to find a child in possession of all her senses, and the enjoyment of the advantages that parental love can bestow, who is more contented and cheerful, or to whom existence seems a greater blessing, than it does to this bereaved creature, for whom the sun has no light, the air no sound, and the flowers no color nor smell.

No definite course of instruction can be marked out; for her inquisitiveness is so great, that she is very much disconcerted if any question which occurred to her is to be deferred until the lesson is over. It is deemed best to gratify her, if her enquiry has any bearing on the lesson; and often she leads her teacher far away from the objects he commenced with.

In her eagerness to advance her knowledge of words, and to communicate her ideas, she coins words, and is always guided by analogy. Sometimes her process of word-making is very interesting; for instance, after some time spent in giving her an idea of the abstract meaning of alone, she seemed to obtain it, and understanding that being by one's self, was to be alone, or al-one. She was told to go to her chamber, or school, or elsewhere, and return alone, she did so; but soon after, wishing to go with one of the little girls, she strove to express her meaning thus—Laura go al-two.

She has the same fondness for dress, for ribbons, and for finery, as other girls of her age, and as a proof that it arises from the same amiable desire of pleasing others, it may be remarked, that whenever she has a new bonnet, or any new article of dress, she is particularly desirous to go to meeting, or to go out with it. If people do not notice it, she directs their attention by placing their hand upon it.

She seems to have a perception of character, and to have no esteem for those who have little intellect. The following anecdote is significant of her perception of character, and shews that from her friends she requires something more than good natured indulgence.

A new schoiar entered school—a little girl about Laura's age. She was very helpless, and Laura took great pride and great pains in showing her the way about the house, assisting her to dress and undress, and doing for her many things which she could not do herself.

In a few weeks it began to be apparent even to Laura, that the child was not only helpless, but naturally very stupid, being almost an idiot. Then Laura gave her up in despair and avoided her, and has ever since had an aversion to being with her, passing by her as if in contempt. By a natural association of ideas she attributes to this child all those countless deeds which Mr. Nobody does in every house—if a chair is broken, or any thing misplaced and no one knows who did it, Laura attributes it at once to this child.

* * * * * *

With regard to the sense of touch it is very acute even for a blind person. It is shown remarkably in the readiness with which she distinguishes persons; there are forty inmates in the female wing, with all of whom of course Laura is acquainted;—whenever she is walking through the passage ways, she perceives by the jar of the floor, or the agitation of the air, that some one is near her, and it is exceedingly difficult to pass her without being recognized. Her little arms are stretched out, and the instant she grasps a hand, a sleeve, or even part of the dress, she knows the person, and lets them pass on with some sign of recognition.

The innate desire for knowledge, and the instinctive efforts which the human faculties make to exercise their functions, is shown most remarkably in Laura.—Her tiny fingers are to her as eyes, and ears, and nose, and most deftly and incessantly does she keep them in motion; like feelers of some insects which are continually agitated, and which touch every grain of sand in the path, so Laura's arms and hands are continually in play; and when she is walking with a person she not only recognizes every thing she passes within touching distance, but by continually touching her companions hands she ascertains what he is doing. A person walking across the room while she had hold on his left arm, would find it hard to take a pencil out of his waistcoat pocket with his right hand, without her perceiving it.

Her judgment of distances and of relations of place is very accurate; she will rise from her seat, go straight towards the door, put out her hand just at the right time, and grasp the handle with precision.

The constant and tireless exercise of her feelers give her a very accurate knowledge of every thing about the house; so that if a new article, a bundle, bandbox, or even a new book, is laid any where in the apartments which she frequents, it would be but a short time before in her ceaseless rounds she would find it, and from something about it she would generally discover to whom it belonged.

At table, if told to be still, she sits and conducts herself with propriety; handles her cup, spoon, and fork, like other children; so that a stranger looking at her, would take her for a very pretty child with green ribbon over her eyes.

But when at liberty to do as she chooses, she is continually feeling of things, and ascertainig their size, shape, destiny and use—asking their names and their purposes, going on with insatiable curiosity, step by step, towards knowledge.

Thus doth her active mind, though all silent and darkling within, commune by means of her one sense, with things external, and gratify its innate craving for knowledge by close and ceaseless attention.

Qualities and appearances, unappreciable or unheeded by others, are to her of great significance and value; and by means of these her knowledge of external nature and physical relations will in time become extensive.

A Good Idea.—'Education,' says a western paper, 'is a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army. If we retrench the wages of the school-master, we must increase those of the recruiting sergeant.'

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in city of New York, and devoted to Home, Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by Park Benjamin.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant periodical sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 2. The situation of New York, and its immense commercial intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intelligence received in our "great metropolis." Availing ourselves of the advantages derived from this source, and many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper interested for "our country, our whole country"—was by no sectional bias—controverting no man's political opinions—unsullied by any thing of an immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of such English works of value as may be conveniently embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of original matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazine, Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, La Belle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.
We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of the celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which no copyright is not attached.
The editor will especially aim to make the New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full accounts of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to our people; while they omit or neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.
We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which are under the eye of the municipal police. We see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No judicious accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal visitations of social order by the ignorant and imbecile.
With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient, and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.
Price of The New World, three dollars per annum, payable in advance.
All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

SPIRITUAL SONG.

ld Israelites knew what it was they must do,
r Canaan they ever possess'd;
must still keep in sight of that pillar of light
h led on to the promised rest, ntile camp on the road could not be thir abode
s oft as the trumpet should blow, all glad of a chance for farther advance must take up their baggage and go.

thankful indeed for that heavenly head
h before me hath hitherto gone, he pillar of love which forward doth move which gathers our souls into one;
the cross-bearing throng are advancing along closer communion they flow,
l that will stand on the promised land must take up their crosses and go.

the way is all new as it opens to view behind is a foaming red sea, ne are to speak of their onions and leeks
lk about garlic's to me:
ngag'd in pursuit and must have the good fruit
h in Canaan's rich valley doth grow, gh millions of foes should rise up and oppose,
take up my cross and will go.

' scattered around on this wilderness ground, good manna awhile we have been fed;
his will not do we must rise and go through must have the unleavened bread. [on, the morning doth dawn for the camp to move the priests with their trumpets do blow; n the trumpet doth sound then my joys do for one, I'm determined to go. [abound, ough some in the rear preach terror and fear, complain of the trials they meet;

old Jordan before with great fury doth roar, esolved I will never retreat;
re little 'tis ture, and our numbers are few,
the sons of old Anak are tall;
while I see a track, I will never look back,
o on at the risk of my all.

ordan's near side, I can never abide,
o place of repose I can see;
come to that spot and inherit that lot,
h the Lord God shall give unto me:
union I seek with the pure and the meek, end to all discord and strife;
I have fixed my eyes on the heavenly prize on at the risk of my life.

faithful and true, and my journey pursue,
ll stand on the promised shore;
shall thankfully see what a blessing to me
the mortifying cross which I bore:
as loss is my gain I shall never complain,
as long as I'm able to crawl,
the resolute few, I'm resolved to go through,
to suffer the loss of my all.

y honor and health my pleasure and wealth, illing should now be at stake;
if Christ I obtain, I shall count it great gain, he sacrifice which I do make:
n all I've forsook like a bubble will look,
the midst of a glorified throng;
en let us agree and from bondage be free,
to Zion be marching along.

SELECTIONS.

EAUTY IN A WIFE.—A young man ried a wife, whose only claim upon regard was her personal beauty.— said to him, at the end of one of their rels. "You don't love me—you can look me in the face, and say that you ." "You mistake, my dear," he cried; it is only when I look you in the face I can say I love you."

OY AND SORROW.—As the most luxu- t plants thrive best with an equal mix- of sunshine and shade, showery and weather, and in a soil composed of l as well as richer materials, mingled ue proportions together, so the human d is a plant which thrives best with a proportion of prosperity and adver- , joy and sorrow.

t GOOD JOKE.—A teamster lately lost n his wagon a keg of butter, which found by a man who carried it half ile on foot, to the tavern of Mr. H., ere he found the owner, who thanked for his trouble. Mr. H. (the land- l) observed to him that he was well —that thank you was worth 25 cents, thank you kindly was worth 37½ ts. He (the footman) soon called for nner, which was forthwith provided. er finishing his meal he inquired the ce—the answer was, 25 cents. He n said, "I thank you kindly," and ved off. The landlord immediately ed to him—"Here, stop my friend and e your change; there is 12½ cents r due—your bill is only 25 cents."

MARRIAGE BETWEEN A MOTHER AND HER .—The following extraordinary story related by the Paris Messenger: "A l in one of the departments, although t fifteen years of age, was delivered of male child, which she placed in the undling Hospital of the place, after ving first made an indelible mark on arm. She then came to Paris, and tered into service. Having after some ars, accumulated 4,000f., her thoughts re turned towards her child: when e inquired for him, he had left the hos- al, and tidings could not be obtained of m. A young soldier, attracted proba- ly, by her little fortune, recently paid his addresses to her, and a few days ago they were married. On retiring to the nuptial chamber, she discovered on the arm of her husband the mark which she had made on the arm of her child 20 years ago! The discovery led to an immeditate de facto divorce, and a demand of nullity of marriage between mother and son has been presented to the tribunal."

A PHILOSOPHER'S THOUGHTS ON RELIGION.—Religion, whether natural or revealed, has always the same beneficial influence on the heart. In youth, in health and prosperity, it awakens feelings of gratitude and sublime love, and purifies at the same time that it exalts. But it is in misfortune, in sickness and in age, that its effects are most truly and beneficially felt; when submission in faith, and humble trust in the divine will, from duties become pleasures and undecaying sources of consolation. It then revives powers which were thought to be extinct, and gives a freshness to the mind which was supposed to have passed away forever, but which is now renovated as an immortal hope. Then does it become the Pharos, guiding the wave-tost mariner to his home; or as the green & dewy spot gushing with fountains to the exhausted and thirsty enjoyments, and becomes stronger as our frame dissolves. It appears as that evening star in the horizon of life which throws its radiance through the gloom and shadow of death, and which will rise a bright morning star, to usher us into another and a better world.

From the Essays of Poor Robert the Scribe.

WHO'LL TURN THE GRINDSTONE?—When I was a little boy, Messrs. Printers, I remember one cold winter's morning, I was accosted by a smiling man, with an axe on his shoulder; "My pretty boy," said he, "has your father a grindstone?"—"Yes, sir," said I. "You are a fine little fellow," said he, "will you let me grind my axe on it?" Pleased with this compliment of "fine little fellow," "O yes, sir," I answered, "It is down in the shop." "And will you, my man," said he, patting me on the head, "get a little hot water?" How could I refuse? I ran and soon brought a kettle full. "How old are you, and what's your name?" continued he, without waiting for a reply; "I am sure you are one of the finest lads that I have ever seen; will you just turn a few minutes for me?" Tickled with the flattery, like a little fool, I went to work, and bitterly did I rue the day. It was a new axe, and I toiled and tugged, till I was almost tired to death.—The school bell rung, and I could not get away; my hands were blistered, and it not half ground. At length, however, the axe was sharpened, and the man turned to me, with—"Now, you little rascal, you've played the truant—scud to school, or you'll buy it." Alas, thought I, it was hard enough to turn a grindstone this cold day; but now to be called "little rascal" was too much. It sunk deep in my mind, and often have I thought of it since.

When I see a merchant over polite to his customers—begging them to taste a little brandy, and throwing half his goods on the counter—thinks I, that man has an axe to grind.

When I see a man of doubtful character, patting a girl on the cheek—praising her sparkling eye and ruby lip, and giving her a sly squeeze; beware, my girl, thinks I, or you will find to your sorrow, that you have been turning a grindstone for a villian.

When I see a man flattering the people, making great professions of attachment to liberty, who is in private life a tyrant—methinks, look out, good people, that fellow would set you to turning a grindstone.

When I see a man hoisted into office by party spirit—without a single qualification to render him either respectable or useful—Alas! methinks, deluded people, you are doomed for a season to turn the grindstone for a booby.

When I see a merchant or a mechanic trotting about town electioneering for himself for some office, because he is too lazy to work at his own calling, I think to myself, beware my good friends, least you be found turning the grindstone for the wrong person.

DINNERS OF RICHELIEU.—During the time Cardinal Richelieu had such tyrannic sway in the legislative concerns of France, an old military officer, who resided upon a small estate in Normandy, had occasion to visit Paris on some private business. He had been some days in the capital, when, on returning to his hotel, one evening, he found on his table, a note addressed to himself, in the hand-writing of the Cardinal, which proved to be nothing else than an invitation to dine at the Chateau de Ruel the next day. So great an honor was as surprising as it was unexpected. He, however, attributed this high distinction to some friend at Court, and set out in time to arrive in the hour appointed. The old soldier commenced his journey on foot, and having ascended the hill Neuilly, he perceived a cabriolet approaching. Having some doubt whether he had taken the right road, he inquired of the occupant of the vehicle his way to Ruel.

"To Ruel?" answered the stranger, "if you will accept of a seat in my chaise, I will be happy to drive you thither. That is my destination also."

With many thanks for his politeness our officer entered the cabriolet, and began to converse freely with his new companion.

"I am going to dine with the Cardinal," said the latter.

"Mon Dieu!" exclaimed the veteran. "How very singular, I am about to do the very same thing; yet I am at a loss to know how I deserve so high an honor, for never, to my knowledge, have I served his highness in any way; neither have I been introduced to him."

"How!" exclaimed the driver of the cabriolet, with surprise—and then, changing his manner, he said, slowly and sorrowfully, "You have never seen the Cardinal, and you and I are to dine with him to-day. I pity you."

"Good Heavens!" what has made you change countenance!"

"Call up every circumstance from the recesses of your memory," said the stranger, with great earnestness. "I conjure you to recollect yourself. Have you never directly or indirectly had any communication, personally, or otherwise, with the prime minister?"

"Indeed, never to my knowledge."

"Try again, I implore you," continued the gentleman, with increased anxiety. "That circumstance is of the greatest importance to you, although you may not believe it."

"Sir, you alarm me," ejaculated the veteran.

"Not unnecessarily, I can assure you. Scrutinize your conduct well. Have you never alluded to the Cardinal in any public way?"

"Not that I can remember. O, I beg pardon. Yes, I had forgotten when at court, some time since, I published a few poems. Among them was an epigram not very flattering to his highness."

"I thought so. Listen to the fatal lot that awaits you. The Cardinal has discovered in you an enemy. His vengeance is terrible. He never invites me but when some horrid crime is to be performed. You are the victim to-day."

"Horrible!" exclaimed the old officer. "How may I believe you?"

"I am the best authority for what you have just learned. In me you behold—"

"Who?"

"The executioner! I feel happy in warning you—in saving at least one victim from premature death."

"How, how can I reward you?" said the veteran.

"Only by keeping the secret of my saving your life, and not forgetting me. Fly. Leave Paris with all speed."

The officer lost no time in descending from his cab, and making the best of his way to Paris, from whence he set out on the same evening on the route to his residence in Normandy; and it was not long after he had the double satisfaction of learning the death of Richelieu, and expressing his gratitude to his friend, the executioner.

This, then, is the history of the snug dinners at Ruel. They were always tee-a-tete parties, consisting of only three guests—The Cardinal, the executioner, and the victim. The cheer was capital—rare dishes and excellent wines, which were enhanced by the affability and bonhommie of the host. After dinner his excellency would propose an adjournment to a neighboring apartment. He entered first, then the executioner, and lastly the the victim, who was instantly precipitated into a vault, under the floor, which was raised by the executioner, by means of a spring. This was as quickly closed, and the "finisher of the law" returned home, while the Cardinal retired to enjoy his desert.

PLEASURES OF VIRTUOUS AFFECTIONS.—If it be a proof of benevolence in God, that our external organs of taste should have been so framed as to have a liking for wholesome food—it is no less the proof both of a benevolent and righteous God, so to have framed our mental economy, as that right and wholesome morality should be palatable to the taste of the inner man. Virtue is not only seen to be right—it is felt to be delicious. There is a heart's ease, or a heart's enjoyment, even in the first purposes of kindness, as well as in its subsequent performances There is a certain rejoicing sense of clearness in the consistency, the exactitude of justice and truth. There is triumphant elevation of spirit in magnanimity and honor. In perfect harmony with this, there is a placid feeling of serenity and blissful contentment in gentleness and humility. There is a noble satisfaction in those virtues, which, at the bidding of discipline, or by the power of self-command, may have been achieved over the propensities of animal nature. There is an elate independence of soul, in the consciousness of having nothing to hide, and nothing to be ashamed of. In a word, by the constitution of our nature, each virtue has its appropriate charm; and virtue, on the whole, has a fund of varied, as well as of perpetual enjoyment, to him who hath imbibed its spirit, and is under the guidance of its principles. He feels all to be health and harmony within; and without, he seems as if to breathe in an atmosphere of beauteous transparency—proving how much the nature of man and the nature of virtue are in unison with each other.—Dr. Chalmers.

THE ESCAPE.

BY MRS. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

There seems to be sometimes a period in the history of nations, as well as individuals, when clouds gather around, when sickness as of the heart steals over them, and the energies working in diseased channels, call up a host of spectral illusions, "destruction before them, and sorrow behind." Such was the state of the colony of Massachusetts, the Mother of New England, when about to pass the barrier of the seventieth year of her existence. The buoyant hopes of earlier seasons forsook her, and her feet "trembled upon the dark mountains," as if appalled by a warning cry, "The days of thy years, are three score years and ten; and all beyond is labor and sorrow."

Amid her skirts, and within her bosom, was a savage foe, wronged, inexorable, whose stealthy step was traced in the blood of the defenceless, and whose vengeance, quick and terrible as the lightning stroke, threatened extermination. The fathers, who had been her guide ard stay, the prophets, the priests, whose voice had been the Urim and Thummim of the multitude, were with the dead.—We, in whose minds respect for age is less deeply rooted, cannot imagine the "horror of great darkness," that settled upon her soul, as the last vestiges of that patriarchal race faded from the earth.—One by one the stars were muffled, the beacon-lights extinguished, and she left to steer alone her endangered bark over the troubled waters.

Other causes conspired to harass and depress the people; heavy taxation, the almost utter extinction of commerce, and a sea coast infested with pirates, and hostile privateers. France, irritated by a recent invasion of Canada, menaced the colonies with her vengeance. "They were becoming," says Upham, in his Lectures, "the victims of political jealousies, discontent and animosities. Their minds were startled and confounded by forebodings of dark and dismal events. And as it were to crown the whole, and fill up the measure of their affliction and terror, it was their universal and sober belief, that the Evil Being himself was in a special manner let loose, and permitted to descend upon them with unexampled fury."

It was from the midst of this discomfort and gloom "this fearful looking for of judgment," that the delusion at Salem sprang forth. Though not without precedent, in an older and wiser continent, it derived peculiar elements of sternness and inveteracy, from the locality and circumstances of its birth. Few of those agencies which soften and unbend the minds of men, were then in operation.—Literature and science gave but a feeble infusion of their spirit, and social intercourse seldom sparkled with hilarity.—Seeds of religious dissension were vegetating, and whatever form of bitterness or superstition seized upon the mind, it was pursued with the exclusiveness of monomania.

An isolated and ascetic state of feeling, was nourished by the tardy and infrequent communication between the settlements. No post-roads or periodicals diffused intelligence, and penetrating to the most remote solitudes, bound the extremities to the heart, in strong and warm vitality. The adventurous traveller encountered not only fatigue but peril, for he knew that he must pass by dense, and overshadowing forests, where the watchful Indian prowled. So slow was the transmission of news, that the awful tragedy at Salem, which commenced early in the year of 1692, did not reach for several months, a little colony of Huguenots, which had planted themselves about forty miles from Boston. Few in number, and occupied with those labors on which existence imperatively depends, vague rumors as of some distorted and horrible dream, at length floated to their hermit residence.

It was at that period when autumn fosters the fading beauties of summer, and yet announces the approach of winter, by infusing a slight chill into the evening atmosphere. The harvest of maize which had been principally gathered, was deposited in a rude tenement, which served as a public granary. Lights were seen there to glimmer, after they had one by one, vanished from the surrounding habitations. A few men who had been engaged in separating the golden ears from the investing sheath, still prolonged their toil, listening to the narrations of a hardy New England yeoman, who had been hired for the last year to assist the more delicate natives of France, in the ruder labors of husbandry. While in the midst of an animated description of the festivities of what he called "real huskin frolic," which he had sometimes shared among his own people, he was interrupted by a heavy knock at the door, and the sudden entrance of a weary stranger in worn garments. A word or two, in an under tone, caused an exclamation of amazement.

"Why, cousin Jehiel Wigglesworth! it can't be you! in such torn and awful riggin! Have the Indians come down upon Malden? and was you necessiated to fly for your life?"

"What is a host of cowardly Indians," was the reply, "to the terrible visitations of the spirits of darkness? We read in the Bible of only ONE witch of Endor; and she busied herself with calling up the dead; but Salem town is full of witches from one end to t'other, and they do nothing but torment and destroy the living."

To the inquiry of his cousin, respecting the reasons of his removal from Malden, their native place, he answered,

"You know I come of age, last winter, and so, I told father he might as well get some work out of brother Titus, who is a stout youngster, and I would go and hire myself out a spell, and 'arn a little money. I had heard of a minister, in Salem, one Mr. Parris, who wanted help, and I reckon'd 'twould be a good notion to live with a minister, because their portion not being in this world, they would not be likely to insist on so much hard slaving. But I was rather discomfited at our first meeting. He obsarv'd that he was particular in inquiring the character of sarvants, because he choose to have only those of good report. "Sarvants," said I, "I never was any body's sarvant, and I never mean to be." So I turned to go off, thinking he was too mighty topping for me. But he said over a text or two of Scripture which made me as quiet as a lamb, how that we all had a master in heaven, and that he only wanted me to be his HELP. Then I felt ashamed that I had been so mad and hasty, and made an agreement with him, and so lived quiet and peaceable, till I was carried to Salem jail."

"To the jail! to the jail? You don't say so! None of our relations ever came to such disgrace before! No wonder you look so exceedin' dumpish. Tell me all that you did, without any prevarication."

"Cousin Jehoshaphat Jones, have a little patience. Every thing in its right place. Is not it necessary that you know first consarning my dealings at the minister's? My business was to dig in the garden, and to chop wood, and to take care of the dumb critturs, which consisted of an old horse, not very abundant in flesh, and a cow with balls at her horns, to show that she routed down fences to get a better pasture, and a flock of hens, which it was a power of trouble to watch, and scare out of the neighbors' corn, and to mind the minister's wife in all she directed."

"And was it really a great sight easier to live with a minister, than to be on the good old farm at home? Did you get enough to eat?"

"I liked all well enough, except the Sabba-day dinners. For then they never got any victuals. They are no upholders of fasting in Boston, for they understand good eating and drinking, right well.—But Salem folks are more stinching and saving. However, there was really nothing worth complaining of, till those great and grievous trials came down like a clap of thunder. The minister's darter and his niece, who lived with them, both smart, sprightly girls of eleven or twelve years old, were brought all of a sudden, under the power of the Evil One, and tormented just like the children of Mr. John Goodwin, at North Boston, a few years before. Cousin Jehoshaphat, did not you read the marvellous account of them, published by a godly and learned minister?"

"Yes, I did. But it seemed to me, a deal more like their own ugliness, than like any other sort of witchcraft."

"Well, Jehoshaphat Jones, just in that same way, other bold ones blasphemed, and made mockery, but some of them got hung upon the gallows, like proud Haman, a spectacle to heaven and airth. It is true, that the two girls were the most tormentedest critturs that eyes ever beheld. Sometimes we'd find them a standing in brooks of water, saying that the Wicked One wanted to drown them; then they'd be a clinging to the tops of high trees, where they'd no way in natur of getting, crying out that he commanded them to throw themselves down from thence."

"Jehiel was not there apples or some sort of fruit on them trees? I've seen children climb pretty decent high, after green apples, without no supernatural help."

"Well, what should they run upon the ridge-pole of the barn, and bemoan themselves there for? You don't s'pose any green apples grew there, do you? And when the poor souls set down to comfort themselves with a meal of victuals, who do you calculate drew their tongues out of their mouths, and laid them all along upon their chins, so that they were not able to eat a single mouthful?"

"I don't know. I guess they did not see any thing they liked on the table, and thought they'd make a push to get something more to their tastes."

"Who do you reckon runs pins into them, and left the marks of great pinches and bites on their innocent flesh? And what made them, when they was told only to do the least little chore, fall into fits, like one about to die."

"Why, Jehiel, I have made believe to be sick myself, when I was a small boy, and told to hoe corn, or weed the gardin. But I was always mighty well if any play was going on. And I have seen bigger folks sarve their masters in that way, time and again. Who pinch'd and bit those girls I don't undertake to say. But I rather guess if the minister had given them a smart box on the ear, as father used to, they'd gone to work and felt better."

"It is very likely to be sure, that with your poor education, you should know more of their case, than all the wise and rich gentlemen, who come to see them and pity them, and then the host of ministers, too, who used to pray and exhort over them. And when them that were the most gifted, and could hold out the longest, were putting up petitions, it was awful to see the sufferings of the children. Every inch of their flesh would tremble, as if the Evil Spirit was about to come out of them, but it was only because he was mad and tired, to hear the precious saints communing so long with the Lord. Then the poor babes might not enjoy the comfort of saying the Lord's prayer themselves; for they'd always be forced to leave out some part of it. And when Mr. Parris would say, 'begin again, and say it right,' they'd be speechless. Neither were they permitted to read a single godly book, whereby their souls might be comforted, under their body's tribulation. The Wicked Sarpent would allow them to read silly story and jeest books, and if they were particular unchristian and bad, they'd giggle and shout till even the neighbors heard the racket. But when the Assembly of the Catechize was put into their hands, oh! such whooping and hollowing, and if it was not taken directly out of their sight, they'd have the terriblest fits, and scare the minister's wife, nigh upon to death."

"Why, cousin Jehiel, as for that monstrous long catechize, I'd have screamed as bad as they, and had as many fits, if I could have only frighten'd mother out of the notion of making me larn it. I wonder if you wise and honorable gentlemen, did not happen to forget the depravity of the heart."

"Jehoshaphat Jones, I feel bound to say unto you what holy Mr. Baxter saith in his preface to the book about John Goodwin's afflicted offspring, 'he that disbelieveth, must needs be a most obstinate Sadducee.' I s'pose it will be of no use to certify you that there was a witch in our house. Yea, a black wench, from a far distant country, where I'm told they have daily dealings with Satan, as man with man, in buying and selling, and trucking of goods. The afflicted girls, when in their sorest torments, would cry out upon Tituba, and there would be the cruel jade, looking as much amazed as if she had never done any evil in her life. But she had manifested her ugly temper towards them, before this calamity, by divers times discovering them in a closet where jellies and such like sweet trade was kept, of which it was very natural that they should be just tasting a little, you know. They could not so much as touch a lump of sugar, or a spoonful of molasses, but they'd hear her muttering, "I'll tell mistress, for by and by, when sugar-pot and 'lasses jug be empty, she'll say, Tituba steal, Tituba tief." So don't all these doings plainly prove that she was moved of old by the father of malice, against these poor children? Well, after things had gone on so for a long lengthy time, they come to a determination to hold a court upon these dealings of Satan, and try if the authority of the town could not cast him out, since the clargy were not able. Oh! I never shall forget that dreadful day. Heads was as thick in the Salem courthouse, as green peas in a pod, but no more noise, nor shuffling of feet, than if all had been dead bodies. There, on a high seat, sot Governor Danforth, looking exceeding solemn, and Governor Stoughton with eyes as sharp as a needle; and there was the Rev. Mr. Samuel Parris, with a pen, to write down every word that should be said. I could not help thinking of the day of judgment. And when the crowd was so great that we could hardly breathe, the distressed children was brought in. Close behind them, came Tituba, rolling up the whites of her eyes. Then, they fell into the worst torments I ever did see. It seemed as if the Wicked One put forth the whole of his power and ugliness, in the presence of the Honorable Court. 'Who hurts you?' said his worship the Judge. 'Tituba! Tituba!' they both screamed at once. 'She afflicts us. She is going to ride on a broomstick, now, and will stick pins in us.' Then they fell into such awful fits that the Honorable Court did exhort the black witch to make confession of her wickedness. So she did confess so far as this, that when she was a slave among the Spanish, she larnt how to find out a witch. And pray, was not that just as bad as to be one herself. Their Honors agreed it was next akin to it, and ordered her straightway to prison. After she got there, such a hardened sinner was she, that she denied having ever made a league with Satan, and said she would not have told the court what she did, only her master had* whipped her most grievously to make her do so, and catching his eye at that minute, she was afeard of the same punishment again, which was surely no worse than she deserved. And what a maracle it was, that as soon as she was taken away, the poor afflicted girls sat up, and looked pleasant and satisfied. But just as the crowd was beginning to clear out, the minister's daughter took to swooning again, and foamed at her mouth, like a barrel of hop-beer a working. And Cousin Jehoshaphat, can you imagine my situation, when I heard her exclaim, 'Jehiel Wigglesworth! Jehiel Wigglesworth! he afflicts me!' Oh! I screamed as loud as she, and took to my heels to run out of the Court House, thinking I'd get home like a streak of lightning, to father's. But they seized hold of me, and dragged me before the judges. Things swam round me, and I was afeard the floor would cleave asunder, and let me into the suller. So I held fast on to the sheriffs, and they grabbed just as tight hold of me, so I was just like a crittur shot up in a vice. But when the Chief Judge ax'd me in a terrible voice. 'how do you afflict this young maid?' I found marvelous strength to reply, 'Please your honor, I never did offend her, in thought, word or deed, saving once, when about six weeks ago, I s'pose I did occasion her some sort of worriment, by telling her mother, who ax'd me the question, that I did see her take apples in her work-bag, from a cart that brought some to the door to sell. But then, she would not a took them, if we had a bought 'em for her to eat, and she declared she never touch'd one on 'em, I do s'pose she forgot it. So, 'cause my memory happened to be rather better than hers, she was huffy to me, for two or three weeks, which was no more than natural, your honor, and then she seemed to get over her hard thoughts. Most sartinly, this is the only time, in which I crossed her, since I have abode under her father's ruff.'

"Then the Court ordered me to walk straight up to her, and look her in the face, whereat she shrieked so, and vowed that I tore her vitals, that my heart misgive me and I begun to wonder whether I had not some how or other, made a league and a covenant with the Old One, and known nothing about it. Howsoever, I would not confess, though they took vast pains to make me. Whereupon, they said I was obstinate, and commanded me to jail. Then she come immediately out of her fits, and was as cherk and cherry as a bird out of the snare of the fowler. Oh, the wearisome days and nights that past over me in that house of bondage. But plenty of good company come there, afore midsummer. We was like a bee-hive, at swarming time. From the dens around I'd hear the poor prisoners bemoaning themselves, and saying, 'Oh! that we'd never told such a falsehood, as to confess that we was witches, and so wronged our own soul.' And then, the crying of children would pierce through my very heart, for there was some shut up there, not over eight or ten years old. Father and mother got a seat in neighbor Lynch's wagon, and come down to Salem jail to see me. We was all cast down, bad enough, to meet in such a dolesome hole. 'O Jehiel,' said the old lady, 'confess, do pray confess, for they tell me, all that confess they are witches, get set at liberty, and all the rest are hanged without marcy, for a stiff-necked & hard-hearted generation.' 'Says I, Mother,' 'would ye have me confess dealings with the wicked Sarpent, when 'ta'nt true?' 'O—I don't know,' says she, 'but do be sure, and save your life: there a'n't nothing so bad as death.' 'Why, now, mother,' says I, 'I remember you broke me of telling lies, when I was a small youngster. I don't think I shall begin again, at this time of day. And I guess there is something as bad as death, and worse too, namely, the lake that burns with fire and brimstone.'"

"'There,' said the father, 'did not I tell you 'twould be so? Jehiel was always a good boy to larn the New Testament by heart: and now ye see he's got it in his heart. So, give over tempting him mammy.'

"I should have thought," said Jones, "that Aunt Jemima might have given you better advice. A professor of religion as she is. She must have been worse blinded and bewitched, than even you was."

"I felt desperate heavy," continued the parrator, "when our folks left me, and went and curl'd down in the corner, upon my heap of straw. But I found some comfort in a bit of old gammon, and bread and cheese they brought me, which was much better than the jail victuals. It was the latter part of August that five of the prisoners was taken out and hanged.—One of them was a grand minister, Mr. George Burroughs, who they condemned because he had almost the strength of a giant, which he must have got from the powers of darkness, for he was real slim and slender made. But never shall I forget the awful 22d of September.—Then we was all summoned to look out and see eight of our miserable comrades marched to the gallows.

"First walked Martha Corey, paler than ashes, whose husband had been pressed to death with heavy weights, because he refused to plead when he was indicted before the Honorable Court. The next was Mary Easty, who writ the most beautiful letter to the judges and ministers, declaring her innocence, and who when she took the last leave of her husband, and children, and friends, was said to look as calm and holy as an angel.—Close behind, come Goody Parker, with her hood partly drawn over her face, and her lips moving in prayer; and Ann Pudeator, with the large tears, like hail-stones, rolling down her face; and Margaret Scott, with the ruddy bloom still upon her cheeks, whom all the young men had so admired for her beauty. There was Wilmot Reed, too. with whom I had played at school, and Goodman Wardwell, who was accused by his own wife and daughter, and a broken-hearted man he seemed, with his head hanging down upon his breast. Last of all, with a fresh goodly countenance, walked Mary Parker, stepping lightly, as if she knew she was about to rise above her enemies, to a heavenly home. She it was who spoke so bold to the Rev. Mr. Noyes, when he bade her confess the sin of witchcraft. 'I am no more a witch than you are a wizard: and if you take away my life, God will give you blood to drink.' Oh! how my heart sank within me, and cold chills ran through all my veins, to see them walking along with the bright sun, and the clear blue sky over their heads, which they was never more to behold. And I said to myself, make haste, and get out of this strong hold, or you will be dealt with in like manner. In the afterpart of that memorable day, there came a pious, good minister, to preach to the poor prisoners, and exhort them to search into the plague of their own hearts, while yet it was a time of hope. We, in the upper story, flocked together into the largest cell to hear him. He spoke exceeding well, and had a wonderful smooth delivery, but had only got as far as sixteenthly, when down fell Molly Lacey in a fit, a curious, talking creature, who had charged both her mother and grandmother, with witchcraft, and got them both into jail with her.—Down she fell, calling out the name of Mr. Williard, a grand Boston minister, and the names of some of the highest powers of the State, saying they had a commission from the prince of darkness to afflict, and to burn her flesh from her bones, with fire. Great was the stir, indeed; and when I saw the jailer was as busy as the rest on 'em, I watched my chance, and glided down stairs, like a sperrit. But when I reached the second story, the door was locked so tight, that the old dragon himself could not start it. I made for the window, through which we had looked at the poor, condemned people in the morning, and lo! it was left a little open, to admit a morsel of air. 'Jehiel Wigglesworth!' said I, 'cast yourself down from thence. Is it not as well to grind your bones to powder, as to have your neck stretched by these Philistines?' So, I snatched up the minister's broad-brimmed hat, which had been left on the stairway, and thrust it on my head, thinking I would not go into etarnity with a broken skull, if I could help it. But what do you think appeared, just at that critical minute? A huge load of hay, passing directly under, and nobody in sight. As quick as thought, I leaped down upon it, and kiver'd myself up in the cutest manner. The boy who drove, was wandering along in front, and gazing around, but hearing a strange sound, as I plunged down, gave his cattle a stroke or two, and said, 'Gee up, Dimond, what d'ye start for? D'ye see any Salem witches?' Then, whistling, he went on with his load, while the sweet smell of the new-mown hay, and the fresh air, that I had not breathed so long, and the thought that I had got out of that dismal den of lamentation, though but for one half hour, even if they dragged me back the next, made both my heart and head so lightish, that I could scarcely keep from outright singing and shouting. But I took care to hold the minister's hat well under the hay, lest some of his parishioners might know it, and hunt me out. I observed the boy, after a while, to be looking round, and calling 'Jehu!—Jehu!' Thinks I to myself, Jehu and Jehiel are pretty much alike. So when we'd got past the house where I used to live, I takes courage, and says, 'What do you want? Don't ye see that I'm upon the hay!' 'On the hay!' said he. 'How in the world did ye get there and I not know it?' 'Why forty people might have got up and down, and stole half the hay too, while you have been loitering along, gazing at every thing, and every body.' 'You ha'n't done all your arrants, have ye?' 'Yes, indeed, long ago.' 'Well, then, get down and drive the team. Don't you know master said, Tim, you must drive till you get through the thickest of Salem town, and when Jehu has done my business there, he shall see to the cattle. So, make haste, and come down, for I'm as tired as a dog.' 'And don't you think I'm tired too, trotting through all the lanes like a camel, while you have been lounging along, more asleep than awake?' 'I declare you shall get down now, Jehu,' said the lad, beginning to climb up the load. 'I'll tell you what it is, Tim,' said I, 'the great pitch-fork is here, and if you come up before I give you leave, I'll catch you on it. But if you'll only drive fast and good, until we get out of sight of them housen yonder, I've a clever cling-stone peach here, that I'll give you, and you shall ride all the rest of the way.' 'O yes, to be sure, out of sight of them housen! why that a'n't a quarter of a mile from the place where the man lives that's bought the rowin. You're a real cross-grain'd beast, to make me do more than master says.' So he walked along, muttering. When we'd got about through the thick settled part, I called out suddenly, 'Oh! what a wretch I am, to forget. Run, Tim, run, as fast as you ever can, to Squire Larkins' store, at the second corner, and bring a small bottle of sperrit, I left standing on the horse-block. I'm awful afeard somebody has drink'd it up, afore now. Come, gallop, that's a good fellow, and if you happen to take a small swig out on't, I won't tell master.' Off he set, like a catamount, and no sooner was he out of sight, than I was down, and a running faster than he, for I was dumb afeard that he'd meet the real Jehu, and both together take after me, like Jehu of old, pursuing the false prophets. I struck into the woods and hid till after dark, and then took the road, and travelled right manfully all night. It made me down-hearted to think I could not go to father's, as I know that was the fust place that naturally sarch after me, and I seemed to be in a worse box than the returning prodigal. While I was doubting where to shape my course, I remembered that cousin Jehoshaphat Jones, who had always been a true friend, had hired himself out to some Huguenot bodies, who lived in an out-of-the-way sort of a hole, and thought if I could once get there, I might stand a good chance to be hid, in such an outlandish abode. So I turned my steps hitherward. But O, the torment of hunger that I've endured. Sometimes I have thought I could e'enamost bite a sheep's head off, and eat it with all the wool on. But I have not been altogether easy in my mind, for fear the bears should eat me, when I dropped asleep in the woods, or some ugly rattlesnake give me a mortal wound, or the beastly Indians start out from behind some bush, and scalp me. Yet have I been led through the wilderness in safety, through help from above. I hope the precious minister that I left preaching in the Salem jail, will forgive me for hooking his hat. Its broad brim has been of vast use to me, to dip up water from brooks, and fend off the rain and musquitoes. How real thankful I was, at last, to see a light glimmering here, and looking through the cracks of the corn-house, to be sure that it was Cousin Jehoshaphat, by the side of a great pile of ripe ears. I doubt whether the poor creatures who were drowning in the flood-time, could have been much joyfuller to have set their feet in Noah's ark, than I to behold my blood relation, and stretch my weary limbs on this floor."

When the narrator closed his recital, all his audience expressed warm sympathy for his troubles, and congratulation on his deliverance; and hastened to provide him with fitting refreshment, and a place of repose. It was afterwards decided to offer him refuge among them, with such compensation for his services as should be deemed satisfactory, until "the indignation might be overpast." For some time after this miserable delusion had subsided, he remained among the Huguenot colonists, grateful for their kindness, and pleased with their gentle manners, and reasonable inquisitions.

Afterwards, returning to his native village, he settled for life, in those peaceful agricultural employments to which his ancestors had been inured. He dwelt in rural comfort and happiness, and enjoyed the respect of his neighbors and friends. Some lingering of superstition, continued through life to mingle with that shrewdness and simplicity which so often mark the Yankee character, and when in long winter evenings, beside a blazing fire, he recounted to his astonished children, the evils to which he had been exposed, and from which he was so mercifully rescued, he never failed to bespeak their heartfelt gratitude, that they had never been brought under the domination of the powers of darkness, or the sore sin of witchcraft.

WESTERN RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

WEDNESDAY, ... JUNE 10, 1840.

We give the following distressing account of the condition of Augusta and Hamburg from the Charleston (S. C.) Mercury of the 29th ult. In the same paper of the 30th it is stated there was no abatement of the flood.

SCHOULTZ'S HILL,
Hamburg, May 27, 1840.

Dear Sir—On arriving at the Hill, near Hamburg, this afternoon at 5 o'clock, to my great astonishment I found the river so high, as to be running over the Rail Road, and through all of our Depositories, and the goods from the stores of Hamburg floating up against the Rail Road. The Cotton from Sullivan's, Cobb and Kernaghan's ware houses floating down through our field: the inhabitants of Hamburg, fleeing for their lives in canoes, batteux and rafts; many of the families have taken shelter in Mr. Hubbard's house, which was entirely surrounded by water; and from what I could learn, the water over his lower floor several feet; while most of the females and children had been removed to places of security; a boat was plying to bring out such persons as had remained in order to save some of their goods; a number had retired to the second story of their houses; the whole ridge of highland in market street is now covered, and the water is still rising; since 10 o'clock this morning the rise has been near 8 feet perpendicular—stock of all kinds swimming in various directions, in fact I cannot find language to describe the scene. From Augusta I learn that the water is running through Broad street. About one half of the new Bridge has been swept away. The Savannah river was never known to be as high as at present, and it is still rising; we had incessant rains on Monday night, Tuesday and last night, it fell in torrents, this, together with the heavy rains that fell on Sunday afternoon and Sunday night has produced so unusual a freshet. While I am writing, (10 o'clock, P. M.) I hear persons calling for assistance, and it is impossible to render them any; at this moment, Mr. Schultz comes in and reports that the lower Bridge is swept away. The foregoing is all that I can say at present in relation to Hamburg and Augusta. The road has received much damage between Aiken and Hamburg—the mill-dams from Barions to Mittons, have been swept away, since the passenger train passed down this morning, the bridge of the road over Horse creek has been very much damaged, so as to render a change of engines at that place. This afternoon we passed the baggage and passenger cars over by hand, deeming it too hazardous to risk the weight of the engines over the bridges. The passengers up took shelter at Mr. Schultz's house on the hill. The females I have sent out to Major Stark's—the gentlemen will remain here to night, although Mr. Schultz cannot give them victuals or beds; I procured them supper in the neighborhood, and hope they will be perfectly satisfied as they are in security while many of our fellow men are in great peril.

The road from the Hamburg Depository to the hill must be greatly damaged, as much of the embankment is swept away; and the whole road under water. The goods in store at the Company's Depository has been put into a large car, as also the books and papers of the Company. The lime which was brought up a few days ago, remains in the Depository, and of course is destroyed or very much damaged; this intelligence I got from one of the hands employed at the Depository who made his way out from the passenger house upon the road, after the water had broken over it, he says, he left Mr. Sturges and the Clerks in the Depository, but thinks they were taken to the bridge in a canoe about 6 o'clock this evening.

I must close this lamentable catastrophe for the present, and will give you the state of the river, &c. to-morrow morning before the cars leave, if they can be sent out at all; many interesting circumstances in relation to the damage done to the road you can obtain from Eldridge. Mr. Brees has been at Horse creek during the day.

May 28, 5 o'clock, A. M.

The river is higher this morning than when I closed last night:—from what I can see there is only one or two arches of the bridge gone, the wheels of the freight cars appear to be under water as the cars stand on the tract at the depot.

I shall send out the conductor to Horse creek, and if he can get over on the road, he will go out to Aiken and from there take the passenger cars and return to Charleston, it is impossible to send out the cars from Hamburg as the road beyond there is covered with water.

FURTHER PARTICULARS FROM NATCHEZ.—By the steamer Swallow, we have received New Orleans papers down to the 14th, and Natchez papers to the 15th.—In the latter we have in full the official accounts of the Committees appointed to investigate the extent of the loss of lives and property by the late Tornado. The total number of dead bodies that had been taken from the ruins already, amounted to 41: to this amount must be added the lives lost on the river, which is estimated at 250, making the total deaths, in round numbers, 300. The loss of buildings is estimated at rising of $1,000,000; and of merchandise, practical men think that $4,000,000 will fall short of the real loss, as immense quantities of lard, pork, bacon, lead, corn, flour, and groceries were stored at the landing and in flat boats. The number of flat boats already ascertained to be lost, amounts to 60; and the whole number it is thought will finally be found to amount to about 100: on account of this great loss of life amongst the boatmen, there will be mourning all along the banks of the Mississippi. Ohio, and Wabash. New Orleans, Grand Gulf, Rodney, Vicksburg, and other river towns had promptly and nobly come forward to the relief of the sufferers, by liberal contributions; amongst others, we notice that two merchants at New Orleans had each contributed five hundred dollars.—Cin. Chronicle.

COUNTERFEITERS ARRESTED.—On Thursday evening last, two young gentlemen, who say their names are Thos. Webb and Jesse Jones, arrived in this place, from the West, and tarried until Friday morning. During their stay in town, they had managed to put off $20 bills in payment of small sums, and received their change in good money. Sometime after their departure, it was discovered that the bills were spurious, when they were immediately pursued by Messrs. Converse and Weaver, who succeeded in arresting them near Summerfield, in Clark county. They were bro't back to this place on Friday evening—underwent an examination on Saturday, and recognized in the sum of $800 each; in default of which they were committed for trial at the next term of the Court of Common Pleas. About $200 of counterfeit paper was found upon them, the principal part of which was $20's on the Bank of Illinois, at Shawnetown, letter D., payable to various persons and of various dates, engraved by W. Dane & Co.—are not an imitation of the genuine notes of the same Bank, although the general appearance is something like that of the true note: Centre vignette, a steamboat, with railroad cars, &c. in the distance; on the left end, in a circle, is a cottage girl with a basket on her left arm, and in the distance a view of a farm house, &c.; over which, and within the circle, "1,000,000 owned by the State,"—on the right hand end is a representation of a schooner, with two men aloft furling the fore top-sail; over which is "1,700,000 Capital." Signatures and filling up badly done.—This bank has never issued any notes with the names of W. Dane & Co. as engravers. The balance of the paper found with them, consisted of $3's on the Bank of Marietta, letter A., badly done, and $3's on the Northern Bank of Kentucky, letter A., badly executed. These chaps have no doubt put a considerable amount of this money in circulation on their route, and the public would do well to keep a sharp look out for it.—Urbana Gazette.

WONDERFUL ESCAPE FROM DEATH.—Three or four weeks ago a Mr. Ladd, who was travelling on foot in Iowa territory, near Fort Madison, was fallen in with by three other men, to whom, in the course of conversation, he imparted the knowledge of his having four or five hundred dollars about him, which he was going to pay in at the land office. The three strangers instantly determined to obtain the money, and on their reaching a broken part of the country attacked Mr. L. with clubs and knives, killed him as they though, robbed him, threw him into a ravine, covered him with brush, and then continued on their journey. A rivulet of water flowed down the ravine in which Mr. Ladd lay buried, and the cooling and refreshing element coming in contact with his wounded head, had the effect of cleansing the wounds and restoring him to life. Knowing the route of the robbers he instantly set out in pursuit of them—reached Fort Madison, where he heard they had descended the river—procured a skiff—reached St. Louis, and in an hour or two apprehended two of the ruffians. The third had not yet reached the city, and was arrested on landing a sort time afterward. The villains were the next day taken back to Iowa, and the Court being in session were instantly tried, convicted, and sent to the Penitentiary, one for 5 years; another for 10, and the third for 23. How much of the money Mr. L. was able to recover we have not heard.—Peoria Reg.

MURDER.—On Thursday night, a murder is said to have been committed by John Rox the man who was convicted in December, 1838. for the same crime, for which he was afterwards pardoned by the Governor. It appears that Rox and the deceased were at a meeting for nominating Commissioners of the District of Kensington, and having some difference, the latter taunted Rox with being a "scapegoat"—"prison bird" and used other slang phrases, reflecting upon his previous criminality. Rox made no immediate attack upon him; but, it is said, went quickly off; he stealthily returned, however, having in his hands what is termed a "cord stick," and cautiously getting behind the deceased, struck him a blow so severe that it is said the top of the skull is entirely detached from the lower portions. The man died immediately; and the accused was placed in confinement, where he still remains, and will unless brought out by habeas corpus.—United States Gazette.

TOBACCO.—I am happy to learn that there has been a great reformation in some of our preachers in regard to the use of tobacco. I think not only ministers of the Gospel, but all who love our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, should deny themselves, by immediately leaving off its use. I was in the habit of smoking tobacco for about ten years. The power of habit became so strong, that it seemed almost impossible to break it off. I tried to screen or justify myself for indulging in it, but I could not succeed. Thoughts ran through my mind like these: "You profess to be a christian, and yet go about with a pipe in your mouth! What an example to set before precious youth." I could not enjoy my mind and my pipe; therefore I resolved about three years and a half ago to break off the habit, and succeeded. I am satisfied it is a needless self-indulgence, and very injurious to the health of our bodies, and to the happiness of our minds.—American Wesleyan Ob.

EXECUTION OF STONE.—In accordance with the sentence of the Court, John Stone, found guilty of the murder of Mrs. Lucretia Thompson, on Sunday the 26th ult., will be hung one week from next Friday, between the hours of 12 M. and 5 P. M. We understand that Stone is an old offender, has been imprisoned in Canada and New York, and has the marks of hand-cuffs on his wrists now. It is reported, by several who have visited him, that he acknowledges the murder, and expresses a willingness to die, believing in no retribution beyond the grave. Thus will he be executed in one month and three days after he, in the most shocking manner, put to death a female for not yielding to his unholy desires.

EXECUTION.—Jabez Fuller was executed at White Plains, Westchester county, on the 22d ult. He was sentenced to this awful punishment for the murder of a female, nearly a year since. The murder was committed in a drunken frolic.

SANTA FE TRADERS.—A company of Santa Fe traders, in all 40 wagons, have arrived at Independence, Mo. Mr. Messervey, of St. Louis, has reached home in good health and spirits. The company brings back gold, silver, &c.

ZANESVILLE.

WEDNESDAY, ... JUNE 10, 18

We had some white frost on Monday morni but it did no injury.

Akron is to be the county seat for the n county of Summit.

Thomas Corwin, the whig candidate for gov nor of this State, is expected to spend the 4th July in this town.

The machines used in the eastern cities, watering the streets, are called Espys,—in al sion to the rain maker.

On the 24th inst. there will be a celebrati and the corner stone of the Masonic Hall a Methodist Episcopal Church of Massillon will laid.

Eli Holmes and Philip Thurman were both k ed, by the unexpected discharge of a cannon, a political meeting in Wilmington, Ohio, the 22d ult.

A Mr. Babcock, of Huron county, Ohio, a lever of universal salvation, recently put an e to his life, by cutting his throat, which it is lieved he had determined on for some time.

THE CASKET for June is received. Besides usual amount of interesting matter it is or mented with the summer fashions splendidly ecuted, a handsome steel engraving and two ges of music.

A new and splendid bridge has recently be completed across the Allegheny river from Ha street, Pittsburgh,—making the fourth brid imcluding the aqueduct, over that stream wi in one mile.

Neil, Moore & Co. have put on an opposit line of stages from Zanesville to Marietta, a have reduced the fare from $4 to $1.50. If th succeed in running off their competitors it probable they will put the fare at something l six dollars.

We attended a camp-meeting, some fourte miles from Zanesville, in the north eastern p of this county, on Sabbath last. There w something like twenty-six tents, new and co fortable, a large congregation on Sabbath, a the best of order. The last time we visited t neighborhood, some eight or nine years sin there were but a few families of Protest Methodists within ten or fifteen miles of t place. We were astonished at the accession our strength in that quarter.

Says a writer on "Christian Union," in t Baptist Register, "I should as soon think of be ing a child to make him love me, as to atten to ridicule a man out of his errors."

We are satisfied that "ridicule" is a far m efficient and powerful corrector of the follies mankind than grave moral lectures. There nothing that man so much dreads as the ke lashes of wit and irony. With those weapo Steele and Addison did more towards reformi London of her follies and vanities than the l tures of her thousand clergy.

We have received the first number of t "ANTI-SLAVERY REPORTER," which is to be t organ of the "American and Foreign An Slavery Society," recently formed out of t minority of the late meeting of the "An Slavery Society" at New York, to which alluded in our last. The following extract fr the "Reporter" alludes to the cause of the s paration:

"The acting President nominated a wom on the business committee, associated with elev men. On a division of the house on the questi of her appointment, it appeared that 1008 me bers were present and voted; of whom 557 vot in her favor, and 451 in the negative, being majority of 106 in her favor. Had the men o voted in this case, the decision would have be reversed. This was considered a test vote the relative strength of the 'woman's right and constitutional parties, assembled; and it w believed, that the act of placing a woman on t business committee, was merely an initiato step to the introduction of other measures. FO EIGN to the original principles and designs of t anti-slavery enterprise, all tending to divert t minds of abolitionists from the cause of the sla and the rights of the free people of color. was thought, that it would be in vain to attem a reversal of this decision or to expect a chan for the better; that meetings thus constitut would not consent to alterations of the Const tution defining the word 'person' to mean me or to substitute a representative system for t usual collection of members in a disproportio ate number from one locality, thus leaving t door open (as was done this year) for a packe delegation; that persons of such different mor affinities could not, advantageously, labor toget er; and that Providence seemed to indicate th it was a duty, for peace sake, as well as for oth considerations, to separate from those who seem ed to be rendering the anti-slavery cause a object of dislike to a large number of influenti and excellent citizens. Several men, nominate to serve on the business committee, immediate declined serving, in consequence of the act of t majority, and others afterwards withdrew. The stated, that the innovation seemed to them r pugnant to the constitution of the Society- that it was throwing a fire-brand into anti-slaver meetings—that it was contrary to the usages the civilized world—and that it tended to de stroy the efficacy of female anti-slavery action.

"But the question of 'woman's rights' is no the only matter of difference between the adhe rents to the old society, and the friends of th new association; nor is it the chief cause of th difficulty, though it happened to come up firs and prominently at the late annual meeting.- At the formation of the American Anti-Slaver Society, the lawfulness of human government wa recognized, and it was a fundamental principle that political action was both expedient and proper Recently, however, the same persons belongin to the anti-slavery ranks, who are contending fo what they call 'woman's rights'—the civil an political equality of women with men—deny th obligation of forming, supporting, or yieldin obedience to civil government, and refuse to af firm the DUTY of political action; and they cou trived to bring to the late annual meeting of th Society a sufficient number of men and women to compose a majority of all the members present to sustain their views and measures. Of th whole number present this year, four hundred and sixty-four were from the single State of Mas thusetts! Styling themselves 'non-resistants,' d professing to be opposed to all physical force, ther of offence or defence."

THE WHEAT CROP.

The state of the wheat crop is such, in this inity, at present, that you may form a tolerr correct opinion of what it promises. Judgt from the samples we have examined there ll be scarcely half a crop. We give from our hanges what is said about the prospect elsere.

"The Wheat Crop in Ohio.—We regret to ceive that from every part of the State great plaints are made of the destructive ravages the fly. Some think that the crop is nearly f cut off."—Ohio Statesman.

"In many parts of the State we hear of ravas by the fly among the growing grain. This is d to be the case in Clark, Champaign and milton counties. In this county some damh has been done. The Michigan papers speak a promising harvest. As a general rule, the ent of mischief to crops is overrated. We e it may prove so in the present case. Our counts from the North represent the prospect the farmer as fair."—Ohio State Journal.

The Wheat Crop.—The complaints of the ages of the fly are becoming more general.—e Annapolis Republican of Wednesday has following paragraph:

"Two or three weeks ago we referred to the en very promising appearance of the wheat ps. Since that, a most woful change has en developed. Whole fields that then bid fair an abundant yield, it is now evident, will t return the seed that was sown upon them.—e fly has made tremendous havoc in all our ighborhood."

Having visited a number of townships in this unty, we observe that the fly has very much in- ed the wheat in many places. Similar ravages e been committed in other counties, as will pear from the following extracts.—Morgan unty Standard.

Wheat Crop—The Fly.—Accounts from sev- l parts of the county represent that the fly is mmitting great ravages upon the rising crops of eat. In many places so much so as to induce eir owners to plough them up. In Stark coun- we learn also, that the ravage of the fly is re general than ever before known.—O. Repos.

In Pennsylvania similar complaints are begin- g to be made:

"The Growing Crop.—We regret to learn m various sections of the country that the ssian Fly has already made its appearance in wheat fields.—In Bucks county it has done me injury."—Philadelphia North American.

In Chester county, the Village Record, of the th ult. says—"We are informed that much of wheat crop which two weeks since looked ve flourishing, has been attacked by the fly, which uffering severely."

Hessian Fly.—The West Chester American ar, of the 19th May says—"We regret to learn m farmers in our vicinity that this destructive sect is ravaging the wheat fields to a consider- e extent."—Charleston Mercury.

Wheat Crop.—During the past and present ek, we have seen several old farmers, residing different directions from us, who agree in eir statements, that the wheat fields are near- destroyed by the Hessian Fly. Hundreds of es will not be reaped at all; some ploughed up d others turned to pasture. In the most fer- e parts of the country, the prospects are the st gloomy.—Troy (O.) Times.

The Hessian Fly.—We extract the following ragraph from the Cincinnati Daily Republican the 18th ult. We regret to add that an in- ligent gentleman of Rostraver township, in s county, informs us that the fly is destroying e wheat extensively in that township:

"An intelligent gentleman in Butler county tes to us, 'that the flies are destroying the wing wheat crops throughout this whole region. number of farmers have already commenced ughing it up—scarcely a field has escaped.'— e regret that we are under the necessity of nfirming this unfavorable account of the wheat ps by recent intelligence from Kentucky. We rned on Saturday, in conversation with some elligent farmers from Bourbon county, that e ravages of the fly are very extensive in that e region. We learn, also, by a gentleman m Virginia, who informs us that the fly is be- ming to shew itself there extensively. The ntz bug is also appearing there; an insect ich carries destruction in its train."

The Hessian Fly.—The last Wheeling Times s:—"The Hessian Fly did, during the last nth, some damage to wheat, but the fly has w vanished and the grain is again putting out ely. The appearances are very favorable for a e crop."

Wheat.—We are informed much of the wheat p which two weeks since looked very flourish- g has been attacked by the fly, and that it is w suffering severely.—Mt. Pleasant, Pa., Reg.

The Crops.—We have noticed complaints in veral papers of the appearance of the "fly" in e wheat crops in some sections, and private in- mation from Delaware and the Eastern Shore Maryland assures us that such is the fact ere. As a per contra to these statements, the ichigan papers speak of the splendid appear- ce of the wheat crops in that State; and the itor of one of the Doylestown papers says:—We have visited several portions of Bucks unty, and we never saw the crops look better the season. The wheat and rye crops now omise to yield abundantly, and the grass crop omises well."—New World, N. Y.

The following is the article that our Bro. Boyd, the Methodist Episcopal Church, requested to publish for him. Out of respect to his quest we will give it; but we cannot let it pass thout a few remarks thereon. We do not ex- ct to do justice to all the subjects to which he udes, for this would take a volume, but merely give a glance at a few of them:

From the American Wesleyan Observer.

RADICALISM AND ABOLITIONISM.

It is sometimes asserted, and more frequently sinuated, that modern abolitionism is now oc- pying the same place in the M. E. Church as d radicalism a few years ago. And according- the fate of the former is often held up as a rning to those who would embark in the lat- r; and this very hint is sufficient to frighten rge numbers in the M. E. Church from even ming in sight of the supposed destroyer. This my humble opinion was the object of Doctor ngs in the last of his Union numbers,* though evidently felt backward to say this, in just so any words. A little attention however cannot il to convince any plain honest man that the o cases are quite dissimilar.

1. Radicalism originated in, and was confined , the Methodist Episcopal Church. But abo- tionism originated in the community at large, d exists in various branches of the church.— ould we this moment strike every abolitionist t the M. E. Church from the list, they would arcely be missed. And no doubt but this good use would advance to certain victory, even ould every Methodist and every Methodist eacher desert its colors.

2. Radicalism, as it existed under Mr. M'Caine, was hostile to the M. E. Church; representing our episcopal form of government as being surrepticiously assumed, through the intrigues of Coke and Asbury, and saddled upon the American Methodists under the professed sanction of Mr. Wesley, while in fact it was contrary to his views and wishes. In short, the whole movement at the time of the secession was an effort to prostrate the M. E. Church, and erect their new organization upon its ruins. But on the other hand, while abolitionism, in itself, meddles not with episcopacy, or any form of church government, neither does its advocates in the M. E. Church go against episcopacy, or any other feature in our economy—the USURPATION of slavery alone excepted. It is not denied that some individuals, prominent abolitionists in our church, may demur against episcopacy. But to charge this to their abolitionism, would be as unfair as to charge the anti-abolitionism of some radicals to their hostility to episcopacy. I think then, that all who will look candidly at the facts in the case must see that it is high time to abandon the notion that abolitionists, as such, are either necessarily friends or enemies of episcopacy, or the M. E. Church. The fact is, both the firmest friends and most inveterate enemies of the M. E. Church, are to be found in the ranks of abolitionism.

Perhaps it may be urged, that a large portion of the prominent abolitionists in the ministry of our church have very nearly copied the example of the reformers of past years, by opposing our bishops and other chief ministers. As many have been imposed upon by this association, I crave the reader's attention to the following particulars; 1st. A large share of the opposition of the Reformers of 1827, lay against the characters and motives of our chief ministers.—And besides, these things were urged against those who were laid in the silent grave. But in the representations of abolitionists, nothing but errors are even alleged, and this while the men are living, and have every opportunity to explain and defend themselves.

2d. The facts in the movements of our chief ministers, against which abolitionists complain, have originated since the days of Radicalism; and are altogether new in the history of Methodism, or even the history of the M. E. Church. When, previous to the date of the famous Counter Appeal, did some half dozen of our chief ministers ever unite to write an apology for slavery under any circumstances; or undertake to make the holy bible sanction injustice and oppression? Or when previous to 1837 did any of our bishops attempt to justify slaveholding, in any shape or form, by our Lord's golden rule? Or when, previous to the last General Conference, did one part of our episcopacy hinder a Northern Conference to speak out against slavery, and another part of the episcopacy at the same time permit a Southern Conference to speak in favor of it, and in opposition to the plain letter of our Discipline? Or did any of our old or young preachers ever hear of our bishops previous to the last session of the Pittsburgh Conference, declare in open conference, that they had yet for the first time to advise any man to free his slaves; and that when consulted on this very point, they advised a brother not to emancipate his slaves, even when the proposed emancipation was connected with settling the liberated blacks on tenements of their own? These are only a few out of many cases that might be adverted to in the sayings and doings of our chief ministers, during the last six or seven years.

And now in proclaiming against these things, we are not willing to admit that we assume an attitude of hostility either to the government of our church, or the characters or motives of our chief ministers. But believing that our opposition to such measures is, to say the least, as Methodical as the course we oppose; and believing the course of our brethren tends to perpetuate the evil of slavery, we are determined to continue our opposition to all such movements in our church.

Lastly, the crusade of the Reformers of 1827 was against episcopacy itself; and this was carried on at the expense of the characters both of the living and the dead. But abolitionists as a body, in the M. E. Church, are in favor of the episcopacy, and believe with Dr. Emory and others, that our episcopal form of government was the creature of Mr. Wesley himself. If a few can be found in the ranks of Methodist abolitionists, who do not admire the episcopal form of church government, or who would at least prefer some modifications in our present form, I presume that the same description, and in equal proportion, are to be found among the anti-abolitionists of our church.

In conclusion, permit me to say, individually, that I have hitherto greatly preferred, and even admired our present form of government, as best suited to the spread of the Gospel over this vast continent. At the same time I am free to admit that the power possessed by our bishops is capable of being used to great injury for a time. This power, however, is only a delegated one, and can easily be so modified, when necessary, as to prevent any lasting injury: provided the body of the ministry are right themselves.

As to the present incumbents, I still retain an unshaken confidence in the purity of their intentions. Their great object has evidently been to keep the whole church together, North and South. This has been regarded as the MAIN THING. And to this great end every thing else has been made to bend; hence every thing has been done to conciliate the feelings of the South. No doubt but our Bishops love the church as much in the North as the South; therefore what might at first sight appear like partiality, was nothing more than acting out the conviction that the North would grin and BEAR much; while they feared the South would bear nothing.

As to the measures of severity that have been resorted to, in the case of a few bold abolitionists, I believe the object was to frighten a few from their course, and deter others from attempting to follow their example. I do not believe that our bishops and other chief ministers ever yet intended to scatter, tear and slay many hundreds of our most laborious and useful ministers. But much as I yet respect the motives of my opposing brethren of the episcopacy and others, I am constrained to say their policy was bad. A few it is true have quailed into silence, and tamely given up their rights as men, as citizens, as Methodists, and as Methodist preachers. But very few are made of such soft materials. Hence for every one that has thus submitted, probably more than a score have risen up in the spirit of unflinching firmness, until the matter has come to this, that the government of terror must be relinquished, or hundreds of preachers, and thousands of members must be sacrificed. Which course will be pursued, time alone will show.

Never, I am persuaded, would our bishops and others have struggled so hard to justify the evil of slavery under any circumstances, had it not been connected with our church. And surely this is the securest city of refuge to which it has ever fled. But slavery was an INTRUDER at first—it is still such, and I trust the Methodist Church will never consent to make it our bond of union.

ROBERT BOYD.

Barnesville, Ohio, April 25, 1840.

1. He says, "the FATE of Radicalism is often held up as a warning to Abolitionists," and the very "hint is sufficient to frighten" them. Now, we ask our brother, what is that "fate" of these Radicals, which is so very alarming?—Have they, like Noah's dove, found no place for the "sole of their foot," or like Cain, have they became fugitives and vagabonds in the earth? We should like to know what is this "fate" which makes them such a monument of terror? We declare that we can see nothing in their condition that is so alarmingly frightful. He belongs to the Pittsburgh Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and we belong to the Pittsburgh Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church; these two ecclesiastical bodies, in part, cover the same territory. We have not the least doubt but the conference to which we belong entertains as much intelligence, piety and integrity as his own. Or in other words, that it is as comfortable a home for the honest follower of the Cross as can be any where found in his own church. And we have never felt our church relation, more agreeable since we have born the christian name, than we do at the present. Now, my brother, you have taken this from the cant of your own church, without examination, who have always been representing us as dead, or dying, or miserable, when in your collected and candid moments you know these things to be misrepresentations of our condition.

2. Again, says our friend; "In short, the WHOLE movement at the time of the secession was an effort to prostrate the Methodist Episcopal Church, and erect their new organization upon its ruins." There is not a word of truth in this, yet we are far from accusing the writer of any intentional misrepresentation. The fact is, that he took such an active part in opposition to the seceders, and as we thought, at the time, manifested such an unreasonable zeal against them, that he is incapable of judging in their case.—When our controversy was begun with the Old Church, there was not the most distant thought entertained of leaving her. All that was contemplated was a modification of her government. Her anti-scriptural assumptions were opposed with great ability; and when the men in authority found themselves unable to conceal the nakedness of their system, or resist the force of truth luminously exhibited, they resolved to put an end to the investigation by the expelling process; and in the exercise of a relentless tyranny, which has caused the glory to depart from their Israel, expelled and drove thousands from their fellowship. And after this was done they refined upon the system of Jesuistry, in misrepresenting our prospects, actions, motives and principles, so as to prevent our success. So far from having a desire of forsaking and destroying her, we do most solemnly aver, that we were never called on, since our moral feelings were ripened into being, to make such a sacrifice of feeling and interest, as when we were compelled, by the ruthless hand of power, to leave the church of our spiritual nativity, to seek a home where the order of Providence might direct. And this we believe to be the feeling of at least a large majority of our brethren. Indeed, such were the attachments of the original Reformers to the church, that nineteen out of twenty, forsook both their principles and friends, and still cling to her. And now, to represent those men, who have exhibited more integrity to principle than most men are capable of, as a set of Goths and Vandals, to say the least about it, we think extremely unkind. After we were placed, by the exercise of assumed and anti-scriptural power, in such a situation that we had no other alternative but to make another home, we did the best we could for ourselves, consistently with truth and righteousness. But that we attempted to build up our church on the ruins of the old, or to succeed by impeaching the "character and motives of the chief ministers" of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is a charge which is perfectly gratuitous, and we challenge any man in that church, to sustain it by facts. That a few of our people may have acted wilful, that others may have occasionally, but unintentionally mistated facts, is probable. But that there was any thing like a spirit of misrepresentation is wholly incorrect; nor was it necessary to misrepresent, for there were facts enough in the history of our affairs, to make out as bad a case as was needed, without forging them.

3. Once more. "The crusade of the Reformers was against the episcopacy itself." We are really astonished that our brother B. should undertake to investigate a subject on which he appears to be so uninformed. We invite him to hunt up the old "Wesleyan Repository" & "Mutual Rights." He will find the writers in those periodicals expressed themselves as cautious on the subject of episcopacy, as do the writers of the "Observer." They would have been perfectly satisfied with a "moderate episcopacy." If laymen had been admitted into the General Conference, and the Presiding Elders made elective, all difficulties would have been adjusted. It is true, the leading writers did not believe that an order of ministers, distinct from and superior to elders, could be sustained by scripture, but they had no particular objection to admit such an order on the ground of expediency, if they would permit their powers to be properly limited and defined. It is also true, when they were placed in a situation that they could form a government, unembarrassed by circumstances, the Reformers chose to have no bishops, because the history of the church satisfied them they had ever been an injury rather than a blessing. It was the sentiment of the late Rev. John Waterman, of the old fellowship, that "Bishops have been the curse and scourge of the church in every age."

4. Says Bro. B. "Radicalism as it existed under Mr. McCaine." "Radical!" what is this but an invidious term of reproach employed by our adversaries to make us look ridiculous? Now, we ask our brother, does using such reproachful terms comport with the character of the philanthropist and the christian? "As it existed under Mr. McCaine." How disingenuous! Our cause did not originate with Mr. McCaine,—he never had any control over it, nor has any of our conferences or conventions ever sanctioned his peculiar notions. Because the Methodist episcopalians, by doing this gentleman great injustice, have succeeded in raising against him a large amount of prejudice, Bro. B. seems to wish to transfer that prejudice to us. O! how unfair.

5. He says, the power of the bishops is "DELEGATED," and thinks it could easily "be modified when necessary," "provided the body of ministers are right themselves." A "delegated power," indeed! Their power has all been assumed, and when laid hold of, they have made use of the creatures which it drew around them, to confirm it in their hands. The proviso above, is very appropriately thrown in. If the "ministers are right." Why, the natural tendency of such assumed and anti-scriptural power, is to drive from the church, or into obscurity, all honest men, and to foster crawling sycophants, who became interested in defending the power where it is, because, in turn, they can wield it for their own accommodation. Our brother seems, scarcely yet, to have learned the first elements of human nature.

6. As it respects the insinuation that the founders of Methodism are slandered by representing them as surreptitiously imposing the present form of government, upon the American Methodists, under the sanction of Mr. Wesley's name; we ask brother B., in all seriousness, if he can really believe that Mr. Wesley ever gave his consent that his name should be erased from the American minutes, and that Mr. Asbury should have the power which he exercised over this connexion. Do you believe that he ever gave his sanction that Mr. Asbury should be ordained a bishop? If our brother can believe these things, we don't want to reason with him; because, so are the facts of the case, it would evince such a perversion of faculty that argument would be thrown away upon him. If then, Mr. Wesley's power was wrested from him without his consent, and the episcopal mitre assumed contrary to his urgent remonstrances,* what else might not follow? To prove the founders of Methodism guilty of these things, is, on the authority of scripture, to prove them capable of any thing else in the premises, for "he that is unjust in that which is little, is unjust also in that which is much." The same principle which leads you one inch over your neighbor's landmark, would lead you a mile. One of Bro. B's favorite papers, Zion's Watchman, for October 19, past, says: "This rule (on Slavery) was not one of Wesley's. It was added by the abolitionists who organized the Methodist Episcopal Church; and it shows how anxious they were to keep slavery out of the church." Now, pray, what was this but forgery, to add a rule to Mr. Wesley's code and impose it on the public under the sanction of his name. And, there can be no doubt but the Watchman is correct, because the first European editions of the general rules have not the article on Slavery, and being written for the use of the English Methodists, where no slavery existed, would not be likely to refer to the subject. They who forged that article would forge other things to suit their own purpose.—These are serious matters we admit, but if true, it is no slander for Mr. McCaine or any one else, to state them. It is a very easy way to get rid of an unpalitable truth to cry out "slander! slander!!" And bear it in mind, also, my brother, that neither Mr. McCaine, nor any one else, alluded to the "pious dead," until the cause of truth made it necessary. When the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church were called on to relinquish some of their immense prerogatives, they were continually responding that their form of government was given them by Mr. Wesley, and to alter it would be abandoning primitive Methodism. Such impressions had a powerful influence with all who held a veneration for Mr. Wesley Mr. McCaine being satisfied that the public were imposed on by such representations, felt it to be his duty to expose the subject, that truth might have its proper influence. We have read the controversy between him and his opponents, and it is our honest conviction, that in his main positions, he has ably sustained himself.

7. We have occasionally seen our Bro. Boyd, but have not the privilege of a personal acquaintance with him, yet we are well acquainted with his public character. For honesty, integrity and perseverance he is excelled by few men. His great defect is, in having faculties to perceive some truths with great clearness, but no vision at all to see others of equal importance. But the tenor of the article before us, seems to justify the conclusion, that the firmness of his nerves, at the present, is severely tested. It looks very much like quailing before the gathering storm. In reference to the Bishops, he expresses the most "unshaken confidence in the purity of their intentions," and feeds them so with soft corn, that it seems like trying to propitiate them. But, it will not all do, my brother, you will have either to make an unqualified surrender of yourself, or forever remain in the ban of the empire. As it respects charity, that is a highly commendable christian virtue, but like every thing else it may be carried too far. It is very reprehensible for a man to carry his liberality so far as to throw the mantle of charity over every abomination and unrighteousness. So did not our Lord. The Bishops may be good men; we pass no judgment upon them, we leave them in the hands of "the judge of all the earth," who, with them and with us all, "will do right." They may have abused power less than many other men would have done in their situation. Be that as it may, that they have arrogated to themselves unscriptural authority, and that they have often acted the tyrant, are facts that honest men should not shrink from declaring, when the cause of truth called for it.

If we have been plain in these remarks, we intend nothing unkind to our brother Boyd. All we aim at is self-defence. As the "Observer" has given publicity to brother B.'s article, will it give a place to our reply?

*Read the following letter addressed to Mr. Asbury, bearing date,

"LONDON, September 20, 1788.

"But in one point, my dear brother, I am a little afraid both you and the doctor (Coke) differ from me. I study to be little, you to be great; I creep, you strut along. I found a school, you a college. Nay, and call it after your own names! O beware! Do not seek to be something! Let me be nothing, and Christ be all in all.

"One instance, of this your greatness, has given me great concern. How can you, how dare you suffer yourself to be called a BISHOP? I shudder, I start at the very thought! Men may call ME a knave, or a fool, a rascal, a scoundrel, and I am content; but they shall never, by my consent, call me a BISHOP. For my sake, for God's sake, for Christ's sake, put a full end to this. JOHN WESLEY."

ITEMS.

Colon C. Newcomb, whose presence in the city we were some time since the first to assert, notwithstanding the story that he was G. T. T. went to the police office, accompanied by his father, and surrendered himself. He was admitted to bail in $10,000. The reward offered by the Manhattan Bank for his detection is thus saved, unless he claims it himself, and offers an offset, as far as it will go.—New York paper.

BANK OF VIRGINIA.—The Richmond Whig of Saturday says that Mr. Dabney, in his testimony on the trial of Green, acquits all the present officers of the bank of any knowledge whatever of the overchecks. Only one, who has not been an officer in the bank for some twelve months, had any cognizance of the checks.

A COUNTERFEIT TAKEN.—We learn from the last Harrisonian published at Uniontown, that a counterfeiter who had passed nine $10 counterfeit U. S. The Sentinel says—"We forbear to make any comment upon this transaction, as we understand it will be the subject of legal investigation."—Abingdon Vir.

TRIAL OF GREEN.—The cross-examination of Mr. Dabney was continued on Saturday. It will probably close to-day.

During the day, Mr. Robertson, counsel for the commonwealth, read a statement of the result of the investigation by the commissioners. The substance of it was, that the deficit in money amounted to $556,681 19; of this, there were $541,347 in checks, $401,724 in the checks of Green, $72,458, Green & Crenshaw, the balance in the checks of houses principally connected with Green.—Richmond Whig.

The Montgomery papers mention the death by drowning, in the neighborhood of that city, of Adolph Adrian, well known for his public exhibition of legerdemain, &c. It is considered expedient and proper not to give publicity to names and facts, at least until judicial investigation places them beyond the possibility of mistake.—Mobile Journal.

Business Department.

A subscriber writes us,—"I wish you to stop my paper at the end of the year; money is so hard to obtain that I cannot pay for one any longer." Some two or three others have sent the same word; professing to be well pleased with the paper, but excusing themselves from taking it on the ground of the scarcity of money. Now we admit there are a few cases that might be excused on the ground of poverty, but we are afraid that avarice has too much to do with this matter. Each member cannot spare two dollars a year, to support the press, but they seem not to care how much it costs us. We have generously, as we think, vested considerable in this paper enterprize, and have been at considerable trouble to serve the cause, but if the church have not spirit enough to sustain us, after giving the subject a fair experiment, we shall abandon it forever. The utility of our paper, we believe, is universally admitted by the church in the west, and both ministers and members, if they want the benefit continued, will do well to exert themselves in season. Near about one half of our subscription list at this time is unpaid, and for the want of prompt remittances a debt is accumulating over us. To have obligations becoming due, and not to be able to meet them, is a thing that we cannot and will not endure.

We have been requested to publish the following letter for the benefit of the subscribers to brother Shinn's book. The work has been received and can be had by calling on O. WHITE, 104, Main street, Zanesville, Ohio.

ALLEGHENY, APRIL 29, 1840.

Dear Brother Marshall: I have sent a box of Books to Zanesville, containing 200 copies, directed to you and brother O. White.

The Books are to be distributed as follows:

Moses Scott,	24
J. L. Leslie,	12
William McConnell,	12
William Marshall,	24
Israel Thrap,	30
Gabriel Lanham,	12
Jacob Myres, of New Lancaster,	12
Moses N. Warren, of Coshocton,	36

There will be a few copies remaining after the above supply, which you and brother White will offer for sale at retail or wholesale, and thus oblige Your friend and brother, A. SHINN.

P. S. Perhaps it will be well for the different persons to deposit due bills with you, payable at the time of our Annual Conference, as I then have some heavy payments to make.

In great haste, A. S.

Bro. D. C. Carson asks, "what has become of Samuel Little's paper?" We answer, that we sent near half the volume to Chillicothe, as directed, when the P. M. informed us that he did not take it from the office, we then discontinued it. He thinks Mr. L. is an honest and upright man. We are glad to hear that, for if he be such he will pay us for the paper. We recommence sending it to him and our charge for this year will be $1.50. That he consented for his name to be sent as a subscriber, we refer him to W. Hughey and J. Guest.

"A Member" expresses his gratification at an article in our 39th number on the "Second Coming of Christ," and wishes us to publish "Mr. Miller's argument." Were it in our power it would afford us pleasure to accommodate this request, but we have not the "argument" referred to. What we published was from Bicknell's Reporter, and the remarks are from the editor of that paper.

Our subscribers, who are in arrears, will oblige us by IMMEDIATELY REMITTING the amount of their paper, as we much need money to "go ahead." Send to us any amount and we will pay the postage. No excuse.

There will be a camp meeting held for the Ligonier Mission, near the turnpike leading from Ligonier to Youngstown, and about 2½ miles from the former place, to commence on the 28th of August next. We solicit the aid of brothers G. Brown, J. Robison, J. B. Shearer, T. J. Addis, W. Turner, S. Hazlett, W. L. Baldwin, J. Hopwood, D. Kinney, and J. M. Piper, together with any of our unstationed brethren of the adjacent circuits, who can assist us. W. W. TIPTON.

A CAMP MEETING will be held on the farm of John Kinney, between Sidney, Hardin and Shelby counties, on the third Sabbath in August next. Ministerial aid from the adjoining circuits is much wanted and strongly solicited.

JOHN PARK, Sup't.

A camp-meeting will be held seven miles north of Bucyrus, Crawford county, Ohio, commencing on the 26th inst., to which are pressingly invited, all that can be with us from adjacent circuits, both preachers and members.

AGRICULTURAL.

CAUSE OF SEEDS NOT GERMINATING.—We have known and heard of considerable loss and disappointment from seeds, particularly onion seeds, not growing.—We have thought and inquired in reference to the cause, and the result of our cogitations and inquiries may be thus stated:

Without a certain degree of moisture, seeds will not germinate. On dry, sandy soils, and in a dry season, it seems highly probable, then, that seeds may be deprived of the requisite degree of moisture: perhaps receiving just as much as will mould them, and destroy their vitality, or being so near the surface as to be injured by the sun's heat and light.

But the seeds may have germinated, and commenced to send out their roots, and stem stocks, and yet be destroyed — If the soil is not pressed closely to seeds, and very dry weather occurs just at this period of the process of germination, the root being too distant from the soil, and too feeble to draw any supply of moisture, the liquid food of the plant contained in the fermented seed may be dried up, and the life thus destroyed.

If you would avoid disappointment and loss from seeds failing to grow, the preventive process is indicated by a knowledge of the causes most frequently productive of the result, which we think are those stated above. If you sprout your seeds before putting them into the ground, you will preserve them from the first cause of failure, but if you pulverize your soil throughout and press, in this state, with a hoe, spade, or roller, upon the seeds thus sprouted, the root stem will soon and surely derive sufficient moisture from the soil.

In a few instances I have found my neighbors blaming the seeds as useless, particularly of onions, carrots and parsnips, when I have obtained a little of the seed and found it to sprout quite well. You may easily save yourselves from such reflections, or from the temptation to blame others, by steeping the suspected seed in warm or tepid water, from six to twenty-four hours, according to the size and hardness of the seeds, and then setting it away in a warmish place for a day or two. If good, it will sprout in time: if kept warm in a darkish place and it does not sprout in this time, the seed is faulty.

In connection with this subject, I may state that several circumstances incline me to the belief that corn which has been sprouted—no matter in what steep—is safe from the ravages of the red and wire worm. It has been fashionable to steep it in a strong solution of copperas, and to ascribe the safety of the seed in this state, not to the change which fermentation has produced in the germ or chit which is usually first attacked, but to the change in the taste from the copperas. We have known corn soaked in simple water—in water alone—to escape from the attacks of the worm as well as that soaked in a copperas steep. Until this matter is made more certain, however, I would hold it bad husbandry to neglect the copperas, as in addition to the change produced by heat and moisture, we have also the disagreeable taste communicated by this salt.

IMPROVE THE SOIL.—The article which follows, points out several methods of improving the soil. Every farmer knows very well the superior profit of a fertile soil in the production of crops that liberally repay him for his labor; but every one is not equally sensible of the various ways of enriching his lands, nor does he eagerly embrace every opportunity within his knowledge.

Farmers should awaken and look to the importance of this subject, embrace every chance within the reach of their means and information, to render their soil more fertile; and they will soon find a permanent improvement, and it will give better crops with less labor, for a mellow fertile soil is the most easy to work. Many means of improving the sail are neglected for want of information, and when new plans are recommended, they are adopted slowly, as many cannot confide in any practices that were not sanctioned by the usage of our forefathers.

"The golden rule of agriculture is to apply such manures and tillage, as will make heavy lands lighter, and light lands heavier, cold land hotter, and hot land colder." He only is a farmer who knows and follows this rule.

Lands are seldom so rich but it may be a matter of gain to increase their fertility; and few tracts are so poor but that with proper tillage and manuring, they made the residence of plenty.

Manures are composed of all those substances which either directly, or indirectly, supply plants with their requisite food, by means of which they are enabled to expand and come to maturity.

In the first place, the different earths will serve to manure each other, Thus, clay is a fertilizer of a light sandy soil, and sand is equally a fertilizer of clay.—Where clay is applied to a sandy soil it should be carted on in the fall, and spread evenly over the ground, that the frost may pulverize it before it is mixed with the soil in the spring.

The better these earths are mixed in the respective soils, the more sensible and immediate will be their effect: but their principal excellence is that they are calculated permanently to improve the soils to which they are applied. Stiff loams are also in the same way assisted by sand, and sand again by these; but neither in so great a degree as in the former case. Generally it may be observed that all light, dry soils, are improved by being mixed with heavy earths, and vice versa.

Sand and fine gravel will greatly fertilize the soil of bog meadows, and this earth again is very good manure for all upland soils. It is peculiarly excellent for Indian corn when applied to the hills, and is very good for flax, hemp, and most other summer crops. Like gypsum, it is friendly to the growth of white clover. When applied to upland grasses, it should be laid on as a top dressing. Every kind of black mud from ponds and swamps, answers a somewhat similar purpose; though if the mud be stiff and clayed, it should only be applied to a light dry soil.

The different sorts of marl found in bog swamps are also excellent manures for all upland soils. The earths are usually found at the depth of from one to three feet from the surface, and are either of a white, gray or brownish color. The former is the most efficacious, and the latter the least so, their strength being in proportion to the quantity of carbonate of lime they contain. It is best to mix these earths with the mass of black earth or bog dirt, that forms the upper stratum, in order to reduce their strength, and when thus mixed, a load of even the weakest kind is more efficacious than two of common barn dung.

Their operation as manures is similar to that of the Nova Scotia gypsum, have little or no effect when first applied to wheat and rye; but by its afterwards covering the ground with a thick growth of white clover, it is rendered fit for producing largely of these crops. The same may be observed of the bog dirt. Like this, these marls are peculiarly excellent for Indian corn, and all summer grain, and a less quantity is sufficient. They may be used as top-dressing or otherwise.

Ashes as a manure are found to be more efficacious in some parts of the country than in others, generally most so, when applied to lands near the ocean. In some parts where the soil is extremely light and the bottom sand, the farmer can afford to pay twelve and a half cents a bushel, while in other parts, they are suffered to lie untouched about the potasheries.

Ashes generally answer the most valuable purposes when applied to Indian corn, particularly where the soil is not suitable to this plant. Where the soil is wet, cold, loamy or clayey, the plants are apt to get stunted with the cold rains which usually fall after planting; and then the ashes serve to supply the natural deficiencies of the soil till it becomes fertilized by the sun. But where the soil is natural to the growth of this plant, and there is no danger of its being stunted at its outset, perhaps it may be better to apply the ashes later, so that the plants may derive the greatest assistance from this manure, while the ears are setting and forming.

Ashes should generally be used for top-dressing: their salts lose nothing by exposure to the air, and soon find their way into the soil.

Soot is much more efficacious than ashes: besides salts, it contains oil. The soot of coal is esteemed equally as good as that of wood. It is used for top-dressings, and requires about forty bushels for an acre. When applied to winter grain it should be sown in the spring; and the same may be observed of ashes. Cold soot is particularly very good for meadow lands which have become sour and mossy. This manure, can, however, only be had in considerable quantities in large towns.

Of salts, which serve as manures, the principal are the common sea salt, urine, stale of cattle, sea water, saltpetre and alkaline salts. To the latter, the virtue of ashes, as a manure, is principally owing. Soapsuds is in part valuable on account of its alkaline salts, and perhaps the neutralized oil it contains adds much to its value. It is usual to throw this manure away; but this is a needless waste. It may be taken in the watering pot and strewed over the garden. where it will be of great service as a manure, and in expelling insects.—Yankee Far.

HARD WATER.—There is nothing that gives more annoyance to the housewife in the management of her domestic affairs, than what is usually called hard water. This is water impregnated with the muriate or sulphate of lime, the acids of which unite with, and neutralize the alkali of the soap she uses, leaving the grease free to float like a dirty scum on the water, and rendering all attempts at clean washing, a failure. The best way to avoid this evil, is for the farmer to provide a good rain-water cistern; but where this has not been done, water may be rendered fit for washing in two ways —the first is, to "put a couple of quarts of wheat bran into a bag, which is placed in the water, while heating over the fire, and the water, when hot enough for use, will be found soft. This quantity of bran has been found sufficient for any common washing." The second method is to use soda, for the purpose of neutralizing the acid of the substances that occasion the hardness. "A few ounces of soda will soften a hogshead of the hardest water. It is greatly superior to either pot or pearl-ash; (or the common ash-ley which is sometimes used for the same purpose;) giving a delicate whiteness to the linen, without the slightest injury; and it never, unless excess is used, in the least affects the hands." The expense of either method is trifling, compared with the trials of patience arising from unprepared water.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PERSEVERE.—What if you have failed in business? You still have life and health. Don't sit down and cry about your mishaps, for that will never get you out of debt nor buy your children's frocks. Go to work at something, eat sparingly, dress moderately, drink nothing exciting, and above all, keep a merry heart, and you'll be up in the world again.

WHAT WAS LIFE GIVEN US FOR?—Life was given to us for other and nobler purposes than to wear away in day dreams! To encourage a healthy enlarged system of action; to help on the great cause of social and moral improvement; in a word, to do our best in the stations assigned us, to benefit our fellow creatures so that when the sun sets, it may leave awhile a trail of light behind it; it was for this we were sent into the world, and not, day by day, hour by hour, to foster the growth of indolence, self-conceit and egotism.

FEMALE CHARACTER.—Women are generally deceived when they think hat they recommend themselves to the other sex by an indifference to religion Every man who knows human nature, connects areligious feeling with softness and sensibility of heart. At least we may always consider the want of it a proof of that masculine spirit, which of all your faults we dislike most. Besides, men consider your religion as the best security for that female virtue in which they are most sensibly interested. Never indulge yourself in ridicule on religious subjects, nor give countenance to it in others, by seeming diverted at what they say. This to people of good understanding, will be a sufficient check.

Let a woman be decked in all the embellishments of art and the gifts of nature —yet, if boldness is to be read in her face, it blots all the lines of beauty. Modesty is not only an ornament, but also a guard to virtue. It is a delicate feeling in the soul, which makes her shrink and withdraw herself from the appearance of danger. It is an exquisite sensibility, that warns her to shun the approach of every thing hurtful.

YOUNG LADIES.—Next to mothers, the young ladies have the greatest agency in forming the character of the other sex. Their influence commences when it is most needed. Young men, although their characters are, in a great measure, formed, require some powerful restraints just at the time when they are becoming acquainted with the world, and beginning to move beyond the inspection of a mother's eye. The young females with whom they associate, are the guardians of their virtues, and accountable for most of the evil practices into which they fall. It needs but little observation to be convinced that multitudes of young men, who are destitute of religious principles, pursue that line of conduct which is most likely to meet the views of the young ladies with whom they associate, and whose approbation they desire to obtain. There is not a vice among them that would not be relinquished, were it reprobated, and the perpetrators of it avoided, by the young, the fashionable and intelligent of the other sex. None but the most hardened and impudent blasphemer will now even utter an oath in the presence of any respectable female. If the ominous to do good or to prevent evil, when in one's power, be a crime, what a tremendous account we shall have to render on the score of profaneness, intemperance, gambling and duelling! These practices which disturb the peace of society, mar the peace of families, hurry multitudes to death and perdition, and must ultimately call down the indignation of Heaven on our country, might be greatly, if not entirely exterminated, by a vigorous and judicious effort on the part of the females. Let the practices themselves be uniformly mentioned in terms of reprobation, and let us avoid those who practice them as we would the midnight assassin, or the great adversary of God and man.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

A MOTHER'S GRAVE.—I followed into the burying ground, in the suburbs of the city, a small train of persons, not more than a dozen, who had come to bury one of their acquaintance. The clergyman in attendance, was leading a little boy by the hand, who seemed to be the only relative of the deceased in the slender group. I gathered with them round the grave, and when the plain coffin was lowered down, the child burst forth in uncontrolled grief. The little fellow had no one left to whom he could look for affection, or who could address him in the tone of parental kindness.—The last of his kinsfolk was in the grave —and he was alone.

When the clamorous grief of the child had a little subsided, the clergyman addressed us with the customary exhortation to accept the monition, and be prepared: and turning to the child, he added: "She is not to remain in this grave forever: as true as the grass which is now child, by the hand, and led him forth from the lowly tenement of his mother.

Late in the ensuing spring, I was in the neighborhood of the burying ground, and seeing the gate open, I walked among the graves for some time, reading the names of the dead, and wondering what strange disease could snatch off so many younger than myself—when recollecting that I was near the grave of the poor widow, buried the previous autumn, I turned to see what had been done to preserve the memory of one so utterly destitute of earthly friends. To my surprise, I found the most desirable of all momentos for a mother's sepulchre—little William was sitting near the head of the now sunken grave, looking intently upon some green shoots that had come forth with the warmth of spring. from the soil that covered his mother's coffin.

William started at my approach, and would have left the place; it was long before I could induce him to tarry; and indeed I did not win his confidence. until I told him that I was present when they buried his mother, and had marked his tears at the time.

"Then you heard the minister say, that my mother would come up out of this grave," said little William.

"I did."

"It is true, is it it not?" asked he in a tone of confidence.

"I most firmly believe it," said I.

"Believe it," said the child—"believe it—I thought you knew it—I know it."

"How do you know it. my dear?"

"The minister said, that as the grass would grow up, and the flowers bloom in spring, so true would my mother rise.—I came a few days afterward, and planted flower seed on the grave. The grass came green in this burying ground long ago; and I watched every day for the flowers, and to-day they may come too—see them breaking through the ground—by and by mammy will come again."

A smile of exulting hope played on the features of the boy; and I felt pained at disturbing the faith and confidence by which he was animated.

"But, my little child," said I, "it is not here that your poor mother will rise."

"Yes, here," said he. with emphasis—"here they put her, and here I have come ever since the first blade of grass was green this year."

I looked around, and saw that the tiny feet of the child had trod out the herbage at the grave side, so constant had been his attendance. What a faithful watch-keeper—what mother would desire a richer monument than the form of her only son, bending fearful, but hoping over her grave."

"But, William," said I, "it is in an other world that she will rise,"—and I attempted to explain to him the nature of that promise which he had mistaken.—The child was confused, and he appeared neither pleased nor satisfied.

"If mammy is not coming back to me —if she is not to come up here, what shall I do?—I cannot stay without her."

"You shall go to her," said I, adopting the language of the scripture—"you shall go to her, but she shall not come again to you."

"Let me go then," said William, "let me go now, that I may rise with mammy.

"William," said I, pointing down to the plants just breaking through the ground, "the seed which is sown there would not come up, if it had not been ripe; so you must wait till your appointed time, until your end cometh."

"Then I shall see her."

"I surely hope so."

"I will wait then," said the child, "but I thought I should see her soon—I thought I should meet her here."

And he did. In a month William ceased to wait, and they opened his mother's grave, and placed his little coffin on hers—it was the only wish the child expressed in dying.—U. S Gazette.

"SHE PLAYS LIKE A CHRISTIAN."—A boy of nine, in Connecticut, recently became pious. Among the children, in a family with whom he used to play, was W., a young girl who had also become pious. Some time after he became interested in religion, he visited this family again to engage in some of the innocent amusements of childhood. As he returned home, he said to his mother:

"Mother, I know W. is a Christian."

"What makes you think so, my son?" inquired his mother.

"Because," said he, with great simplicity, "she plays like a Christian."

"What! plays like a Christian!"

"Yes, mother, she is always good natured and effectionate. She never gets angry,—if you get away all her things, she doesn't get angry."

It is very important that all pious children should show that they are christians in all their conduct, even by the manner and spirit in which they engage in their amusements. In this way, others will see their good works,—their mild, affectionate conduct,—and will be led to glorify their Father who is in Heaven.—S. S. Visiter.

"HE NEVER SPEAKS KIND TO ME."—Conversing the other day with an interesting little girl, between the ages of six and seven, I took occasion to impress upon her mind the debt of gratitude due from her, to her Heavenly Parent, for bestowing upon her so good and kind a father, whom every body loves. I was chilled with the frost of the season, shall spring to greenness and life in a few months, so true shall your mother come up from that grave to another life—to a life of happiness, I hope." The attendants shoveled in the earth upon the coffin, and some one took little William, the perfectly thunderstruck by her answer. Looking me full in the face with her soft blue eyes, she replied, "He never speaks kind to me." Perhaps this Christian father, harassed with the cares of business, was unconscious that he had roughly checked the fond attentions of his child; but could cares or the interruptions of his child, excuse unkindness, in a total want of tokens of endearment?—Will fathers examine their habits on this point?

VIGOR LENT TO THE AGED BY THE YOUNG.—The young should always be ready to repay the kindness of the aged. But they should never transgress the laws of life. A certain little boy was very healthy and vigorous till he was three years old. Then he commenced sleeping with his grandmother. He soon grew thin and pale and sickly. His friends could not imagine the caues. Medicine did him no good. His mother said he seemed to be "blighted." A physician directed that he should no longer sleep with his aged grandparent. He soon got well.—Young persons should not sleep with those who are very old; nor should the healthy sleep with the sick.

The New World;

A weekly newspaper, published Saturdays in the city of New York, and devoted to Home and Foreign Intelligence, Literature, Science and the Fine Arts. Edited by PARK BENJAMIN.

THE NEW WORLD, the largest, cheapest and most elegant periodical sheet in America, was commenced on Saturday, October 25.—The situation of New York, and its immense commercial intercourse, must ever render it the head quarters of news, both from the old world and the new. The establishment of steam communication with England, gives increased interest and importance to the intelligence received in our "great metropolis." Availing ourselves of the advantages derived from this source and many others, we have presented to the American public the NEW WORLD—a paper intended for "our country, our whole country"—warped by no sectional bias—controverting no man's political opinions—unsullied by any thing of an immoral or indelicate nature; but presenting the freshest and most copious intelligence from every part of our vast country—the earliest and best selections from the British Magazines and newspapers—the first American editions of such English works of value as may be conveniently embraced within the contents of our mammoth sheet, and furnishing also a large amount of original matter having reference to subjects of interest to every intelligent inhabitant of the new world. We shall present, with unrivalled promptitude, not only the best articles from all the popular periodicals of this continent, but from those of Great Britain, such as the Monthly, the Chronicle, the New Monthly, the Gentleman's, Frazer's, Blackwood's, the United Service, the Asiatic, Tait's and the University Magazines, Bently's Miscellany, the Court Journal, the Court Gazette, LaBelle Assemblee, the Era, the Satirist, the Age, the Examiner, the Writings of Dickens, Bulwer and Knowles, the Quarterly, the Foreign Quarterly, the London, the Edinburgh and the Dublin Review, &c., &c., &c.

We shall thus place within the reach of the poorest and the humblest, the best specimens of modern English literature, as soon as they reach this country. Already have we given to our readers the first American editions of three celebrated works by Bulwer, Knowles and Moore, and at the same time given a copious digest of all the important intelligence usually embraced in newspapers. This is but a type and earnest of what we mean to do. Our arrangements in England are of so efficient a character that we shall be able to supply not only all the current news, but all the current literature, to which a copyright is not attached.

The editor will especially aim to make The New World worthy of its name from its perfect compilation of Domestic News, as well as intelligence from all parts of the western Hemisphere. Our newspapers in general contain full accounts of all that happens in the Old world, even to the most trivial occurrences, which can be of little or no interest to OUR people; while they omit or neglect much that is of consequence from the various countries of the New.

We shall carefully avoid the profligate tone which characterises many journals in speaking of the returns of crime and wretchedness, which fall under the eye of the municipal police. We can see nothing humorous or witty in such pictures of sinfulness and degradation. No ludicrous accompaniment of incident or language can make a smile at the frantic vagaries of intemperance, the dreadful examples of female prostitution, suffering and despair, or the penal violations of social order by the ignorant and imbecile.

With the most ample assistance in every department; with resources more than sufficient, and friends numerous and true; with a thousand incentives to exertion, and every evidence and assurance of the most triumphant success before it, The New World, it is confidently hoped, will long gladden and enliven the firesides of every portion of our great country.

Price of The New World, THREE DOLLARS per annum, payable in advance.

All letters relating to the editorial department of the New World, to be addressed to the editor; those intended for the publisher, to

PITTSBURGH CIRCUIT, MAY 28, 1840.

Mr. Editor: Having some room, after closing my communication on business, permit me to inform the friends of our Zion, and publish it to the praise of our God, that this circuit is in a healthy and prosperous condition. We may be aided in forming a correct judgment of what the Lord has done for us, at Sharpsburgh, by contrasting the present with their condition a year ago. Then, we had a name in the place, and that was about all; no prayer meetings, no regular class meetings, no meeting house, and small congregations on preaching occasions.—Now we have three classes, each meeting weekly, about eighty members, three prayer meetings each week, well attended, a very commodious house of worship, a flourishing Sabbath School and very large congregations. The accession in this place are about sixty-five, one only of whom has been dropped from the probation list. I regard this church as one of great promise.

The other two societies, (Bakerstown and Braddocksfield) are in a rising condition at present, though nothing special has yet occurred in either. As far as I can perceive, peace prevails in all our borders, and the members generally are growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. I have great encouragement and comfort in laboring for the people of my charge this year. I see and feel the continued practical illustration of the injunction "consider them that labour among you and are over you—and esteem them highly in love for their works' sake," and though generally intelligent, none seems so keen of perception as to discover any "imprudence" in a minister's participation in the benevolent enterprises of the day, or any connection or affinity between moral truth and political corruption.

While I feel called on to bless the Lord our God for the success of the gospel among this people, and its happy effects—we are all bound to pray, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting, that it may prevail, until its holy power has emancipated from every species of bondage, every soul and body of man, and reconciled in one body unto God the whole human family.

In haste, yours, &c., JOHN CLARK.

MIDDLETOWN CIRCUIT, VA., May 18, 1840.

Dear Brother Springer: After taking leave of you in Zanesville I set out for my circuit, and after travelling one hundred and sixty miles I reached my place of destination. Here I found myself in the midst of a strange though clever people. When viewing the surrounding country I was led to conclude, that I was in the neighborhood of where "the bears live." I thought there was evidence sufficient to induce me thus to believe. For, to use the language of David Crockett, I saw a great many "cracks in the earth," and dens and holes in the rocks. But, sir, I have travelled for the eight last months, during which time I have not seen even the shadow of a bear.

The time has been when the war-hoop of the red man was heard to reverberate here from hill to hill, and when the scream of the panther rolled along the murmuring streams and through the wending vales; but old things are done away and behold all things are become new. Instead of the savage skulking over the tall knobs and craggy peaks, clad in the habiliments of war, and thirsting for the blood of his fellow white man, we now see the Herald of the Cross clothed with the panoply of heaven, wielding the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God. And it matters not whether he is found on the mountain top or in the city full, we hear him proclaiming "good tidings unto the meek, liberty to the captive, the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound." And whilst on the walls of Zion he directs the eye of the sinner to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world, he unfurls the Flag of Calvary, and while he proclaims the day of vengeance of our God, the hard hearted sinner is brought to bow at the shrine of mercy and to yield to be saved by grace. Thus the wilderness has been made glad and the desert to bud and blossom as the rose; the parched ground has become a pool and the thirsty land springs of water. In the habitations of dragons, where each lay, there is grass with reeds and rushes. Instead of the doleful yell of the beast of prey, the songs and shouts and the loud hallelujahs are to be heard, bursting from the lips of the people of God.

The cry has this year been extorted from the aged sire as well as the sprightly youth, "What must we do to be saved?" Angels bear the tidings home that the dead are alive and the lost are found. Thus you discover, Mr. Editor, that the Lord has not forsaken His people in this region, but to the contrary, a heavenly gale is felt from the high hills of immortality, which is wafting our old bark onward to the haven of eternal repose. Our cause is second to none other among the old Virginia hills. I believe, Mr. Editor, that you were one of those that assisted in first planting the tree of religious liberty in this section. That tree, though weak and tender at first, has become as one of the tall trees of the forest. It sheds a pleasing fragrance around it, its branches extend far and wide, so much so that about three hundred and twenty have found a cover under it this year.

I hope the day is not very far off when the human family will be brought to see that it is derogatory to the word of God, for men to be lords over God's heritage, and when they shall learn that but one is our Master even Christ, and all we are brethren.

Yours, in haste,

WM. MUNHALL.

INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH.

"We (says Dr. Bangs,) have our standards, both as it respects doctrine and discipline, which include ALL that is to be believed and done—and it is by THESE that all theories and practices are to be tested!!" Is not this claiming infallibility for the Methodist Episcopal Church? But the same Dr. Bangs, soon after expressing this sentiment, (to-wit,) May, 1840, proposed to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, "so to alter the discipline," as to make the bishop and presiding elder, the arbiters of what is to be "believed and done." Now, where is the "standard?" What are its dimensions—its extent—its boundaries, or its uniformity? If the "standard of discipline, which include all that is to be believed and done," "concerning the guilt, &c., of a local preacher, deacon or elder," may be one thing in 1836, and another thing in 1840, raised or lowered, or "altered"—and a bishop or his "agent," a presiding elder, may be the arbiter of what "is to be believed and done"—or "refer" the case for "final decision," to a tribunal where he can wield a greater influence—where is the "standard" but in the will of these officers, who may be as imbecile, or vindictive, as any pope that ever settled the destiny of a heretic.

"The King can do no wrong."

There is about as much reason in this latter sentence, as in that at the head of this article. The one is as dangerous to religious, as is the other to civil liberty—and both alike subversive of the rights of man.

It may be inquired, who and what is "the church?" In the apostolic age, it seemed to consist of the "Apostles, elders, and brethren." Dr. Mosheim says, "the people, their leaders, and their ministers or deacons"—subsequently the people were excluded from all part in ecclesiastical affairs. Then came the popish doctrine of the infallibility of the church—or rather, the infallibility of the clergy—and they could say, in the language of Dr. Bangs, "we (the clergy) have our standards, both as respects doctrine and discipline, which include ALL that is to be believed and done,—and it is by THESE that all theories and practices are to be tested,"—the Bible, aside.

"There is a pope in every man," said Luther, and being dubbed D. D., B—p, or K—g, does not change the propensity of man, or alter his love of power, ease or profit. The positions of Dr. B., are not so much to be wondered at—pampered for many years, under the misnomer of a "travelling preacher"—at the head quarters of aristocracy—nourished by "pure charity," i. e. "the profits," &c.—the favorite and advocate of high-toned episcopacy—what wonder if he should be as favorable to bishops, as cardinals were to popes?

According to Dr. B., "a Methodist is not allowed to defend himself," "on general principles!" The Bible inculcates "general principles"—he is not allowed to make this his standard or text book! It must be "conformably to Methodism." Well, what is Methodism? As it relates to "discipline" or church government, it is one thing in Europe, and another thing in America—it is one thing in 1836 and four years preceeding, and it may be "altered" in 1840, acording to Dr. B.'s movement in the General Conference—it may be a nose of wax, or a "Jack o' the Lantern"—and yet it must be the "standard" by which "theories and practices are to be tested!!!" Methodism, as it respects discipline or church polity (although aristocratical) in Europe, is far more republican and less despotic, than in this land of boasted democracy.

Some affect to be alarmed at the growing influence of Catholicism, but this is harmless compared with certain assumptions and claims, under the garb of Protestantism, pretending to "spread scriptural holiness" to acquire power, wealth, &c. L. GARRETT.

For the Western Recorder.

Mr. Editor: In the Western Recorder of the 13th inst. appears a communication over the signature of John Scott, (purporting to be a review of certain resolutions passed by the Pleasant Hill quarterly conference,) containing sentiments so objectionable in themselves and so dishonorable to a professor of religion, that I feel constrained to notice it. In doing this I shall not attempt the defence of the quarterly conference, nor of the brother over whose signature its resolutions appeared, for they are abundantly able to defend themselves and maintain the right against whole volumes of the shallow sophistry to which brother Scott has the temerity to affix his name. As a member of the M. P. Church who believes that that church, and every other, is under the most solemn obligations to exert its influence for the destruction of slavery—the hydra-headed iniquity of the land—I feel myself impelled to enter my protest against the do-nothing policy recommended by brother S., as alike wicked and cruel, and calculated to bring upon our land the fiery indignation of the Lord of Hosts.

Passing over several things which may be more appropriately answered by the persons attacked, I will extract for comment two kindred passages, which in my opinion are rife with the rankest heresy:

"The seventh resolution is truly patriarchal or pontifical. The quarterly conference, or rather brother J. Carey, 'calls most earnestly, affectionately, and in the fear of God, on all our brethren to unite in bearing their solemn and decided testimony against the cruel and unjust system of American slavery.' Here is the Church arrayed against the State, and what if the State should retaliate and array itself against the Church? Would not the weakest go to the wall? In matters like these it is an utter scandal to act without brains—men must pay attention to consequences of action, unless they mean to renounce all claim to intelligence."

And again:

"I don't like to see the Church arrayed against the State, and uttering its anathamas, bulls and thunders as popery did in the dark ages—making all the kingdoms of Europe to tremble,—and as you have attempted to do in your resolutions 'against American slavery;' you aim to overawe the civil government just like popery—popery fired cannons, you pop-guns, this is all the difference. Both mean by church influence to control civil government."

What is the doctrine involved in these extracts? manifestly that the church has nothing to do with the iniquities which are established by law. For the church to protest against trading in slaves and the souls of men—against that impious system that makes merchandize of the purchase of a Saviour's blood—is to array itself against the State, according to the logic of Bro. J. Scott! "The quarterly conference of Pleasant Hill" "calls most earnestly, affectionately, and in the fear of God" upon their Christian brethren to unite in "a solemn and decided testimony against the cruel and unjust system of American slavery." What is the response?—Does every Christian heart leap to the thrilling appeal, and lifting up its prayers to God for strength, go forth to fight the moral battles and win the peaceful triumphs of humanity? Nay—not every one, one heart at least, steels itself against the appeal—suppresses its sympathies with the suffering, strangles its holiest emotions, and shrinking back coward like from its duty, seeks to cover its disgraceful retreat by the senseless cry, "You are arraying the Church against the State!" "You aim to overawe civil government," and mingling various changes upon "bulls and thunders," "persecute" and "popery," the terrible explosion ends in "pop-guns." Now, with all due deference to Bro. Scott, he is guilty, in this attempt to throw off responsibility, of the most arrant nonsense if not of something worse. The principle which is fairly deducible from the farrago which he has served up to us, is this: The church must not interfere by remonstrance with any legalized iniquity, for to do so would be to array the Church against the State—and to array the Church against the State is popery. An interference on the part of the church with legalized iniquity is therefore popery. We are left to infer that an opposite course is protestantism, or anti-popery; and if such is the fact, I will leave it to the candid to decide which faith, as manifested by works, is preferable. But I indignantly repudiate this "new divinity" of the pro-slavery school. It furnishes a mantle as ample as the devil himself could wish with which to cover up from Christian rebuke every iniquity that heart can conceive or hand execute. Robbery, adultery, Sabbath breaking, murder and slavery, that stupendous sin which involves in itself every possible violation of the moral law, to escape the rebuke of the church, and to flourish unreproved, need only the covering of legality, and they are safe. The devil entrenches himself in his strong hold behind the statutes framed by his own faithful followers, and the "sacramental hosts of God's elect" must shrink back abashed from his august presence, nor dare invade his realm. So advises brother J. Scott. Sabbath breaking is legalized in our land—the church must utter no voice against it. Robbery is legalized—men of God must be dumb. Slavery is sheltered by the statute book—the bible must not interfere!

"Just God and Holy, is that church which lends Strength to the spoiler, Thine?"

This non-committalism of the church, is a device of the arch fiend, whereby he hopes to lead her captive at his will. That any of her professed friends should be found so zealously seconding the efforts of the evil one is most deplorable, and should convince the friends of Christ of the necessity of a stronger manifestation of that aggressive spirit which so eminently characterized the church in the days of our Saviour and His Apostles, and still later in the days of Wesley, the father of Methodism. It is the appropriate business of the church to war against sin, wherever it may seek to entrench itself, whether in the customs or the laws of the land. If legalized, so much greater is the necessity that the voice of condemnation be uttered distinctly, for the evil is greater to be overcome. To me, those propositions seem so self-evident, that it appears like a work of supererogation to attempt their elucidation and defence. But if it is true generally, that it is the duty of the church to oppose legalized sin, it is more emphatically true, when that sin finds a refuge at the altar, and a home within the sanctuary. Added to its general duty then, is the duty of self-purification. This is the case with the church at the present day. It is polluted with the sin of slavery.—The stain of innocent blood is on its garments. The voice of accusation from the peeled and down-trodden, goes up against it to the heavens. It has been heard by Him who listened to the groans of captive Israel, and He is giving us one indication after another, that the vials of His vengeance are about to be poured out upon us, unless by a timely repentance, we avert deserved wrath. In such circumstances, what is evidently the duty of the christian? Is it to strike hands with the oppressor, or sit down in icy indifference to the wrongs of the slave and the guilt of the church, lest, through the instrumentality of a healthful and holy agitation, the churches, to use the classical expression of Bro. John Scott, should "all go to sticks?" Not so, have I learned Christ. A union which is not based upon purity, can never result in peace. Let, then, the church be purified, and that peace which passeth all understanding, shall be established in its midst. But while no distinction is made between the holy and the vile—between the merciful man and the oppressor, how can purity or peace be looked for? As well might we expect much vegetation from the barren rock, or fruit from the blasted and perishing tree. It is only when the church is faithfully employed in its aggressions against sin that it can hope for the blessing of the Lord. Every effort, therefore, to awaken it to its duty, and array its multitudes against those impurities which are established by law, as well as those which are shielded by the customs of society, should be encouraged and seconded, as calculated to advance the interest and increase the influence of the church, and throughout it to pour numberless blessings upon the world. If this reasoning is correct, your readers generally, will agree with me, in characterizing the doctrine which I have been reviewing as heretical in itself and dangerous in its tendency. Believing it to be so, I could not feel satisfied that it should pass unreproved. It is unnecessary for me to disclaim any personal animosity towards the brother whose sentiments have been under review, for I was alike unacquainted with his person and his name till I met the letter in the Western Recorder. It is with his sentiments I have to deal—not with him.

In conclusion, permit me, Mr. Editor, so far to imitate Bro. J. Scott, whose ethics I have objected to, as to specify a few things which I do not like.

1st. I don't like to see the church consenting to the wickedness of the State, "as was the case during the ten persecutions, in several of the countries of Europe," and is yet the case, to a great extent in our own land. It might as well revolt from God openly and at once, and give in its adhesion to the devil.

2d. "I do not like to see the church, the spouse of God, slumbering in the adulterous bed" of carnal expediency, the Delilah that has shorn it of its strength, that she may give it into the hands of the Philistines.

3d. "I don't like to see the church wedded to the civil power as in England," or substituting for the commandments of God the traditions of men, as virtually recommended by Bro. John Scott, of Winding Ridge, Ohio.

4th. I don't like to see the church "excusing its non-compliance with the commands of God, on the ground that men have decreed unrighteous decrees, and given to their villanies the sanction of law, as Bro. J. Scott has attempted to do in his pretended review of the resolutions of "Pleasant Hill circuit quarterly conference." It looks like an union in wickedness of Church and State, or an attempt to transfer the former in a lump to the keeping of the father of lies.

5th. I dont like to see the church of Christ lending her "influence" to sustain American slavery, "the vilest that ever saw the sun," by a pretended non-interference, or playing into the hands of corrupt demagogues by preaching up the delusion that christians have nothing to do with politics. Neither do I like to see christians refuse to labor for the purification of the church from "the sum of all villanies," upon the shallow plea that others are laboring through the appointed instrumentalities for the purification of the State from the same sin. It looks as if they were anxious to throw off the responsibilities which God has laid upon them, and go around the Cross instead of taking it up and bearing it patiently on.

Abolitionists believe that the church, as a church, has a solemn duty to perform in reference to slavery, and let the men of the world act as they will against it, by moral suasion or by political power, she cannot be released from her obligation to cast the abomination from her midst and purify herself from its contamination. "Let the church" therefore, "in future," instead of interposing herself as a shield between the artillery of truth and the system of slavery, "mind her own appointed work"—the subversion of Satan's empire, and the establishment of that Kingdom which is righteousness, and peace, and true holiness.

Bro. Springer, you will oblige me by publishing the above communication exactly as I send it, as I think you will find it fully prepared for the press, though I do not believe you will neglect it, still I would remark, if such should be the case, you will be so good as to send it back, as it is my intention to avail myself of another medium for my thoughts to appear before the public.

BROUGHAM'S PORTRAIT OF FRANKLIN.

The following admirable sketch of the American philosopher, is from a new work by Lord Brougham, recently published in London, entitled—"Statesmen in the time of George III." It has not yet been published in this country.

One of the remarkable men certainly of our times as a politician, or of any age as a philosopher, was Franklin; who also stands alone in combining together these two characters, the greatest that man can sustain, and in this; that having borne the first part in enlarging science by one of the greatest discoveries ever made, he bore the second part in founding one of the greatest empires in the world.

In this truly great man every thing seems to concur that goes towards the constitution of exalted merit. First he was the architect of his own fortune.—Born in the humblest station; he raised himself by his talents and his industry, first to the place in society which may be attained with the help only of ordinary abilities, great application and good luck; but next to the loftier heights, which a daring and happy genius alone can scale; and the poor printer's boy, who at one period of his life had no covering to shelter his head from the dews of night, rent in twain the proud dominion of England, and lived to be the embassador of a commonwealth which he had formed, at the court of the haughty monarch of France, who had been its ally.

Then, he had been tried by prosperity as well as adverse fortune, and had passed unhurt through the perils of both.—No ordinary apprentice, no common placed journeyman ever laid the foundation of his independence in habits of industry and temperance more deep than he did, whose genius was afterwards to rank with the Gallileos and Newtons of the old world. No patrician born to shine in court, or assist at the councils of monarchs, ever bore his honors more easily, or was less spoiled by the enjoyment of them, than this common workman did when negotiating with royal representatives, or caressed by all the beauty and fashion of the most brilliant court in Europe.

Again, he was self-taught in all he knew. His hours of study were stolen from those of sleep and meals, or gained by some ingenious contrivance for reading while the work of his daily calling went on. Assisted by none of the helps which affluence tenders to the studies of the rich, he had to supply the place of tutors by redoubled diligence, and of commentaries, by repeated perusal. Nay, the possession of books was to be obtained by copying what the art which he himself exercised, furnished easily to others.

Next, the circumstances under which others succumb he made to yield, and bent to his own purpose—a successful leader of a revolt that ended in complete triumph after appearing desperate for years; a great discoverer in philosophy without the ordinary helps to knowledge; a writer famed for his chaste style without a classical education; a skilful negotiator, though never bred to politics; ending as a favorite, nay, a pattern of fashion, when the guest of frivolous Courts, the life which he had begun in garrets and work-shops.

Lastly, combinations of faculties, in others deemed impossible, appeared easy and natural in him. The philosopher, delighted in speculation, was also eminently a man of action. Ingenious reasoning, refined and subtle consultation, were in him combined with prompt resolution, and inflexible firmness of purpose. To a lively fancy, he joined a learned and deep reflection; his original and inventive genius stooped to the convenient alliance of the most ordinary prudence in every day affairs; the mind that soared above the clouds, and was conversant with the loftiest of human contemplations disdained not to make proverbs and feign parables for the guidance of apprenticed youths and servile maidens; and the hands that sketched a free constitution for a whole continent, or drew down the lightning from heaven, easily and cheerfully lent themselves to simplify the apparatus by which truths were to be illustrated, or discoveries pursued.

His discoveries were made with hardly any apparatus at all; and if, at any time he had been led to employ instruments of a somewhat less ordinary description, he never rested satisfied until he had, as it were, afterwards translated the process, by resolving the problem with such simple machinery, that you might say he had done it wholly unaided by apparatus. The experiments by which the identity of lightning and electricity was demonstrated, were made with a sheet of brown paper, a bit of twine, a silk thread, and an iron key.

Upon the integrity of this man, whether in public or private life, there rests no stain. Strictly honest and even scrupulously punctual in all his dealings; he preserved in the highest fortune that regularity which he had practised as well as inculcated in the lowest.

In domestic life he was faultless, and in the intercourse of society, delightful. There was a constant good humor and a playful wit, easy and of high relish, without any ambition to shine, the natural fruit of his lively fancy, his solid, natural good sense, and his cheerful temper, that gave his conversation an unspeakable charm, and alike suited every circle from the humblest to the most elevated.

With all his strong opinions so often solemnly declared, so imperishably recorded in his deeds, he retained a tolerance for those who differed with him, which could not be surpassed in men whose principles hang so loosely about them as to be taken up for a convenient cloak, and laid down when found to impede their progress. In his family he was every thing that worth, warm affections, and sound prudence could contribute, to make a man both useful and amiable, respected and beloved. In religion he would be reckoned by many a latitudinarian; yet it is certain that his mind was imbued with a deep sense of the Divine perfections, a constant impression of our accountable nature, and a lively hope of future enjoyment. Accordingly his deathbed, the test of both faith and works, was easy and placid, resigned and devout, and indicated at once an unflinching retrospect of the past, and a comfortable assurance of the future.

If we return from the truly great man whom we have been contemplating, in the Old World, (Frederick the Great,) who only affected the philosophy that Franklin possessed, and employed his talents for civil and military affairs, in extinguishing that independence which Franklin's life was consecrated to establish, the contrast is marvellous indeed, between the Monarch and the Printer.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

SOUTHERN FRESHETS.

PENDLETON, (S. C.) May 29.

Within a few days past the rains have been excessive, and great injury has been done to the crops. Those on the low grounds have been almost, if not entirely ruined, and the wheat even on upland must have been damaged seriously. The streams in this vicinity have not been so high since the great August freshet in '33, when so many mills and bridges were swept off. The whole of the river and creek bottoms have been many feet under water. If the rains have extended below, we shall hear of great destruction on the river.—Messenger.

MILLEDGEVILLE, GA., June 2.

GREAT FRESHET.—A few weeks ago, we were called upon to notice the "rising of the waters" in the Oconee, owing to the heavy rains that had fallen for a few days previous to the freshet. At that time, we stated that, with but one exception, the waters of our river had never been so high. But we have now to record that, during the past week, we witnessed a scene never before presented to the eye of the oldest inhabitant of our city. The great "Yazoo fresh" was nothing in comparison to the one which took place a few days past. The old high water mark has been obliterated by a new high water mark, made some twelve feet above that which was formerly pointed out to us as the point at which the waters had hitherto receded to seek the channel of the river. The low grounds of the surrounding country have been literally flooded. Branches were converted into rapid creeks, and creeks into rivers of the first class.—Great injury has been done to plantations and farms, that, a few days ago, promised an abundant harvest to the industrious tiller of the soil. Horses, hogs, mules, and every species of stock, have been carried away by the flood and destroyed. Corn cribs have been surrounded by water, and great injury sustained by many thereby. The bridge across the Oconee, the property of Mr. Carter, has been washed away. The mill owned by Mr. Williams was saved by the daring exertions of its owner, who ventured to it amidst the rushing waters, and by knocking off the weather boarding to a considerable height, he was fortunate enough to save his mill; but the kitchen, stable, and other out houses have been washed away. All the bridges across the creeks, and even branches, within several miles of our city, have met a common fate—they are all destroyed.

The amount of damage that has been done by this freshet, we cannot at present even surmise; suffice it to say, that it has done more than all put together that have hitherto preceded it. A stop has been put to travelling for a few days past.—Those on their way from this place have been compelled to remain here, and those who were travelling hither, have of course been detained on their way.—Journal.

GREAT FRESHET.—On Wednesday night when our first notice of the freshet was penned, our city was in a most painful state of excitement. Already had a considerable portion of the city been inundated, and the river continued to rise at a fearful rate. To attempt any description of a calamity so awfully sublime, would be worse than vain; it required to be seen to comprehend its vast destructive capacity. About 12 o'clock, Wednesday night, the city was completely submerged, and the river continuing to rise. The scene was a painful one; many families were still in their houses, entirely surrounded by a current to them impassable without aid, and the water making rapid inroads upon them. From this fearful and alarming situation, they were relieved by boats and horsemen, not however, in some instances, until they were standing to their necks in water. In this work of noble, generous philanthropy, many of our citizens were engaged all night; and in many instances it was perilous, as the streets in many places would swim the tallest horses. When the day dawned, our city appeared as if standing in the midst of a vast sea of water, which extended as far as the eye could reach from the highest eminence.

Boats capable of carrying forty bales of cotton were floating through every street in the city with the greatest ease, and our beautiful Broad street was from two to ten feet deep, and in some places running with the rapidity of a mountain torrent, and continued through the day yesterday. This morning the water in the river has fallen so as not to flood the city, except in one or two places, which are yet strong and deep currents. And the withdrawal of the water from the other portions of the city, makes bare our streets, once beautiful and level, which presents a scene to the eye which no language can describe. Those only who are acquainted with the character of our soil can have any conception of the damage done to the streets, which in many places are washed ten or fifteen feet deep.

The destruction of property, both public and private has been immense—the upper bridge has been entirely carried away, and about three or four feet of the lower one. Our citizens watched throughout the day on Wednesday, with almost painful anxiety the lower bridge, and the air was rent with shouts as they saw it withstand shock after shock, from mountains of rafts, mill and gin houses, bridges, dwellings and every class of trees from the small sapling to the sturdy oak of the forest which had been washed up, and borne away by the resistless force of the torrent, full fledged with the beautiful foilage. But during Wednesday night the bridge gave way. The destruction of private property is also great, many wood buildings have been entirely swept away, and several brick buildings have been undermined, and some have already fallen, but we cannot now give particulars. The wharves are still covered, and the damage done to them is not known, but is no doubt very great, as large portions of them were seen floating off.—The cellars were all, with very few exceptions, filled with water, and a large amount of merchandise is destroyed in them, as they filled so rapidly in some instances as to afford the occupants no time to clear them.

It is a source of gratitude to the Supreme Ruler of events, that amid all this destruction of property, there has not been, that we as yet hear, any loss of human life. We shall, in a day or two collect all the particulars and give whatever is of moment to our readers.

From our neighboring town of Hamburg we have had no communication since Wednesday evening, and we fear that their situation has been worse than ours, as the location of the town is rather lower.

After the foregoing was penned in the morning for our weekly paper, we took a ride through a portion of the city, to ascertain more definitely, the extent of the calamity which has befallen our city, and the probable extent of loss, as well as to furnish particulars to our readers at a distance; but we returned convinced that any effort at description could not possibly convey any adequate idea of the state of the city. It will require days to ascertain any just idea of the extent of the loss which the city and individuals have sustained. Never have we seen such a state of things. Our streets once the most beautiful and level, are rendered, in many places, impassable even to horsemen, and we believe there is not a street in the city, through which a carriage can pass from one end to the other.

Many dwellings have been swept entirely away, and a great many more have been rendered entirely unfit for use, and must be repaired, and in some instances almost entirely rebuilt before they can be fit for use. Several brick buildings, some of them very handsome edifices, have been much injured, and others must be taken down. Much cotton has floated out from the ware houses and was carried off, and hundreds of bales are no doubt forever lost, both in this city and Hamburg, the precise quantity we know not, But suppose that at least one thousand have been lost in the two places, and there are many who think our estimate not enough.

The loss to the city and individuals is variously estimated at from $50,000 to one million dollars, and our opinion is that the smallest amount will more than cover the entire loss, though there are those who think differently. We are well satisfied that any estimate at this time, however, is entitled to but little credit, because it is nothing but conjecture.—Augusta Chronicle.

HAMBURG.—We crossed to Hamburg, S. C., at 10 o'clock yesterday morning, and witnessed some of the dreadful ravages of the flood of that place. We got, from our friend of the Journal, the average depth of the water at its highest state over the town, and have only room and time to add, (and this will give to those who are acquainted with the situation of the town, a pretty good idea of the matter,) that at Hubbard's corner, the water was nine feet deep; at the opposite corner on Centre, occupied by Sibley & Crappon, it was about six feet deep. At Mather & Rooney's new store house, the water nearly reached the eaves of the building, Kernaghan & Wray's ware house was dislodged from its foundation, and brought up between McDonald's and a new frame building beyond. The loss of property in Hamburg is immense.

No lives lost in Hamburg. Every foot of ground was under water at the highest spot of earth, it being two feet deep. As regards the loss of cotton, we are inclined to believe that at least one-third of the stock on hand is gone.—ib.

SAVANNAH, MAY 30, 1840.

The Late Rains.—We learn since our last, that the late deluge of rain has wrought considerable injury to some of the Planters in Effingham and Scriven. One Planter has his corn, which was as high as a man, two thirds under water.—All the mill-dams of which we have heard have been carried away, and one individual apprehends the loss of his mill. The Ogechee is higher than it has been for years, the water being up to the floor of Jenckes' bridge. All the bridges on the carriage roads have been swept away, preventing the passage of the mail. Several of the culverts on the rail road within fifty miles of the city have been swept away, and it will be some days before the damage on the rail road is repaired, so as to allow the transmission of passengers and freight. What the damage beyond this distance has been it is not definitely known, as all communication is cut off by the high waters, but we have sufficient information to warrant us in saying that the crops of Burke and Jefferson which ten days since were of the first promise, are most materially injured.—Georgian.

THE WEATHER.—Yesterday the symptoms of another thunder-storm appeared about 3 o'clock—it burst upon us a little after six in the shape of a rattling visitation of hail and driven by a brisk wind. We looked into the street and our yard in some astonishment at the respectable shower of frozen missiles sent from the clouds. We observe that our neighbors of the Planters & Mechanics Bank have had their windows terribly battered—hope it will not affect the exchanges or protract the suspension. The hail fell in many instances larger than a fowl's egg and the ground looked very queer, as if profusely scattered with huge pebbles.—All windows exposed to the south must have been shattered. The rain meantime was violent and the thunder loud.

P. S. Since writing the above we learn that the hail storm made quite a sensation in the city. Draymen were pelted from their carts and left their horses to run about the streets half frantic—exposed windows were smashed to atoms. A gentleman informs us that he weighed a piece of hail and found it to be three ounces—after it had lain about a quarter of an hour in the wash of the rain. We can readily credit it. The rattle of the hail on the house tops was like the falling of a shower of brickbats. About 7 o'clock the storm seemed past—but it was soon renewed though without hail, and as we write (8 P. M.) the rain is falling heavily.—Charleston Mercury, June 5.

INTERESTING.—The St. Louis Bulletin announces the arrival at that place, of Major Hamilton, Indian Agent, from the Upper Missouri. He brought with him, says the Bulletin, one of the two Ohma Indians who some time age barbarously murdered a white man on the border of the State. Both of the murderers were taken, but in descending the Missouri the canoes of the party were wrecked. In consequence of an attempt to escape the prisoners had been ironed, and when the canoes went down one of them was drowned.

Major Hamilton has also succeeded in rescuing from an Indian village, seven Spanish boys from Santa Fe, who had been captured by the Pawnees. Two of them were also drowned. These boys are now at the residence of the agent, and will be sent home the first opportunity. We understand that the chiefs of the Ohma tribe are desirous that the murderer should be hung at their village as a public example. They appear to have the greatest confidence in Major Hamilton, and yielded him the murderers without resistance.

EXCITING FROM THE SOUTH.—THE RECENT INDIAN OUTRAGES.—We have further advices from the South, in relation to the recent murders by the Indians.—It appears that the attack in which Lt. Sanderson suffered, was much more fatal than was at first supposed. We annex an account from a Jacksonville (Fa.) paper of the 20th. Also, some futher particulars in relation to the attack upon the company of Mr. Forbes, and the massacre at Fort Crum:

On Wednesday, 20th inst. while a Lieutenant and two men were passing between Micanopy and a place called Black Point, they were surprised and fired on by a party of Indians; the Lieutenant and one man wounded and one killed. Same evening, Lt. Sanderson, in command of Micanopy, while on a scout with 18 or 20 men, discovered a fire in the woods, and on going to see from whence it proceeded was surrounded by about 50 Indians.—Lt. S. and nine men, three blood hounds and their keeper killed upon the spot, and four men missing. On Friday, news reached Newnansville that three men were killed between Posts No. 11 and 12. On Thursday a scout discovered the trail of about 100 Indians, in the "Wolf Hommock," six miles south of Newnansville.

In addition to the above, we have intelligence of 5 men being killed between Picolata and St. Augustine, within six miles of the latter place. This happened on Friday, the 22d ult. Those killed were two carpenters, belonging to Picolata who were shot from a public wagon, three Actors attached to Mr. Forbes' Theatrical Corps, who were going to St. Augustine to perform. Luckily, however, Mr. Forbes and the Actresses had passed some time before.

News has also reached us by the General Clinch that "Fort Crum," or the settlement where Fort Crum was originally located, was attacked, and all in the settlement killed. This latter intelligence was brought by express to Black Creek, on Saturday the 23d ult. and is no doubt correct.

FROM FLORIDA.—The steam packet Florida, Capt. Nock, arrived this morning from Black Creek. By her, we received the Jacksonville Advocate, of the 26th ultimo, from which we copy the following melancholy intelligence:

On Wednesday, the 20th instant, while a Lieutenant and two men were passing between Micanopy and a place called "Black Point," they were surprised and fired on by a party of Indians; the Lieutenant and one man wounded, and one killed. Same evening, Lt. Sanderson, in command of Miconopy, while on a scout with eighteen or twenty men, discovered a fire in the woods, and on going to see from whence it proceeded, was surrounded by about fifty Indians. Lt. Sanderson and nine men, three blood hounds and their keeper killed upon the spot, and four men missing. On Friday, news reached Newnansville, that three men were killed between Posts No. 11 and 12. On Thursday, a scout discovered the trail of about 100 Indians, in the "Wolf Hammock," six miles south of Newnansville.

News has also reached us by the General Clinch, that "Fort Crum," or the settlement where Fort Crum was originally located, was attacked, and all in the settlement killed. This latter intelligence was brought by express to Black Creek, on Saturday, the 23d instant, and is no doubt correct.

Thus we have a fearful record of at least twenty lives, as victims to the utterly defenceless state, in which a great portion of our country now is, and has been since the discharge of the volunteers.—Experimenting in this matter is preposterous. Nothing but the most decided, energetic action, and that unremittingly continued, will keep the savages in check, or afford our suffering citizens any protection.

THE BANK CHECK FORGER DISCOVERED.—The extensive forgeries committed in the latter part of April and the beginning of the present month, upon twelve of our banks, through their system of marking each other's checks "good" have probably not yet escaped the recollection of our readers. According to the statements then published, accounts were opened in the several banks in the names of Vanarsdale & Roberts, Steiner & Wood, and George B. McKee & Co. all of whom were put down as residing at No. 42 Walnut street. On the 30th of April checks drawn by Vanarsdale & Roberts, were deposited by one or the other of the above mentioned firms, with the word "good" written thereon, and the name of the teller forged, and, by the way, remarkably well executed. After depositing these checks, the amounts were then drawn out without suspicion. When, as usual, the banks made their exchanges the next morning, (May 1st,) the fraud was detected, and it was likewise ascertained that no such firms as the above named had ever done business at 42 Walnut street. The amount of money then reported to have been obtained by these forgeries was said to be about $20,000.

The banks offered, through the newspapers, a reward of $2,000 for the apprehension of the forger or forgers; the police of both this city and New York were stirred into activity, but all their exertions failed to find a trace or clue to unravel the mystery enveloping the whole affair.

Several days ago, some of the bank officers received information from a private source which induced them to believe that the forgers, or one of them, was within their reach, if a plan was skilfully laid and quietly conducted. The tellers, therefore, of three of the banks, viz. Mr. Thos. Sturgess, of the Western Bank, Mr. J. J. Cope, of the Commercial, and Mr. J. R. Paul, of the Moyamensing Bank, concluded to undertake his arrest without the aid of the police officers. Admitting Alderman Aaron Davis into their plans, he issued a warrant for a man answering the description of the person who drew the money; and, after three days continued labor and vigilance, they succeeded in arresting at a Mrs. Gourlay's boarding-house, in Seventh street, above Chesnut, the man described in the warrant, who proved to be Dr. William M. Eldridge, a young man of fine education, gentlemanly manners and address, an associate and visiter in some of the first and most wealthy families of this city, and originally of a most respectable family in Evensham, N. J. where he has many relations. Immediately on his arrest, a hearing was had before Alderman Davis. The counsel and tellers of the various banks upon which the forgeries were committed were present, and the prisoner's identity was positively sworn to as the person who opened the false accounts, deposited the checks and drew the money. It also appeared that several of the New York banks had been bled in the same way, in times past, of about $20,000.

A comparison of the hand-writing of the fraudulent checks of both cities, showed that they were drawn by the same person, and a further comparison of the somewhat disguised handwriting of the checks, and the natural hand-writing of Eldridge, rendered the conclusion inevitable that he is that same person.

There are corroborative circumstances besides. It was in 1834 that the first fraud of the kind was perpetrated in New York; Eldridge was, it is said, then there; but soon after went to Europe with Dr. Mott. That gentleman was robbed in Paris, rather mysteriously, of 3000 francs in gold, which he never recovered, though the police of Paris, made considerable exertions for that purpose, which might possibly have been crowned with success had the Dr. given heed to their hint that his companion, Elbridge, might know more in relation to the robbery than he chose to let appear. Since the return of Eldridge to this country, we believe the New York Banks have again been fleeced after the same fashion, but whether or not by him, deponent saith not. Of the many small circumstances accidentally discovered, which caused suspicion to fall upon Eldridge, one was, the fact of his writing most splendidly, and being able to imitate various hand-writing exactly.

When, after a full hearing, and in default of $20,000 bail demanded, the prisoner was committed for trial at the next General Sessions, on the charge of forgery, his feelings found vent in tears. He was taken down to prison by a person whom the Alderman specially deputed for that purpose.

A search warrant was subsequently issued, and placed in the hands of High Constables McLean and Young, who made a thorough examination of Eldridge's room at his boarding house, and found of the money obtained by the fraudulent checks, $5,700; of notes of hand for money lent by the prisoner, and in good hands, $4,500, and about $1000 worth of jewelry.

It is the opinion of those best able to give an opinion, that Eldridge had no assistants in his fraud, but perpetrated it himself alone; hence probably his long impunity, which doubtless would have continued much longer, had not the casual combinations of several trivial circumstances fixed suspicion upon him.

To explain his singular conduct in remaining so long amid the scene of his frauds, continually braving detection, is not so easy, unless the fact that he was engaged to be married to a young, interesting and highly intelligent lady of this city, in two or three days, and was to have then set out at once for Europe, may be sufficient for that purpose.—Ledger.

THE ELOQUENT METHODIST.—We had an opportunity on Sabbath evening last, to hear the Rev. Robert Newton, in one of his characteristic sermons. It had been announced during the week, that he would preach at the Methodist Church in Seventh street, and the church was filled to its utmost extent, nearly an hour before the services were to commence. A great number finding it impossible to enter the church, remained outside, and the whole street for some distance each way became filled with a dense mass of people anxious to hear the preacher. When he arrived, finding it difficult to force his way into the building, and that the congregation in the street probably exceeded that in the house, he concluded to conduct his services in the open air. Reaching the steps of the church, he addressed the auditory for more than an hour, in a most impressive manner, and was listened to during the whole time by the assembled crowd with the greatest attention. He then entered the church, and finding it still thronged in every part, he preached another sermon, marked with his usual power and eloquence. Mr. Newton is no rhetorician, in the technical sense; but, with a powerful voice, an excellent memory, deep devotional feelings, and a command of language like the perpetual gushings of a fountain—he on the instant attracts the attention of his hearers, and excites their interest not to lose a syllable of what he utters. Unincumbered with notes—tied down to no studied effort previously arranged—he dashes at once into the midst of his subject, Bible in hand, its spirit breathing upon his lips, and takes the congregation by surprise. Instead of any slow awakening of emotions, or leading the thoughts step by step to the momentuous subject of which he is treating, the hearer finds, before he is aware of it, that the orator has got possession of his heart, and that the things whereof he speaks are indeed of momentous consequence to every rational being. Mr. Newton, so far as we have been able to judge, indulges less frequently than many popular preachers in illustrations drawn from a fertile and glowing imagination; but when he does bring forward an illustration drawn from the works of man, or the wonders of the visible creation, he is exceedingly happy and impressive. On the whole, we consider him a remarkable preacher; and can well understand why, in his native England, crowds attend upon his ministrations, and why, in this country, wherever it is known that he is to preach, such multitudes press forward to hear him.—Bro. Jon. N. Y., June 6.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church adjourned sine die, on Wednesday last, after a session until midnight. We learn that Dr. Thomas E. Bond, of this city, has been appointed principal Editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, at New York. The Doctor is an admirable man in many respects, and his removal from our city will be lamented by many of his friends, both in the Old and New Church. Still we think, at this particular juncture, the choice on the part of the church was very judicious, for there is certainly no man more wedded to Episcopacy, or better able to defend it by specious sophistry. We shall, however, meet the visits of the Advocate hereafter with more than wonted cordiality, as it will not fail to remind us of one for whom we have been taught to entertain the highest respect from our very cradle.—Meth. Prot. 7th inst.

We have been informed,—but hope we shall be so happy as to hear the report corrected—that the General Conference, now in session in Baltimore has refused to supply the pulpits of the Methodist Protestants Churches with ministerial service. Can it be that this spirit is to be perpetuated? Again we express our hope that the report will be corrected.—Letter Press.

The Letter Press has been incorrectly informed. Our pulpits we are happy to say have been regularly supplied by our Episcopal brethren since the second Sabbath after the commencement of General Conference.—ib.

A GOOD HIT.—We were a little amused while at the General Conference the other day, at hearing allusion made to a typographical error, which it appears had occurred in some copies of the M. E. Church Discipline. The word Episcopacy, was so printed, as to read Episcopopacy! We should suspect the compositor in such a case, of more wit than carelessness.—ib.

Congress is beginning to work in good carnest. One day last week they passed one hundred bills, all of a private character—the class that are generally most neglected.—ib.

PERCUSSION.—A terrible accident occurred recently in Dundee, Kave county, Illinois. A son of Mr. Moses Boone was shaking a canister, containing some damaged percussion caps, when they exploded, bursting the canister, a piece of which struck a little girl five years of age, a daughter of Mr. Boone, in the neck severing the juglar vein, from which she bled to death in a few minutes. The boy was severely injured, the greater part of his hand being torn off, and his arm broken in two places.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.—In the U. S. Senate on Friday, Mr. Sevier, of Arkansas, moved to take up a resolution designating a day certain for closing the present session of Congress. The motion was rejected by a considerable majority. In the conversation which took place on the subject, several Senators expressed the opinion that, in the present condition of the public business before the National Legislature, it would be improper to fix upon any particular day. The state of our relations with Great Britain, on the question of the North Eastern Boundary, was also referred to as an additional reason for postponing the resolution for the present.

AN IMPORTANT LEGAL DECISION.—In a late session of the Supreme Court at St. Louis, a decision was given which is considered of great importance. The matter ground contested was, whether a debtor in making an assignment for the benefit of his creditors has a right to stipulate that they shall receive the dividend which the assignment will make in full satisfaction of their claims, and that the debtor shall be released on the payment of that. The Court, after full argument and review of authorities, gave an extended decision, declaring that a stipulation for a release of a debtor contained in an assignment, makes it null and void.

AMERICAN WESLEYAN OBSERVER.—We have received the 16th number of this paper. It is published in Lowell, Mass. We find some things in it which we the South are not prepared to admit, while on the other hand it has much to praise and admire. The manly independence of the Editors is highly commendable. It is the only paper in the M. E. Church which has the moral courage to assert and maintain the rights of the laity. It dares to take a public notice of episcopacy and speak of its enormities. So far we bid it God speed. We can hardly admit such a thing as an exchange for our small Banner; if however, the brethren will send it to us as a matter of courtesy, we will feel greatly their debtor.—Charleston (S. C.) M. P. Banner.

The Philadelphians are truly a church going people, and the day set apart for Christian worship is, in general, religiously and sacredly observed by them. Every Sabbath each church is filled with all classes and descriptions of persons—the aged, the young—the homely, the beautiful—the sire and the son—the matron and the daughter. There is something greatful and sublime in a whole people thus thronging around the sacred altar, and offering up praises and thanksgiving to Him who has commanded us to keep the Sabbath day holy, and pouring out the incense of grateful hearts for the mercy and love that a Divine Providence has extended towards them. No better criterion whereby to judge of the morals of a community is wanted, than to witness the manner in which it observes the Sabbath.—Alx. W. Mes.

WILMINGTON, N. C., June 3.

THE CROPS.—We very much regret to hear of the bad prospects for the grain crops in this section of the State. The rice fields of the Cape Fear have been deluged by water, from the late powerful rains and from the successive rises in the river, that the chance for an average yield is very slim.

The low-land corn fields are also in such a state from the same causes, as to forbid the hope of more than a half crop. The upland fields are rather better in appearance, but far from promising.

We were surprised to learn whilst in Sampson county the other day, that the destructive insect called the chintz bug was committing its ravages on the corn in the central parts of that county. It has not been known before in that region, and, the farmers say, is progressing year by year towards the seaboard.—Chron.

EXTRAORDINARY OCCURRENCE.—On Sunday evening, the Wesleyan Methodist Chapel, in Douglass, Isle of Man, became the scene of one of the most extraordinary occurrences ever witnessed in any place of worship. Divine service had proceeded as usual, until the preacher, Rev. Robert Hayes, had given out the passage of scripture chosen, for the discourse, when a strong and muscular female, who sat in the body of the chapel rose from her seat, and with deliberate step and firm, ascended the pulpit stairs, entered the pulpit, seized the preacher round the arms and waist, and in a magical manner turned him down stairs, at the same time exclaiming, "Now I'm satisfied! The Messiah is come!" The effect produced upon the congregation was truly electrical; females fainting, gentlemen laughing, many running out of the chapel without their hats, and all in the highest state of excitement. After the sensation had subsided a number of men ascended the pulpit stairs, for the purpose of expelling this intruder; but this prov more difficult task than they contemed, for she defended herself in a gals style; and it was not until after a siderable struggle had taken place she consented to forego her claim to pulpit, which, she so stoutly mained, was built for her use, and not for reverend gentleman. Having, howr, been expelled by physical force, she ented herself by exclaiming, "Glory od!" and was put out of doors, where continued to ejaculate this and simie expressions. Order having again restored, the reverend gentleman asded the pulpit, and proceeded with his course. We have since heard that unfortunate woman has been sent to tle Rushen.

CROPS.—We are happy to learn from some the farmers of this county, that the prospect wheat has greatly improved during the last t or ten days. We have within some ten days examined the tat in a number of townships both in the north tern and western parts of this county. It is opinion there will not be more than from a d to half an average crop. The fly are still at k at it, killing the wheat and causing it to ome straw fallen.

EXTRA SESSION OF THE PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE.—We cut the following from the Pittsgh Intelligencer of the 13th inst.

LATEST FROM HARRISBURGH.—Mr. Williams kindly furnished us with the news that the provement Bill has finally passed with an apropriation of $100,000 for the Monongahela vigation Company; $15,000 for surveys for Rail Road between Pittsburgh and Harrisgh, and also, a Macadamised Road from Pittsgh to Laughlinstown; $600,000 to the Erie tension.

The Tax Bill, which is the most important has shed its last stage, and was ordered to a third ding in the Senate. These are vastly impor- t. The Legislature has probably adjourned, he Bank and other Bills will possibly be passby without being further acted on this session.

While the subject of pewed churches was un- discussion at the late General Conference of M. E. Church, Mr. Bascom requested Mr. wton, the delegate from England, to state t was the practice in his country on this sub- :

Mr. N. said "that pewed churches in the sleyan connexion were universal, were with- exception; that the City Road Chapel, built ter Mr. Wesley's own supervision and direcn, was pewed. This was the chapel of all oth- in England, Wesleyan. True, they all had e free seats: such seats they always should e. In Ireland they had lately found the pewchapels to work much better. They had sevl in all the principal cities in that country.— had seen several families in this country who d to be whole-hearted Wesleyans in England, now attended other churches because their ilies could not sit together in Methodist rches here. He thought he could say confitly, that he knew what Mr. Wesley would do e were now alive in this country. He had wn Methodism forty years, and no man in gland has had an opportunity to know it bet- . He thought that if Methodism had free ts to accommodate the poor, it ought to use same liberty to accommodate the rich. He s decidedly in favor of pews."

Our episcopal brethren are constantly circula- g the opinion that the Protestant Methodist urch must go down, &c. When at the same e they have good reason to believe otherwise. re is an extract from a private note addressed us, written by one who manifested as much zeal inst us, in our outset, as any other man, and de as many predictions about our failure. But e has convinced him of his error, and, to his dit be it spoken, he has honesty enough to acowledge it. He is still an itinerant minister the M. E. Church, and as the extract will shew ch attached to her form of government. That can see no advantage in our system over t of episcopacy is not be wondered at by those o understand the nature of the human mind.

"As it regards the M. P. Church at the present ne, I have no special objections to their course. m happy to know that many valuable young n have been converted and thrust out into the rd's vineyard since the days of our warfare.— believe that many of the older men at the time the secession, done us an injury, and misrepented the worthy dead. It is possible, however, at I did not make sufficient allowance for this the time. I think at least some of our bishops ve greatly erred since that time. I am howev- entirely satisfied that their motives have been the purest kind. I have no doubt but your urch will stand and do good, but I see no adntages there, but the reverse."

"I wish you success in your paper; if I did not already take five others, I should be glad to have it."

GENERAL CONFERENCE.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church adjourned at 1 o'clock on the morning of the 4th instant. We have not yet seen a full minute of all its proceedings. But the following particulars we gather from the papers.

Dr. Bangs is elected Missionary Secretary at New York. Book Agents, T. Mason and G. Lane, New York, and Wright and Swarmstead, Cincinnati. Geo. Peck is elected editor of the Quarterly Review, New York; T. E. Bond, of Baltimore, editor of the Christian Advocate, and Geo. Coles, assistant; Messrs. Elliott and Hamline, editors of the Western Christian Advocate at Cincinnati, and W. Nask, editor of the German publication at the same place; Charles Cook, editor at Pittsburgh, Pa., and Charles Davis, editor of the South Western Christian Advocate at Nashville, Tenn.; L. L. Lee, editor Conference Journal at Richmond, Va., and Wm. N. Whightman, editor of the Southern Chistian Advocate at Charleston, S. C. Bishop Soule was appointed delegate to the British Conference. The next General Conference will be held in New York.

The committee on the Itinerancy reported against the petitions for a lay delegation, and the election of presiding elders. Dr. Bangs stated, the episcopacy of his church had always been a moderate episcopacy; if he meant in point of talent, we have no objection, but if he mean in point of power and prerogative, we shall have to dissent, for, in this respect, they have nearly every thing in the whole heaven and earth of Methodism.

The conference reconsidered and reversed their act in the case of Silas Comfort, who appealed from the Missouri Conference, who had censured him for receiving the testimony of a colored person, on the trial of a white member.

Two additional Missionary Secretaries have been created, one for the south and the other for the west. Dr. Capers was appointed to the former and E. R. Ames to the latter. These make three Missionary Secretaries for the church. What their duties are is not stated, but it seems to us rather strange, that the Methodist Episcopal Church does such a heavy missionary business, that she can afford to pay the salaries of three Secretaries to attend to it. We are afraid the charities of the Book Concern find too many out-lets of this kind, which accounts for the small amounts which are annually distributed to the widows, &c.

On Thursday morning at 2 o'clock, a destructive fire broke out at Ithaca in a new frame building not entirely finished, situated in the rear of Oswego street, and intended for a theatre, which destroyed a number of the best buildings in that most flourishing village.

John Parker, Esquire, a venerable merchant of Boston, died in that city on Friday morning last, at the advanced age of eighty-five years.

Professor Bronson is now instructing the embryo ministers at Andover, Mass. About the 23d of this month, he expects to be at New Haven, Ct. His portrait has been painted by Mrs. Towle and engraved by Sartain in mezzotint. It is for sale at No. 9, Spruce street.

The Louisville Journal, on the authority of Capt. Dunham, of the steamboat Gen. Brown, states that two-thirds of the growing cotton on the Mississippi, from the mouth of White river to Vicksburgh, was overflowed when he passed. The river was still swelling at White river, tho' it had commenced falling at Memphis.

FLOUR.—There were cleared at Cleveland, Ohio, for ports in New York and Canada on the 24th ultimo, 25,196 bushels of wheat, 6,566 bbls. of flour and 458 barrels of pork.

There were in store at Michigan city, by the last accounts, 37,800 bushels of wheat and 4,600 barrels of flour. Had been already this season, 19,500 bushels of wheat and 3,200 bbls. of flour.

The Legislature of the State of New York, at its recent session, passed an act to cancel the judgment then existing against the University of the city of New York, in the name of Robert Wiltse, late agent of the State prison at Sing Sing, for the sum of nine thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars and nineteen cents, damages and costs. The debt was contracted for marble got out by the prisoners, and employed in the construction of the University edifice.

A correspondent suggests with regard to the N. Y. Herald, that it would have a good effect to call upon all editors throughout the country, who have the good of society at heart by the encouragement of sound morals, to strike from their exchange list the name of this vile slanderer.—New World.

The American states that Dr. Eldridge, the young man who has been arrested in Philadelphia for his extensive forgeries, was "a correspondent of that obscene and blasphemous print, the Herald." It would be difficult to say which of the two crimes is the most disgraceful.—Ib.

No female, who considers herself a lady and a woman of virtue, should encourage or in any way permit the visits of a gentleman, who ever alludes directly or indirectly to that filthy farrago of vice, the Morning Herald. Every father should forbid the visit at his house of young men, who are known to be the readers of that paper; and in this respect emulate the dignified conduct of Mr. Charles King, editor of the New York American, who is said to have resented the insult of an individual, who spoke of a description of a ball in the Herald to one of his daughters, by ordering him never to enter his house again.—Ib.

The Philadelphia North American, a paper of high standing and great respectability, thus prefaces its quotation of the excellent article in the Star of Thursday, on Bennett and his Herale.—Ib.

BENNETT'S HERALD.—We have never, since our commencement, until yesterday, alluded to the compound of obscenity, blasphemy and falsehood, called Bennett's Herald. Were it and its contamination confined to New York, we probably should be thought wandering from our course to notice it, but inasmuch as it has extended its baneful influence to Philadelphia, and men of character and standing are heard quoting it, we think it but right to show our readers the light in which it is viewed in New York. The Signal commenced the good work of exposing it, and is manfully following it up, whilst the veteran editor of the Star thus seconds the attack of that paper.

We copy the following from the "Philadelphia Herald" of Tuesday, and understand that on the same day the very efficient Mayor of Philadelphia, directed the Police Officers to take into custody every person found reading the polluted sheet, which is said to be the daily companion of too many of our females—they cannot claim to be considered ladies.—Ib.

PRESENTMENT TO THE GRAND JURY.—We learn that Judge Barton of the Criminal Sessions on Monday morning called the attention of the Grand Jury to the infamous advertisements of a certain Madame Restell, circulating in this city. He advised them to present the shops in this city, where these detestable medicines are sold, and also to find a bill against the "New York Herald," and all who sold it in this city, for publishing these obscene advertisements. Such a course deserves commendation, and the Court will be sustained by every friend of morality and decency. We trust the Grand Jury will act promptly on the subject, and present all concerned in disseminating this moral poison among us. The infamous and indecent character of this woman's advertisements, and of the sheet in which they appear, have long been remarked.—Philadelphia Herald.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Bicknell's Reporter, June 9, 1840.

ARRIVAL OF THE FIRST STEAM SHIP AT BOSTON.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Unicorn, arrived at Boston on Wednesday afternoon, at 5 o'clock. The weather was so thick that the telegraph did not announce her appearance till she hove in sight, and the people instantly turned out in crowds, upon the wharves and the tops of the houses, to bid a cordial welcome to this most welcome stranger.—The ship received a salute from India wharf, which she returned. The band of the ship Columbus played as she approached, upon which the Unicorn passed round that ship, and came near the end of Long wharf—and turning again she went over to her berth at East Boston. The British and American ensigns were flying at the City Hall and several other parts of the city, as well as at East Boston, and every one seemed to be animated with joy.

The Unicorn stopped at Halifax six hours.

The Unicorn left Liverpool on the 16th ultimo, and brings papers to that date from Liverpool and from London to the 15th.

LONDON MONEY MARKET.—There was some confusion on the 14th, in consequence of the representations of the budget. The course to be taken to replenish the exchequer appeared not to be fully understood. The last quotations are as follows from the Courier:

The English securities have been very steady this morning. Consols for the present transfer again been quoted 10⅛ and for time 81⅛. Exchequer Bills have been 19s, to prem. and East India Bonds 2s to 4s prem. Bank Stock has been firm at 170 14, and the Three and a Half per Cents have remained at 100 3-8 to 100½.

On the evening of the 13th, there was a sharp debate in the House of Lords, on the motion of Lord Stanhope, to present an address to the Queen on the state of the British relations with China. The mover thought the opium trade wrong and was opposed to hostilities in its support,—and thought it ought to be restrained.—Lord Melbourne was opposed to the address, and defended the conduct of Capt. Elliott. He said the address moved would have the effect to embarrass the operations of the Government with the Chinese, whether by negociation or armed force; and he expressed the opinion that the growth of opium could not be stopped, in the British East Indies; nor that the sale could not be prevented in China, but must be made a matter of compromise.

The Duke of Wellington was opposed to any interference, at present, in the question, by Parliament, and wished to leave it to the East India Company. He said that the British Government had long encouraged the opium trade, and it would be wrong now, to turn round upon them and tell them to sacrifice their property.—Lord Ellenborough contended that it would be impossible to prevent the growth of opium in British India, and equally as impossible to prevent its introduction into China. The proposition for the address was not carried.

Her Majesty had a drawing room on the 13th, at which was present all the elite of English nobility. All the Ambassadors of foreign courts were present except Dr. Stevenson of our own. Mrs. Stevenson, however, is mentioned as present, but no cause is assigned for the absence of the Minister.

MAINE BOUNDARY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Friday, May 1.

Mr. Hume begged to ask whether her Majesty's Government were now able to state in what condition the negotiations respecting the Maine Boundary were?

Lord John Russell. I have some doubt how far it is consistent with my duty to answer the question which the Hon. Gentleman has just put to me; but as, no doubt, there is considerable anxiety upon the subject, and as papers upon the subject have been published in the United States, I think it would be desirable to give a general outline of the state in which the question at present stands between the United States and this country relative to the Maine boundary.

The House will recollect I stated that there were two very distinct questions: the one was the general question of the boundary, arising out of the treaty of 1783, and the treaty of Ghent; and the other was with respect to the interpretation of our agreement for the sake of preserving jurisdiction and possession undisturbed by the two parties made in the course of the spring of 1839. With respect to the former part of the subject, a proposition was made by my noble friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the name of the Government, last year, and the reply to that was a counter proposition of a totally different nature being made by the government of the United States.

At the same time commissioners were appointed by the government of Great Britain, who had surveyed the disputed country, and had arrived in this country in January last. The report was received only a few days ago; it contains matter of very considerable importance, and is now under the consideration of the government; and an answer will be immediately returned to the last proposition made by the government of the United States, informing them how far we can fall in with the proposition they last made.

That is the only answer I can give at present upon that branch of the subject. With respect to the question relating to the provisional agreement of last year, it is unfortunate that it is almost entirely upon it that recent difficulties have arisen. The Noble Lord then adverted to the difference that had arisen between the two countries on this subject; and concluded by saying, I trust and believe that peace will not be interrupted, but that the whole will end in a formal and amicable settlement of existing differences. [Cheers.]

London dates of the 12th, say that the recent news from New York, holding out the idea of an amicable adjustment of the boundary question, rendered stock more firm, and Consols hold at 91 3-8, a small improvement. Money was abundant.

LATEST CHINA NEWS.—The Bombay mail of the 31st of March last has just arrived. All was still hostile. The Emperor of China had approved of all Governor Lin's measures, and distinguished the Admiral of the junks who had engaged with our vessels. Our military preparations were proceeding. Alexandria letters of the 22d ultimo, and Constantinople of the same date, have arrived. They contain no facts of importance. Paris letters state that the Neapolitan question was deemed settled. The Turco-Egyptian quarrel was nearly arranged.

The Singapora Free Press, of the 20th of February, brings intelligence from Canton to the 20th of January. An imperial edict was issued on the 5th, declaring the English to be outlawed, ordering the trade with our nation to be immediately and entirely stopped, and threatening the severest punishment to any other people who conveyed or disposed of English goods. This edict was issued in consequence of her Majesty's ships Hyacinth and Volage having commenced, as it is said, the honors of war.

TURKEY.—The London Sun of the 15th, says—The latest intelligence from Constantinople is of the 22d ult. Advices had been received there from Alexandria that Mehemet Ali had caused some Turkish sailors, to whom Colonel Hodges had given passports to Constantinople, to be seized and shot as deserters, and that such officers as received passports, were degraded to the ranks. A Tartar has also arrived at the Porte in three days from the Taurus, with the positive assurance that Ibrahim Pacha had received orders from the Viceroy to waste no more time, but march at once upon Constantinople.

Certain it is, that the day following the arrival of the Tartar, Lord Ponsonby had a private conference of three hours' duration with Reschid Pacha. If this intelligence be true, orders cannot be too soon given to a British and French fleet to pass the Dardanelles for the protection of the Turkish capital.

TERMINATION OF HOSTILITIES WITH NAPLES.—The brief and bloodless war with Naples has terminated, after the capture of a number of Neapolitan vessels, in the acceptance, by the King of the Two Sicilies, of the profered mediation of France. His Neapolitan Majesty had laid an embargo on English vessels, but it was removed after a few days. It is supposed that the captured Neapolitan vessels will be released. The arbitration will be carried on at Paris.

REMAINS OF NAPOLEON.—We have Paris dates to the 13th. They are wholly devoted to enthusiastic congratulations upon the idea that the ashes of Napoleon are to be transported to France. The papers say that Generals Betrand and Gourgand, and Count Las Cases are to accompany the Prince de Joinville to St. Helena. General Petit, of whom Napoleon took so affecting a leave at Fountainbleau, in 1814, will likewise proceed on the mission.

MURDER OF LORD WM. RUSSELL.—No event appears to have created so great an excitement in London as the murder of Lord William Russell.

At an early hour on the morning of the 6th, he was discovered by one of his female domestics dead in his bed, having been most barbarously and inhumanly murdered. The unfortunate nobleman was brother to the late and uncle to the present Duke of Bedford—uncle, of course, to Lord John Russell, the present noble Secretary for the Colonies.

The calamitous event which has thus suddenly brought sorrow and mourning upon one of the highest and most distinguished families in the country, was, as we stated before, discovered by the housemaid, who upon going down stairs to attend her ordinary avocations, was alarmed by observing several articles scattered in the utmost confusion. On entering the apartments she discovered desks broken open, and their contents also scattered about the floor. She immediately gave the alarm, and the domestics being roused, immediately proceeded to his lordship's sleeping apartment.

Here the catastrophe in all its horrors, was in full view before them. His lordship was lying in bed with his throat cut, and the pillow saturated with his gore. The servants fled from the scene, horror-stricken, and immediately gave the alarm to the neighborhood. Two medical gentlemen were promptly on hand, who examined the wound, and found it to extend from the shoulder to the ear. It had evidently been done with a razor or some sharp instrument, and immediate search was made for it, but none could be found.

The deceased lay upon his back, and the position he was in would seem to lead to the inference that when the frightful deed was committed, scarcely a struggle could have taken place. He must have been dead several hours. The most diligent inquiries and examination of the premises was immediately instituted, but without finding any thing, whereby to trace the perpetrators. The only thing of value missed was a gold watch. They next endeavored to find out the means by which the entrance had been obtained. There were marks of footsteps at the kitchen door, and the bolt had been wrenched from it.

It was thought possible that the villians had been in the house previous to the retiring of the family to rest. At first, suspicion was excited against a valet who had for some time lived in his lordship's service, until about ten months ago, when he left, as it is stated, in consequence of having given offence to his master. A commissioner was constituted for the purpose of ascertaining every particulr relative to his lordship's other servants. The street was crowded during the day, and the excitement at times was tremendous.

On the 9th, the excitement was increased to a most extraordinary degree, as it became known that an investigation of most extraordinary character was in progress, and that circumstances likely to afford a clue to the perpetrator of the horrid deed had been ascertained. His lordship's valet, Courvoiser, exhibited many symptoms of uneasiness of mind, and he was put under the custody of a police sergeant. He was next conveyed to Bow street Police office; and the London papers of subsequent dates are filled with particulars of his examination. Circumstances are somewhat suspicious, but no positive proof had been elicited which could criminate him.

A disastrous fire broke out in London on the morning of May 14th, in Mary-le-bone street, which was attended with the loss of one or two lives, and great hazard of the lives of several other persons, who were saved with difficulty. A lad was saved by forcing a hole by crow-bars through a solid wall.

Queen Victoria's birth day, 18th ult. was to be celebrated throughout the kingdom in a splendid manner.

No fewer than 4,800 persons have taken their departure for America during the last six weeks, from the port of Drogheda, via Liverpool. It is supposed that each person, on an average, takes with him twenty sovereigns.

A letter in the Paris papers states that the late horrible persecutions of the Jews, at Damascus, was principally directed by the French Consul, aided by some other French residents. The agents were said to be infamous characters, and the Austrian and British governments would, it was supposed, take up the case and interfere.

Goodwin, the young man who left New York with a large amount of money belonging to his employers, was arrested in Plymouth on the 7th, in company with an abandoned female who went with him from New York. Thirteen thousand dollars were found in his possession, which he surrendered to Mr. Cripps (the member of the firm who went to England in pursuit of him.)—He stated that he had spent about $500 of the stolen money. In consideration of this surrender by Goodwin, Mr. Cripps made a compromise with him and consented not to prosecute. Mr. C. made a present of 20*l.* to the woman, to pay her passage to the United States, and also gave 40*l.* to the officers who had assisted in the recovery of his property.

Mr. Morrison, the soi-disant hygeist died at Paris on Sunday, May 10.

A few corn riots had occurred in some of the provincial markets of France, in consequence of an advancement in the price of grain; but letters received on the 9th ult. at Paris, says that the rains which have since fallen have produced a most favorable effect on public opinion, and no further riots are expected.

Col. Pasly was going on with his operations on the wreck of the Royal George, and from his success it was hoped that the hull of the old ship would not much longer obstruct the harbor of Spithead.

There was a terrible conflagration at Sallenches in Switzerland on the 26th April. Forty individuals were either dead or dying at the last accounts. Upwards of fifty were known to be dreadfully mutilated, and more than one hundred had disappeared without their fate being known.

ORIGINAL PIECES, NO. XII.

I was within the bound of things,
  Erst first creation's morn,
And view'd the empty hollow space
  Ere atoms had their form.
I strove within the wide expanse
  A resting place to find,
But found no shape or shade or form,
  Nor sense or law or mind;
Whene'er I mov'd I mov'd with speed,
  Nor resting place could find,
But rang'd throughout infinite space,
  Unknown and unconfin'd.
That space or self could ever change
  What was and yet was not,
Seem'd strange, incredible, absurd,
  I knew no other lot;
But strange a tremor shook old space
  From centre ev'ry where,
But how nought shook or nothing mov'd,
  To mind I can't declare; [been Some Great First Cause there must have Unknown and unperceiv'd,
That liv'd throughout and being gave,
  And life to all that liv'd;
But soon a state of being was,
  And things assum'd a form,
I seen no might and being move,
  Or fate or chance or storm:
And now was chaos matter rude,
  Base of created things,
Matter inert in lifeless form,
  Pois'd on her dormant wings.
Where nothing was came darkness black,
  And atoms form'd a world,
And I got lost until light came,
  When round and round she* whirl'd,
Then first from time without a bound,
  I found a place to rest,
'Twas on an adamantine rock,
  The firmest and the best,
And while I paus'd on hardest rock,
  And look'd through endless space,
The work of change, the form of things,
  Mine eye could clearly trace.
I saw old chaos changing form,
  Part chang'd itself to earth,
Part chang'd into the heav'nly frame,
  And gave the stars their birth.
I saw the grass spread o'er the lawn,
  And trees adorn the hills,
While shrubs and grass of richest bloom,
  Bent o'er the ripling rills.
I saw the lamps in ancient morn,
  First shoot a glimmering ray,
While one pale light illum'd the night,
  A greater light the day.
I saw the wave first move with life,
  And fowls above it fly,
And largest whales heave ocean's waves,
  Yet ocean did not sigh.
I saw the earth give birth to life,
  In ev'ry form of beast,
From greatest mammoth of the wild,
  To creeping things the least.
But strange to tell I saw some dust
  Shap'd into form or man,
An image great above all else,
  Form'd for some wond'rous plan,
Though mute his frame, and cold and pale,
  It soon gave signs of life,
When strait an anxious mind portray'd,
  To rule all nature's strife. V.

AGRICULTURAL.

DURHAM CATTLE.—The superiority of the New Improved Short Horns over the common stock of the country, and of others, consists in their early propensity to fatten, the marble-like mixture of the fat and the lean in their flesh, the lightness of hide and tallow, the destruction of the superfluous parts, as the large hanging dewlap, thick head, large horns &c.; their greater milking qualities in general, and their greater docility. The full blood is at present too high priced for most farmers to possess these animals in any quantity, but they can choose the common stock and cross with some of the improved cattle. It has been observed to have been the constant principle of the most intelligent breeders to procure such animals as were capable of weighing "the most in the most valuable joints." It must undoubtedly be an object of great importance to have those parts which are of but little value as small, and of as little weight as possible. The famous "Durham Ox" in England weighed at five years old upwards of three thousand pounds. And at eleven years of age, he weighed nearly that weight, although suffering from a painful illness that killed him: and this animal was out of a common cow by the Durham bull, Favorite. Mr. C. S. Clarkson, the most successful breeder of cattle, in his address to the Miami Valley Agricultural Society, stated that he had no hesitation in saying that the Durham Cattle was the finest breed in existence. That from five years practical experience, their aptness to fatten, their early maturity, large size, and superior beef, and milking qualities, not omitting their gentleness, beauty, and symmetry of form, had fully convinced him of this. The Durham Bullock at four years old is better than the common breed can be at any age, and this with the same food and treatment. As yet, however, the price of these animals is quite too great to justify the use of the full blood for the common purposes of beef and milk; but the crosses on the common stock of the country are found to be most advantageous; and every farmer should furnish himself with this breed. The cross produced from the stock of 1817 and the late importations, will in all probability be one of the most improved breeds in the country.—Practical Farmer.

From the Albany Cultivator.

THE MOST PROFITABLE BREED.

Having thus given a hasty summary of the principal facts which tend to throw light on the main question before us, viz. "what breed of cattle is most profitable?" we proceed to state our convictions on the subject.

That the common cattle of the country do not possess the greatest attainable combination of excellencies, will readily be admitted. A selection of them present very desirable qualities for the dairy and the yoke; but in feeding properties, and especially in early maturity, they are deficient. A full blooded Durham bullock will go profitably to the butcher, at least two years earlier than the American, a decisive consideration to the grazier: and although the former is the greater consumer, the extra food required by him, will weigh but little against the two or even one year's additional keep of the latter.

But notwithstanding all that may be said for or against them, it is to the best cross with selected animals of the common race, feasibility and expense being taken into consideration, that the common American farmer must look for the most profitable breed of cattle. In this proposition we wish to be distinctly understood. We do not intend to assert that the produce of any cross we might thus make, would surpass in value, breeds already in existence; but the entire substitution of a foreign variety for our own, presupposes an expenditure of time and funds utterly out of the question.

The question then is, with what breed is this ameliorating change to be effected? On a careful comparison of the characteristic merits and defects of our own cattle, with the corresponding ones of other varieties, we arrive unhesitatingly at the conclusion, that to the pure improved Durham, we must look for the basis of the desired improvement. A cross with the Devon or Hereford, would sacrifice milking properties: the dwarfish and ill-shaped Alderney, is not to be thought of: the Ayrshire or the Long Horn, possess no excellencies that the Durham does not possess in a greater degree: and the Holderness, and the Teeswater Short Horns, compared with the improved race, are as the crude ore to the manufactured and polished metal.

Experience has already proved, that the cross between the Durham and our common race, is a most judicious one, and examples are not wanting of it in our own county. A few years since, a bull, sired by Wye Comet, was introduced into Homer, and his progeny are remarkable for their size, beauty and milking properties. They are but few, as most of our people at that period, who gave a thought to the subject of the improvement of their cattle, and they were not numerous, preferred the cloddy buttocked Yorkshires! Yet, there is not perhaps one of the immediate descendants of this bull, that would not be readily selected out of a large herd of the best common cattle, for its superior beauty or form.

The first cross between choice native cows and the improved Short Horn, has generally resulted equally favorably: indeed, the very beauty of the produce, has tended to prevent further attempts at improvement, by encouraging farmers to breed directly from half and three-quarter bred bulls. They frequently lack little of the beauty of their sires, and their services are to be more cheaply procured. But the characteristics of a variety thus obtained, are not sufficiently stamped upon them in the first, second, or even third or fourth cross, to be perpetuated with any great degree of certainty in their offspring. In the language of the Rev. Henry Berry, "to breed from the produce of a cross directly among themselves, will lead to the results which have induced many persons, without due consideration, to believe conclusive against crossing; but to take one cross, and then return and adhere to one breed, will in the course of a few generations, be found to stamp a variety with sufficient certainty."

Repeated experiments have amply demonstrated, that interbreeding between the Durham and our common race, if conducted on the principles advocated by Mr. Berry, viz: by a constant resort to the pure blooded bull, is attended with a decided and manifest improvement of the produce in every successive generation. The bull selected, should be small of his kind; fine in the bone; unusually full in the crops and bosom, and wide in the loin and haunch—points in which the common breed are defective. He should be chosen too, from a family of decidedly good milkers. If the bull is large of his kind, the produce are generally coarse, and marked with the defects which attend great disparity in the size of the sire and dam. The dam should be as good in the points indicated in the bull, as our means of selection admits of: short legged, compact, deep in the girth, and a plentiful and steady milker. We have already alluded to the change effected by the farmers of Ayrshire on a poorer breed, by a Short Horn cross; and there can be no good reason why the American farmer, with the same skill and perseverance, may not be equally successful. Indeed there are grade Durhams already among us, which there can be no doubt are equal or excel the Ayrshire in every desirable point.

The Durham, as we have before remarked, requires more feed than our small native cattle. This, his superior size would lead us to expect. But though a greater, he is a more promiscuous consumer, the coarsest quality of hay or straw being readily devoured by him.—In England, straw, with a very small allowance of turnips, constitute his exclusive store keep in winter. But to bring this matter to its true test, will the Durham yield as great a return in flesh, fat, or milk, for the amount of food consumed, as any given breed? That he will, repeated experiment, as well as his daily advancing popularity, in a country where there are many varieties greatly excelling our own in aptitude to fatten, and at least equaling them in milking properties, fully attest. The amount of food required by him, therefore, forms no objection to the improved Short Horn, on good soils, either in his pure state, or as a cross with others.

The only question now to be considered is, will the recommended cross, supply us with working cattle? It is asserted on the best authority, that the pure blooded Durham ox will "work admirably;" and the reason assigned for his not being oftener used for that purpose in his native country, is, that his early maturity renders him too valuable at three, for the butcher, to be retained with profit until four or five, for the yoke. There can be little doubt, that united with our smaller, but vigorous and active race, a heavy and powerful variety of working cattle will be produced. Those especially fed on upland and less nutritious pastures, whose labor ought to compensate for their tardier maturity, with size, feeding properties, and docility, increased by the cross, will lose little, and probably nothing of the activity and hardihood of the common race. To what precise extent interbreeding should be carried, to produce the most valuable breed of working cattle, experience can alone determine.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

From the Youth's Cabinet.

THE TWO BOYS: OR TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD.—John was a boy who lived with my father, when he was about ten years old. One Sabbath day he was left at home alone, to take care of the house, while others of the family went to the house of worship. Among his chosen amusements for the day,—probably all wrong,—he took down the looking glass, and before putting it up, he accidentally broke it. Then fearing lest he shoud be punished for his presumption and carelessness, he contrived a way to escape, and put up the broken glass, determining not to be found out. When the family returned from worship, they saw the broken looking glass. As they all knew that he had been alone, my father, not suppoing that he would deny it, asked him how he broke it. But he boldly denied it. Well, then how came it broke? was the next inquiry. With a strange and foolish falsehood he replied: "The thunder broke it." His falsehood was soon detected, and he was punished, not for taking down the glass and breaking it, for he did not mean to injure it—but for his falsehoods, which he wilfully and wickedly meant to tell, and did tell.—Had he told the truth about it at first, as he did afterwards, he would not have been punished at all. How foolish, then for any children to tell falsehoods as many do, only to prevent punishment, as they may think, when those falsehoods are the very things, and the only things, for which they many times get a severe punishment.

The other boy's name I am not able to give. I only learned his honesty in truth-telling, from the newspaper. He lived in Boston. During intermission at school, he was carelessly throwing chips about and broke a light of the school house window. He knew that he had been careless, and done wrong, and probably expected correction for the fault. When, as usual, the teacher came into school, with his scholars all in their seats, he saw the broken window, and inquired how it was done. This honest boy did not wait, as bad boys generally do, to have somebody else expose his faults; but he was first upon his feet, when the question was asked, and with grief in his feelings, told the teacher that he had done the mischief, and how he had done it.—The teacher then, instead of punishing or scolding him, loved him and highly commended him as an honest boy, who chose to tell the truth, though he did not know but it might expose him to punishment, as the other boy and many others have done, by telling falsehoods.

This boy's father, on learning of his little son's breaking the window, sent word the next morning to the teacher, that he would engage a glazier as soon as he could, to repair the damaged window. The teacher sent his thanks to the gentleman for his kind offer; but said he wished to have the privilege of repairing it himself, as a token of his affection for the lad, and his approbation of one who had so much honesty and moral courage, as to tell the truth under such trying circumstances.

Seeing then, dear children, who read this, how much better truth is than falsehood in this world, even for faulty children, will you not all see to it, the every particle of falsehood and deception is cast away from your very hearts; and that you are filled with truth, and always speak the truth from the heart, until the time, which will soon come, when you and I must meet the Judge in the great day of the Lord? And if reasonable people shall think so much better of you for being always true, rather than false to them, will not God think infinitely better of you forever and ever, than men can ever do here, if you will be true to Him? Certainly He will. Then will you not all, now, and continually, truly, confess all your sins unto Him? Will you not be truly sorry for them? Will you not truly pray to Him to forgive them all? Will you not truly believe in Him, and believe all His words concerning the judgment, and everlasting state of saints and sinners? Will you not truly love Him? truly engage to trust in Him for salvation? Will you not truly hope in Him, truly obey Him, and love His appearing, till, true to His promise, He shall come to give you "a crown of righteousness," in "the heavenly Jerusalem?" (2 Tim. 4: 8. Heb. 12: 22.)

CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

New York, April, 1840.

WASHINGTON LOVED HIS MOTHER.—Immediately after the organization of the present government, Gen. Washington repaired to Fredericksburg, to pay his humble duty to his mother, preparatory to his departure to New York. An affecting scene ensued. The son feelingly remarked the ravages which a tottering disease had made upon the aged frame of his mother, and thus addressed her:

"The people, madam, have been pleased, with the most flattering unanimity, to elect me to the chief magistracy of the United States, but before I can assume the functions of my office, I have come to bid you an affectionate farewell. So soon as the public business, which must necessarily be encountered in arranging a new government, can be disposed of, I shall hasten to Virginia, and"—

Here the matron interrupted him.—"You will see me no more. My great age, and the disease that is fast approaching my vitals, warn me that I shall not be long in this world. I trust in God, I am somewhat prepared for a better. But go, George, fulfill the high destinies which Heaven appears to assign you; go, my son, and may that Heaven's and your mother's blessing be with you always."

The President was deeply affected.—His head rested upon the shoulder of his parent, whose aged arm feebly, yet fondly encircled his neck.

The great man wept. A thousand recollections crowded upon his mind, as memory, retracing scenes long past, carried him back to his paternal mansion, and the days of his youth; and there the centre of attraction was his mother, whose care, instruction and discipline had prepared him to reach the topmost height of laudable ambition; yet how were his glories forgotten while he gazed upon her, from whom, wasted by time and malady, he must soon part to meet no more!

The matron's predictions were true. The disease which had so long preyed upon her frame, completed its triumph, and she expired at the age of eighty-five, confiding in the promise of immortality to the humble believer.

Remember this story little children.—Washington, you know, was a great man. I shall never expect to see any little boy become a great man who does not love his mother.

FATAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE LOVE OF DRESS.—A young lady had been born to a rich inheritance, and was the only child of parents who were dotingly fond of her. In a fashionable education, nothing was spared to make it complete; but dress was the idol of the mother's heart. The daughter was gay, and answered all her mother's hopes in making a display in the fashionable world. But the hour of sickness came; it was a dreadful hour; for it was the termination of all her earthly hopes. The minister was called in.—He talked of death, judgment, and eternity. She had never before had such language applied to her, and she trembled.

In the dying hour she called for some of her fine clothes.—When they were brought, she looked up to her mother, and said, "These have ruined me.—You never told me I must die. You taught me that my errand into this world was to be gay and dressy, and to enjoy the vanities of life. What could you mean? You knew I must die and go to judgment. You never told me to read the Bible, or go to church, unless to make a display of some new finery. Mother, you have ruined me. Take them away, and keep them as a remembrance of your sin, and your daughter's sad end!" She died a few moments after.—Female Adv.

SINCERITY.—To practice sincerity, is to speak as we think; to do as we profess; to perform that we promise; and really to be what we would seem and appear to be.

A LARGE CARGO.—The ship St. Petersburg cleared from Mobile for Liverpool on the 15th ultimo, with 2905 bales of cotton, weighing 1,300,000 pounds, said to be the largest cargo ever taken from Mobile in an American ship.

HONESTY.—An individual by the name of Spears stopped, near the Raccourci Bend, the wreck of a flat boat, which it is supposed was floating down the Mississippi from Natchez, and found in it upward of five thousand dollars, principally in Louisiana money, and immediately delivered all to the Parish Judge at Point Coupee.—Baton Rouge Gazette.

FATAL DUEL.—The Toronto (U. C.) Transcript of the 21st inst. reports the fatal issue of a duel which was recently fought at Montreal between Lieut. Col. White, of the 7th Hussars, and Mr. Grant late of the 79th Regiment. The Colonel fell from the fire of his opponent. The cause of the quarrel had reference to the conduct of Col. ANNOUNCING THE DEMISE OF EXALTED PERSONS IN CHINA.—The lady of his excellency, the Hoppo, died lately at Canton. BRITISH JUSTICE.—England, by her Corn Laws, virtually prohibits the importation of grain, although some of her inhabitants often suffer for wholesome food in consequence of the high price of wheat.—At the same time, by force of arms, she threatens the independent nation of China with war and invasion, because the said nation enforces a decree prohibiting the importation of a poisonous drug!!!—Boston Times.

A SUGGESTION TO PARENTS.—Were children accustomed from infancy to hear nothing but correct conversation, there would be but little need of their learning arbitrary rules of grammar—they would naturally speak and write correctly.—Hence it is that children of educated parents are generally so much more easy and graceful in their conversation than the children of the uneducated. Our language, our manners, is caught from those with whom we associate; and if we would have the young improve in this important part of education, we must be careful that they hear no vulgarism from us—Parents and teachers cannot be too particular in the presence of imitative children.—Pestalozzi.

AN ESSAY ON MEEKNESS.

hristians should take to themselves the whole ur of God; they should fortify every weak lnerable point, that satan may not get the ntage of us. Let no one say, this effort to fy and defend ourselves against the onsets e devil will obscure the glory of divine grace, t is only through obedience to God that the y of His grace is secured.

purpose directing my readers' attention to necessity of obeying Christ in this command, ake my yoke upon you and learn of me, for n meek," &c. I will take up the subject in following order: 1st. Give a scriptural defin on and illustration of christian meekness. Point out some errors among professors of gion, and meet some objections to our views. Enforce the absolute necessity of meekness, rder to inherit the kingdom of God.

. Meekness is quietness, mildness, gentlei. Whatever is opposed to quietness, cannot meekness. Those who are ever disturbing meddling with the affairs of others, either lly, socially or religiously, in an uncouth ner, are not meek. It must not be inferred ever, that meekness is manifest only by an ire indifference toward others; on the conly, it will prompt to watch over one another ove: it will enable us to do all our deeds in ity. Whatever is opposed to mildness, can be meekness. Even sharp rebukes should be inistered in mild and unruffled feelings.—se who are harsh, grating and criminating in r manners, cannot be classed with the meek. atever is opposed to gentleness, kindness forbearance, is opposed to meekness. The sionate, wrathful and malicious, are not k. Meekness then consists in mildness and tness of temper; a mind trained to the im "Live and let live," in all quietness; of indulgence and forbearance toward all n. Hence, when the meek man is cursed or ed, he blesses and prays for his enemy—when s railed on, he rails not back again—when he bused in his person he does not enrage him', but rather gives place to wrath; he will turn other check and suffer the injury repeated continued, rather than raise his hand and ke his fellow, who is made after the similitude the Almighty—in a word, he takes Christ for example; he walks as Christ walked; he ps in His footsteps; he LEARNS of Christ. nce, as Christ was, so is he in this world; rist lives in him. Behold the meek and lovely viour, showing himself yet on earth, in the of the meek.

. I am to point out some errors and meet obtions, &c. I shall not go out of the church quest of erroneous opinions and practices. e first is the practice of evil speaking. This censurable in any class of society, but is bly criminal in professors of religion. May d purge the church from this corrupting and nous practice! It may be asked, but what is d speaking? The answer is, it is speaking of faults or infirmities of another, with the ign of injuring his character and standing in mmunity. Making or circulating falsehood, what we do not know to be true; and even culating things disreputable to another that true, is evil speaking. When we know an dividual to be an impostor, a "wolf in sheep's thing," it is our duty to let the matter be ly known, not with the bare desire of sinking n, but of saving the church from his devouring vs. Hence, a judicial process should be instited, and the individual censured or expelled m the church, according to the word of God. e habit of backbiting and devouring a man's aracter, is as diametrically opposed to gospel ekness, as darkness is to light. But it is my inful duty to record it as a fact, that ministers the gospel of the meek Nazarene, are guilty this unchristian practice. Oh, christianity! sh for thy embassadors. Laymen are guilty the same. Lord Jesus, by the warning power thy spirit, purge thy people from dead works, serve Thee, the living God.

A second practice is, returning evil for evil. ow common is it for both ministers and laymen en they are spoken evil of, to give the offender s slang in his own coin—tit for tat—railing for iling. O! how little like the Saviour of sinrs. How little of the spirit of the meek Nazene have such. But, perhaps one may say, you iminate almost the entire church on this ound,—be it so then. Yes, "Let God be ue, but every man a liar" in his pretensions christianity, who does not walk according to e rule God has given.

A third practice, or rather principle and prace, erroneous is, resisting "evil" as the Sa our terms it. He says, "But I say unto you, at ye resist not evil; but whosoever will smite ee on thy right cheek turn to him the other so." I understand this to be a principle laid wn which His followers should always be guided r. That they should not from any provocation er raise a hand to hurt even the hair of an emy's head; but on the contrary, by kindness nd love, to heap coals of fire on his head, that ey should overcome evil with good. But, I k how little is this regarded? How common is when one is attacked in his person, to return low for blow; to engage in brute-like contest, nd injure his antagonist as much and as fast as ossible. Did Jesus ever engage in such a conest, when he was smote on the cheek and spit pon? Did He swell and foam with wrath and ngage in personal combat with his abusers? o. He was led as a lamb to the slaughter—le opened not his mouth—He raised not his and, though He could have commanded more an twelve legions of Angels to His assistance. ut most professors of religion never get into ersonal rencontres with their fellow beings; this is fortunate for them; for a large majority think a man fully justifiable when personally assailed in using his fist or something else, and bruising and beating his assailant until he desists. This is allowed to be manly, and christian too. Hence, many ministers and laymen make it a settled principle not to be run over by any man. They let us know what their views are on this point. They set an example before others of this kind. They wink at the conduct or justify those who do engage in personal rencontre when assailed. A professed follower of Jesus is not censured for hurling a sinner into eternity, swift as a ball from the pistol's mouth. Seeing that a large portion of the professed followers of Jesus have imbibed such principles, is it strange that they produce the results so often witnessed; quarrels, strife, contention, whispering, backbiting, maliciousness and almost every evil work. Is it any longer a matter of surprise that the piety of the great majority of professed christians is so exceedingly shallow? Christ has set us an example of suffering that we should walk in His footsteps. And now my dear christian friends, I call on you in view of the account you have to give to God, who will judge the world by Jesus Christ, whose word is the rule by which we will be justified or condemned, to forsake that anti-christian spirit and practice just noticed. You had better be called a low, mean, cowardly person, than to set the law of Christ aside; it is by the law of Christ we are to be justified or condemned in the great day.

Objections. First, it is brought in as an objection to that meekness maintained in this essay. The cause of God may be seriously injured for lack of a true knowledge of a man's character, and that he who is acquainted with him, should give all the information he can. But this objection overlooks that charity which covereth a multitude of faults. We should be careful, lest any act should not be done in love. Secondly, it is supposed that a mild and unresisting spirit will only embolden an adversary, and that the only way to keep peace with some people is to let them know that you will talk back and strike back when assailed. I ask, did Jesus set us such an example? or has he sanctioned such a thing in His word? Must we violate the precepts and examples of Christ to sustain our honor, and that of God's cause? Must we break Christ's commandments to show our love to Him? Must we do evil that good may come? God forbid.

3. The necessity of meekness may be enforced by the following considerations: 1st. We will never demonstrate to the world the divinity of that religion which we profess, but by meekness. If we have ten thousand gifts and graces beside, and lack meekness, few or none will have confidence in our religion. Irregular and boisterous faults will destroy our christian influence.—2dly. If we obey Christ, we must be meek; for He has said, "Learn of Me, for I am meek," &c. Jesus is the great teacher. He teaches by His word, by His example, and by His spirit and meekness, and humility comprehend the whole of His instructions; many duties are laid down, but all are embraced in these. 3dly. We must be meek if we get to heaven. The disobedient shall never enter the bright abodes of glorified saints, and those who are not meek are disobedient. We must be like Jesus if we wish to be with Him and see Him as He is. He is meek and lowly in heart; therefore we must be so too Brethren and sisters, friends of Jesus, keep your Master's words, walk in His footsteps, and be led and governed, and guided by His spirit. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.

THEOPHILUS.

MT. VERNON, O., JUNE 6, 1840.

Bro. Springer: I have just been reading Mr. J. Smith's remarks on Bro. Dalbey's reply. He thinks slavery is a political question, with which ministers ought not to meddle. I wish to ask a question or two for my own satisfaction, and desire that friend Smith or yourself would favor us with your views:

1st. Is murder a political evil, and have ministers nothing to with the murders which are so numerous at the present? Is this matter to be left entirely with politicians?

2d. Is adultry a political evil?

3d. Is Sabbath-breaking a political evil?

4th. Is theft a political evil?

5th. Is covetousness a political evil? Have ministers nothing to do with these things? I want light upon the subject, &c.

Yours, in the bonds of equal rights,

MOSES SCOTT.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

ELYRIA, LORAINE, O., JUNE 9, 1840.

Mr. Editor: We have very good times in this section, although we are not within the bounds of any circuit. We organized a class on last Sabbath under the Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church, in this place, of eight members, and have a prospect for several more. I think that our cause is gaining ground here.

We would respectfully solicit a visit from the President, also from the preachers on Cleveland and Wayne circuits; and if this should meet the eye of Bro. Heath we will be pleased if he will pay us a visit. Inquire at C. Eldred's Temperance House, three miles west of Elyria village.

GEO. D. WILLIAMS.

WESTVILLE, COL'A., O., MAY 28, 1840.

Bro. Springer: At present the members of Mahoning circuit are much alive in religion. I have been many years a Methodist, but I have never seen greater displays of Divine goodness to God's people. Some of our episcopal brethren, who have occasionally met with us, say they have never had better feasting.

We have a meeting house now in progress in Williamsport, which we hope will be ready for our next quarterly meeting. I have taken in several new appointments, and could take in many more if I were able to fill them.—As to support, my family have plenty to eat and to drink.

Yours, &c.,

WM. M. M'CULLOUGH.

CHAMPAIGN CO., O., JUNE 11, 1840.

Bro. Springer: On Saturday and Sabbath last I held a two days' meeting at West Liberty. The Lord was with us and we had a refreshing season. Two professed religion and four united with the church. We had no ministerial aid.

I have recently commenced laboring in the vineyard of the Lord, though I am young and inexperienced, and meet with opposition, yet I am glad I have given myself up to preach Christ crucified. Pray for me that I may be steadfast.

The work of the Lord is progressing in our circuit. Bro. Hunt, our superintendent, is faithful to his charge.

Yours, with respect,

VOLNEY THOMAS.

LANCASTER, IA., JUNE 2, 1840.

Bro. Springer: We closed our third quarterly meeting yesterday morning; our quarterly conference decided in favor of dividing the Ohio District.

During the meeting we had a good class of feelings. Love-feast and sacrament were profitable; at the latter it was gratifying to see our episcopal brethren partake with us. Through the meeting the shout of "glory to God!" was frequently heard. We feel encouraged to press on, putting our trust in Him who has said, "I am with you always even to the end of the world."

We had, at this meeting, the aid of brethren Flood, Collins, Bennett, Wheatly, Chitwood, Allen, Bassett and your humble servant.

The Recorder is well received here, and is said to be the best paper in the western country.

Yours, &c., ANDREW HOZEY.

UNION CO., O., JUNE 18, 1840.

Mr. Editor: The cause is yet on the advance with us. Since my last we have held several profitable protracted meetings. One at Middleburg, Logan county, at which nine persons professed religion. Last Saturday week we commenced another at Bro. Gill's in Champaign county, at which several obtained religion and ten joined the church.—We have received into the church on Union circuit, since conference, 146. The membership seem much stirred up.

We have several protracted meetings in contemplation, which we wish published, in view of procuring ministerial assistance. The first is to commence at Richwood, Union county, on the 20th of the present month. We much desire, Mr. Editor, your presence if possible. Or if you cannot attend this, can you attend one at Marysville on the 27th? The third will be held at Bro. Burdock's, in Union county, eight miles east of Marysville, to commence the 4th July; on the 1st of August, another will be held at Bro. Inskeep's, ten miles west. Our last quarterly meeting will be held at Middleburgh, commencing on the 15th of August, to which we invite our President, Bro. Flood.

Yours, &c., I. HUNT, Sup't.

EXTRACTED.

OKAW, CLINTON, ILL., MAY 25, 1840.

Bro. Springer: Since my last I have been one round on my circuit. Nothing very interesting occurred until the 9th and 10th instant, when a two days' meeting was held at Bro. Skelton's in the neighborhood of Bro. Hale's. This meeting commenced under circumstances very discouraging. The appointment had been given out some weeks previous; the old folks however not feeling so well pleased with our former success, in this place, embraced this as a favorable opportunity for introducing a spirit of confusion, in the minds of the people, by getting up a two days' meeting in the same neighborhood, at the same time, about three miles distant from ours. The day previous proved to be a very wet, rainy day, in consequence of which none of the ministerial brethren were present, and I was left to conduct the meeting alone. Under all these apparently unfavorable circumstances, the hour at length arrived at which our meeting was to commence.—A very respectable congregation assembled, and there appeared an unusual spirit of devotion resting on the people, and there was a more than ordinary stir among them during the first prayer.

* * * * *

Our meeting closed at about two o'clock in the morning with an addition of three more to the church, in all sixteen at this meeting, making an increase of forty members in the class at Brother Hale's since last December. The whole increase this year is eighty-seven, and our prospects are still flattering.

There will be two camp meetings on this circuit, this year, one in the neighborhood of Bro. Elijah Lacy's, seven miles north-west of Mount Vernon, Jefferson county, Illinois, and the other in the neighborhood of Bro. Hale's, fourteen miles south-east of Frankfort, in Clinton county. All brethren in the ministry, who can, are invited to attend them both.

Yours, &c. WM. PATTERSON.

FIFTY YEARS' WORK.—Half a century ago, Ohio was a wilderness. In the year 1835, that State had a population of one million five hundred thousand inhabitants: one large splendid and densely populated city, and half a dozen thriving towns; 1010 post offices; 5 incorporated cities; 33 banking companies; 10 colleges and principal seminaries of learning, together with public institutions for the insane, the deaf and dumb, and the blind.

STARTLING FACTS!—The late three years' war with England, the most powerful nation in the world, cost the United States about $90,000,000.

The three years' war in Florida, with a remnant tribe of Seminole Indians and a few runaway negroes, has cost us $40,000,000, or nearly half of the whole expense of our war with England!!

The war against the miserable Indians and negroes, was wickedly commenced, has been ingloriously conducted, and threatens to be interminable.

There is not in the history of wars among civilized nations, a parallel for the wantonness, imbecility and corruption which distinguishes this dishonorable, infamous crusade.—Albany Evening Jour.

THE EVILS OF INTEMPERANCE.—Here then is the evil:—300,000 drunkards; $30,000,000 squandered; 150,000 paupers; 16,000 criminals; three fourths of all the casualities; one half the insanities; and 30,000 deaths annually. Here, said the Lecturer, is the evil. Patriots, philanthropists, mere men, will you look at it? First, let the 150,000 paupers pass along in their rags. Would the audience look at them? Sitting here, surrounded with comforts, they could not duly appreciate such a spectacle. But, said he, if your last bed were going under the hammer, and your wives and children were already on their way to join this motley group, then could you appreciate it without difficulty.

Next in the procession, came the 1500 insane persons—and now behold the maniac laugh! "O if I had a brother," say you, "or a sister, a father or a mother, in that company of maniacs, how should I feel?" Multiply the distress you would feel by ten thousand, and you will know something of the sum total of distress thus occasioned.

Now make room, said he, for the 16,000 criminals, dungeoned by the use of intoxicating drink. Don't look at their wives and children—the evil is not there—but at the universal insecurity of life and property which quivered all the land over.

And now let the 300,000 drunkards join in the procession; see their spewing, and hear their dreadful oaths, as they pass along. And finally pile up 30,000 bodies of dead men, in all their blood—and then remember what God has said about the drunkard.

Firm-nerved men, he remarked, had cried like children, at the mimicry of the theatre. But here were facts, in comparison with which the highest wrought representations of the theatre were tame.

THE STORMY PETREL.

This ominous harbinger of the deep is seen nearly throughout the whole expanse of the Atlantic, from Newfoundland to the tropical parts of America, whence it wonders even to Africa and the coasts of Spain. From the ignorance and superstition of mariners, an unfavorable prejudice has long been entertained against these adventurous and harmless wanderers, and as sinister messengers of the storm, in which they are often involved with the vessel they follow, they have been unjustly stigmatized by the name of Stormy Petrels, Devil's Birds, and Mother Carey's Chickens. At nearly all seasons of the year, these Swallow Petrels, in small flocks, are seen wandering almost alone, over the wide waste of the ocean. On the edge of soundings, as she looses sight of the distant headland, and launches upon the depth of the unbounded and fearful abyss of waters, flocks of these dark, swift flying and ominous birds begin to shoot around the vessel, and finally take their station in her foaming wake. In this situation, as humble dependants, they follow for their pittance of fare, constantly and keenly watching the agitated surge for any floating mollusca, and are extremely gratified with any kind of fat animal matter thrown overboard, which they invariably discover, however small the morsel, or mountainous and foaming the raging wave on which it may happen to float. On making such discovery, they suddenly stop in their airy and swallow like flight, and whirl instantly down to the water.—Sometimes nine or ten thus crowded together like a flock of chickens scrambling for the same morsel; at the same time pattering on the water with their feet, as if walking on the surface, they balance themselves with gently fluttering and outspread wings, and often dip down their heads to collect the sinking object in pursuit. On other occasions, as if seeking relief from their almost perpetual exercise of flight, they jerk and hop widely over the water, re-bounding as their feet touch the surface, with great agility and alertness. There is something cheerful and amusing in the sight of these little flocks, steadily following after the vessel, so light and unconcerned across the dreary ocean. During a gale it is truly interesting to witness their intrepidity and address. Unappalled by the storm that strikes terror into the breast of the mariner, they are seen coursing wildly and rapidly over the waves, descending their sides, then mounting with the breaking surge which threatened to burst over their heads; sweeping through the hollow waves as in a sheltered valley, and again mounting with the rising billow, the Petrel trips and jerks sportively and securely on the surface of the roughest sea, defying the horrors of the storm, and like some magic being seems to take delight in braving overwhelming dangers. At other times we see these aerial messengers playfully coursing from side to side in the wake of the ship, making excursions far and wide on every side, now in advance, then far behind, returning again to the vessel, as if she were stationary, though moving at the most rapid rate. A little after dark they generally cease their arduous course, and take their uninterrupted rest upon the water, arriving in the wake of the vessel they had left, as I have observed, by about nine or ten o'clock of the following morning. In this way we were followed by the same flock of birds to the soundings of the Azores, and until we came in sight of the Isle of Flores.

According to Buffon, the Petrel acquires its name from the Apostle Peter, who is also said to have walked upon the water. At times we hear from these otherwise silent birds by day, a low weet, weet, and in the craving anxiety, apparently to obtain something from us, they utter a low twittering pe up, or chirp.—kuk, kuk, k' k' k' k' k' k', ending in a low twitter like that of the swallow. These Petrels are said to breed in great numbers on the rocky shores of the Bahama Islands, and the Bermudas, and along some parts of the coast of East Florida and Cuba. Mr. Audubon informs me that they also breed in large flocks on the mud and sand islands, off Cape Sable, in Nova Scotia, burrowing downwards from the surface to the depth of a foot or more. They also commonly employ the holes and cavities of rocks near the sea for this purpose. After the period of incubation they return to feed their young only during the night, with oily food which they raise from their stomachs.—At these times they are heard through most part of the night, making a continual cluttering sound like frogs. In June or July, or about the time that they breed, they are still seen out at sea for scores of leagues from the land, the swiftness of their flight allowing them daily to make these vast excursions in quest of their ordinary prey; and hence, besides their suspicious appearance in braving storms, as if aided by the dark ruler of the air, they breed, according to the superstitious opinion of sailors, like no other honest bird, for taking no time for the purpose on land, they merely hatch their egg, it is said, under their wings, as they sit on the water!

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

THE SCHOOL BOY.—As I was walking by the play-ground of an academy in one of our country towns, in which I was to enter the next Monday—it being then Saturday afternoon—my attention was attracted to a crowd of boys in a distant corner. They had suddenly left off their game at ball, and had formed a ring around two of their number, who appeared ready for a fight. On joining them however, I found that the quarrel was all on one side. John Webster,—for I afterwards was well acquainted with him; he was not a bully nor a very quarrelsome boy, but it was the fashion of the day to show the proper degree of spirit;—John had been pushed down, was somewhat hurt by the fall, and was more hurt, because, as is usual, his play-mates laughed at him. So John had become furiously angry, his face was as red as a turkey cock's, his grey eyes were flashing, his fists hard clenched, and he stood with one foot advanced ready for the battle. Not so was Charles Edwards, his antagonist. Charles seemed averse to the fight: he stood still, not, to be sure, unconcerned—but did not appear to be either afraid of John, or in the least degree angry with him. 'Whip him, John,' cried out some one in the ring, for boys who dare not fight themselves, often love to set others on. Another, and he, it afterwards appeared, was the bully of the school, walked up to John and put on the rim of his hat a chip; 'Now, John,' says he, 'dare him to take that off, and we shall see if that fellow has any spunk!' Charles Edwards, seeing the preliminaries of battle arranged, appeared still determined to remain at peace.

'I do not want to fight—I will not fight. I did not push you down on purpose, and I am sorry if you are hurt.'

'You lie,' replied John, 'you lie.'

The lie was given and how could the fight be avoided? And the boys crowded around, eager to get a fair look at the battle. Charles Edwards' face became at first flushed with anger, and then he was deadly pale; his fingers seemed to twist and curl, his teeth were hard pressed together, he advanced one step towards John, who stood ready for the attack. At that moment, suddenly some new thought occurred to Charles, for he stood still, and said with a firm voice, 'I cannot fight—I will not fight,'

'Then take that,' said John, and gave him a blow in the face. Charles turned away and slowly walked off the ground, the tears running down his face, while the boys shouted after him, 'Coward! coward! coward!'

This was something new to me. I could not account for the boy's conduct. It was a perfect mystery, but I could not help feeling interested for poor Charles, though he had behaved so cowardly. I felt a strong sympathy for the lonely boy whom the whole school so much despised. I did not like to give him up. So I left the play-ground and followed Charles at a distance. He walked up the road about half a mile, got over the stone wall, and entered the grove of pine trees. No wonder, thought I, that he wishes to be alone, that he may cry over the disgrace—well may he be ashamed of himself. So impressed was I that he was weeping for his cowardice, that I waited full ten minutes before I joined him, so that he might, in some degree, get over his sobbing to talk with me. I then entered the woods and quickly found poor Charles. He was sitting on a stone, leaning his head upon his hand, perfectly composed, but so lost in thought, that I had time to look at him, without his altering his posture. His appearance was so striking that I shall never forget it. It is true, he was pale, but there was not one trace of grief, or shame, or sorrow upon his face.

As soon as he noticed me, I told him that I had seen the whole, and asked him why he suffered that boy to impose upon him. 'Why,' said I, 'if you take a blow without defending yourself, you will be disgraced; the littlest boy in school will impose upon you; you cannot get along so—you are strong, you need not be afraid, I will stand by and see fair play.'

Charles replied, 'I am not afraid; I thank you for your kindness to me, but I cannot fight.'

'Why not?' I asked.

'Because,' said Charles, in a low voice, 'when my father sent me to this school, he told me never to return blow for blow, and I promised him that I would not.'

'But,' continued I, 'your father must live out of this world, he can't know any thing of schools, if he thinks it safe for boys not to defend themselves. Suppose some one was to offer to kill you, would you not resist?'

Charles replied, 'I don't know what I can do until I am tried, but this I know, my father has been at school himself, and he knows what boys have been, and what they are. He has been persecuted, and even struck, but he would not return blow for blow; but when smitten on one cheek, he turned the other.'

I could not help saying that this was taking the gospel too literally, we must look to its spirit. It cannot mean that we should submit to all evil. People say it only means that we should be generally kind, not quarrelsome or contentious. 'I despise,' continued I, 'a bully, but I would have every one stand up for his rights, and in the school you will be despised if you do not.'

'I must be despised, then,' said Charles, 'for my father has often told me never to explain away his commands because they were difficult to be obeyed. 'My son,' he has often said to me, 'obey me according to my words, if you look to the spirit of them it will be thereby putting a meaning to them that may suit your own feelings. Oh, how useless are those laws which offenders so understand, as to make them to conform to their own views of right.' 'So I will obey my father in full, when he tells me that his children are forbidden to fight; but since I have been sitting here, I have felt how hard it is to obey, and had I not called to mind that he knew what a school was, that he knew what boys were, and how strong would be my temptation, I should have gone back and fought with John Webster. It appeared, when I first sat down here, almost too hard to bear, to have all the school laughing at me, and despising me, when I know that I am not a coward, and am as strong as any of them. To be imposed upon by any of them who pleases—not to have one friend among all the boys, it is indeed, hard to bear! But my father knows what is best for me, and I can write to him every day, and before a great while I shall go home. My father shall come out to meet me, he will put his arms around me. I can almost see him now looking upon me so kindly, as he always looked when I did right, and when I tell him about this, he will say, bless you, my son, for you have done well; come in with me, and you shall know more fully why I wished you, when smitten on one cheek, to turn the other. Your brothers and sisters are ready to welcome you home. The thought of this, is enough to make me resolve, come what will, I will not fight.'

I could say nothing to this. I held out my hand, 'Charles, you shall have one friend here, I join the school next Monday.' He took my hand and then the tears chased each other down his cheeks. —'My father knows best what is good for me. I have taken a blow and have gained a friend.'

We walked back towards the school, arm in arm, and though as we passed, some of the boys cried out, 'there goes the coward,' Charles was not troubled at it, and I left him at the door of his boarding house, more happy than John Webster who had triumphed over him at the play-ground.—Christian Reg.

Storm at Natchez; Interesting Particulars.

ESPY'S THEORY.

We are kindly allowed to make an extract from a letter of Professor Forshey, of Natchez, to Drs. Dodge and Warder of this city, giving some interesting facts in relation to the storm at that place, and its bearing on the theory of Mr. Espy. The reader will find among them, some things which, if we mistake not, have never been determined before by accurate observation. The fact of the outward explosions of houses, desks, &c. is to us a curious phenomenon.

"Every thing seems to have corroborated Mr. Espy's "Philosophy of Storms," and every thing to militate against every other explanation of such violent atmospheric commotion. In the first place, the oppressive heat of the forenoon, and particularly just before the storm, resulting from the evolution of the heat from compression in the advance annulus of the storm. Second, the roaring sound of the wind from E. to S. W. gradually as the tornado was passing, keeping constantly towards the centre of the track. Third, the extreme depression of the barometer while the storm was raging, and the explosion outward of nearly every room and building in the city.—Very often, perhaps in one hundred cases, the gavels of houses both blew out, even in the very teeth of a wind raging at several hundred feet per second! Closed hatches were blown open upward, and a desk containing only one and a half cubic feet of atmosphere to each apartment, burst the locks off its three doors. Fourth, trees were pulled up by the roots and carried several yards, and then fell without breaking their limbs, and this happened with the largest trees. Men were picked up and let down without violence or injury. On the two margins of the storms, the limbs and leaves of trees fell in great numbers, and the tin from the roofs of buildings was found 20 miles hence, and a piece of a steamboat window was recognized 30 miles N. E. from Natchez. Fifth, the position of trees were demonstration complete, in the absence of other evidence. The nearer the axis of the tornado, the nearer was their bearings, parallel with that axis, and the more remote, the nearer perpendicular, while those that point to the direction from which the storm came, or across a line perpendicular to the axis, lie beneath those that point in the forward direction of the same. This, you know, is the necessary position upon the hypothesis of concentric motion, while a current upward is of necessity a consequence of concentric motion.

The exact converse of this statement is necessary on the hypothesis of gyration The nearer the circumference, the nearer parallel with the axis of motion, and the nearer the axis the nearer perpendicular to the same. This is untrue of all I have yet seen of this tornado, and I have seen little else since its occurrence.

The estimate of loss of life and property have been too small. The number of lives should be put at some point above 300 and less than 400. The steamer Hinds that capsized, was estimated to contain 40 persons. She has been found after two weeks submergence, and still 50 persons have been found on board, to say nothing of the number who must have fallen out and disappeared in the mean time."

THRILLING INCIDENT OF THE FRESHET.—One of the most thrilling incidents which occurred, is that of a little girl about eleven years of age, who was taken up in the middle of the river about 25 miles above the city, by Captain Joseph Stanton, of a Petersburg boat. The story of the adventure of this little girl we have obtained from herself. She is the daughter Eliza, of a poor widow lady, Mrs. Sarah Stone, who lived on the river, near Ferguson's Ferry, on the South Carolina side. She says the first intimation they had of their danger, they were surrounded by the river, when her mother, a daughter older than Eliza, two brothers, younger than herself, and a faithful dog, fled to the top of their little cottage, soon after which the house was taken off by the current. One after the other they met a watery grave, Eliza and the dog only clinging to the wreck, when she came in sight of the boat of Capt. S. who had lashed it to a tree, and succeeded in making her cries heard. Capt. S. immediately roused his hands, who were all asleep, and after pursuing her about three miles, overtook and rescued her and the dog from their perilous situation. Capt. S. says she was on a few shingles, which were supported by a feather bed, being all that was left of the house on which she started, on which frail bark she had descended the river, twelve miles, when she was picked up.—Augusta (Georgia) Chron.

We are informed, says the Peoria Register, that four horse thieves were captured about two weeks ago in Iowa Territory, somewhere near Davenport, one of whom was instantly hung up to a tree, where he remained four days, and was being consumed by carrion; another was shot, and the remaining two mutilated and set at liberty; we trust, for the honor of the far west, the story is exaggerated.

THE MONEY MARKET.—We think we may venture to say with confidence, so far as relates to Money matters in Pennsylvania, the prospect is brightening.—Our Legislature have measurably, at least, responded to the wishes of the people, and have endeavored to vindicate the honor and resuscitate the credit of Pennsylvania. They have passed a bill providing for certain internal improvements, and involving an expenditure of about $2,500,000. They have also passed an act authorising a direct tax, by which above $1,000,000, or perhaps more, will be raised annually, for the purpose of paying the interest on the debt of the Commonwealth. These measures have both been signed by the Governor, and are now laws. In the Improvement bill, the clause rendering it imperative for the United States Bank to loan several millions of dollars, at 4 per cent. per annum. was stricken out, and the Governor authorized to borrow the money wherever it could be obtained, at 5 per cent per annum. This change is considered highly favorable to the Bank, and in connexion with the tax bill, cannot but materially assist the prospects of that institution. The Stock, it will be seen by our quotations, improved somewhat at the close of the week, but as there are so many "shorts" in the market, who are interested in keeping it down, and who sometimes resort to the most infamous rumors, in order to accomplish their objects, the sales alluded to cannot be considered a fair criterion of the actual state of affairs. Let us illustrate the matter. On Tuesday last, news reached town, that the clause making the U. S. Bank loan several millions at 4 per cent. interest, had been stricken out. That afternoon, the "shorts," as they are called, had been selling stock at 74½ They saw at once that the effect of the news would be favorable, and set themselves to work to counteract it. A story was circulated of an immense defalcation, and a late officer of the Bank was insidiously pointed to as the defaulter. The thing was so palpable and monstrous, however, that the only effect was a general burst of indignation at the author of a calumny so atrocious. We care not a farthing for the institution, and are, we have been given to understand, considered as unfriendly to it, by its officers; but we, nevertheless, hold such conduct as we have adverted to, as base and iniquitous in the extreme, and entitled to the scorn of every honorable mind. It is also but fair to express the opinion that the Bank has in a great measure weathered the storm by which she was threatened, and that, with prudent and skilful management on the part of her Directors, she will slowly and steadily regain the public confidence.—The State at large will also be benefitted by the recent action of our Legislature. A disposition has been shown, not only to recognize the State Debt in full, but to prevent any further delay in the payment of the interest, as it becomes due from time to time. The time for the resumption of specie payments, has not been altered. All the Banks of Pennsylvania are bound to resume on the 15th of January, ensuing. This, we have reason to believe, they will be able to do. The very inactivity in the business walks, will greatly assist them towards the desired end. Even now, they cannot make use of all their surplus funds on first rate securities, while specie commands but a slight premium, compared with what it did immediately after the suspension.—The alarm and apprehension, will, we venture to hope, gradually subside, and thus, as soon as the community know that all the Banks intend to resume at the appointed time, there will be no demand for specie whatever.—Bicknell.

A BLOODY ASSAULT.—We learn from the Baltimore American that on Friday morning cries of murder were heard in the neighborhood of Painter's Court, on Pitt street, nearly opposite the south end of Potter street, and presently the words "O, I am murdered—will no one help me home to my family." Several persons rushed to the spot, and found Dr. Josias T. Whittaker lying on the pavement. nearly exhausted by the loss of blood from a number of wounds in the groin and thigh, which had been inflicted with a large spring knife, by a person named Hugh McAlamar.

The unfortunate man was carried to his residence on the York road, and in the mean time the night watch were dispatched in pursuit of McAlamar. He was found at his own residence, having deliberately disposed of his weapon, washed himself and proceeded home after the perpetration of the deed. Lieut. Spence with some of the Middle District watch, took him into custody, and having summoned a magistrate, P. Gorsuch, Esq., the prisoner was conducted to the house of Dr. Whittaker, confronted with the wounded man, and indentified previous to taking the deposition.

The Doctor stated that he was assaulted by McAlamar, who had before threatened te flog him, and upon resenting the attack, the prisoner finding himself worsted, drew a large knife and plunged it repeatedly into the Dr.'s body. McAlamar was committed to prison. With regard to the original cause of the quarrel we have no authentic statement. The attack was made in the most furious manner, and there is little ground to hope for the Doctor's recovery.—Bicknell.

The Cincinnati Republican, of Tuesday last, says:

"Our brokers, exchange dealers, and Banks, do not appear to be doing a very brisk business. Money matters may be set down as having been rather dull throughout the week. We quote exchange on New York at 8½ prem.—Philadelphia, 3½—and Baltimore 3½. Specie is becoming scarce, though rates do not go up; we quote 6½c par funds. None of our banks pay specie yet for their own notes, except the Life and Trust Co.—their notes on demand command 6½ prem,. but no large amount make their appearance. The paper of the Ohio Banks of the interior, forms but a very small part of our circulation. The notes that command specie are at a premium, and they soon find their way home. In their stead we have a mongrel currency, as we remarked in our last, mostly based on individual responsibility. Among the city circulating medium, the notes of the Whitewater Canal Co. form a part, which are, in reality, safer than the major p rt of the floating notes. It is probable that ere long the present rates of discount upon them will be less. Most of the currency used in business operations is purchased by some of the brokers at 2½ per ct. discount.

DARING PIRACY ON THE COAST OF CUBA.—Letters have been received at New Orleans from Havana, which gives the following particulars of a most daring act of piracy and murder off Cape Antonio:—

The Br. brig Vernon, Capt. Cunningham, of Halifax, sailed from Falmouth, Jamaica, bound to Halifax. When eight days out at sea, being off Cape San Antonio, an open boat with seven men, was seen approaching the brig, and when within musket shot, fired a discharge of muskets at it. The brig having hove to, the captain of the boat informed captain Cunningham that a revenue cutter was standing at the Cape, and his papers must be inspected. Capt. C. immediately set out in his boat with three men and his papers to comply with the summons. He had not proceeded far before the other boat pulled up, and having taken possession of her, they stripped the crew of their clothes, and began the work of destruction. The captain and two men were instantly killed, and the other effected his escape in leaping overboard, and swimming ashore.

After escaping the melancholy fate of his companions, he remained in the woods five days, where he was met by Don Antonio, captain of a small craft, to whom he related the circumstances. Captain Antonio immediately went in search of the pirates, and soon found them on shore, near the Cape, actively employed in unloading the cargo of the brig. Being alone, and fearful of being murdered if they mistrusted him, he accosted them as one engaged in the same business. He bought a few guns, and contracted to sell them a small sloop he had at his residence, which was near the spot, and invited them to come in the morning and examine her.

They accordingly set out next morning, to conclude their bargain with Antonio. As soon as they arrived at his house, Antonio assisted by several of his neighbors, arrested the pirates, and sent them under a good escort to Havana, where they will be tried.

Antonio returned on board the brig, where he found the remainder of the crew who had been spared by the pirates until the cargo had been taken out. Their intention was to murder them as soon as they had finished the work. The sailor who escaped saw a great number of sails and pieces of rigging concealed in the woods.

MORE FRAUD.—The New York American says:—"We have just seen a package, of $1978 in notes dated 1st May, 1840, purporting to be of the Globe Bank in this city, of the denomination of 2, 3, and 5 dollars each, payable at ten days after date, sent on as a remittance by a Bank in Ohio, to its correspondents here.

The notes are from a plate engraved by Durand & Co., and are signed by S. D. Day, Cashier, and W. Bishop, President. There are no such names in the Directory; but at No. 12 Wall street is an office, purporting to be of the Globe Bank, upon application at which the holder of the notes was informed they could not be redeemed."

We would repeat our caution to commercial men abroad to beware of taking bills upon any bank in this city without being satisfied by proper means of the existence of such bank. This kind of swindling seems to have become a trade since the establishment of free banks.

THE BUSINESS WORLD.—Money continues abundant in New York and business dull. The balances in Bank are described as not only large, but rapidly increasing. The Express says,—"There has never been a period when money was so abundant, and when it was so out of the power of the mercantile community to get hold of it. There is so little business done, and so little paper made, that Banks cannot get a sufficient amount of business notes to discount. The rate of Exchange on England continues below any point that requires specie to be shipped—consequently there is no call on our Banks. Most of the Exchange going forward is remitted for interest—very little of it for the purchase of goods."

STABBING.—A young man named Byrely, employed in Col. Shartle's grocery was badly stabbed by Charles K. Eaker of this place, on Wednesday last. Eaker had some dispute with a boy in the grocery, when Byrely interfered and received two wounds with a knife from Eaker. Another instance of the hellish influence of rum. Eaker was drunk, when he committed the outrage. He was arrested and held to bail for his appearance next morning, but forfeited his recognizance and has not since been heard of. The wounded man, is said to be in a fair way of recovery.—Dayton Jour.

THE OREGON.—A letter from an emigrant states that in every respect, the country has been over-rated—that, excepting the valley of the Wilhamet, the seat of the Methodist mission, no portion of the territory through which he passed presents any thing attractive, or offers any inducements to farmers or any other class of immigrants. In a word, all the unfavorable representations that were made to him by returning travellers whom he met on the journey, and to whom he then lent an incredulous ear, were abundantly realized."

MORE ROGUERY.—The New York Sun states that on Saturday $2,000 in three and five dollar post notes, at ten days, of "The Globe Bank," were received in that city from a bank in Ohio. There is no such institution in existence, though a charter for a bank by that title was some time since obtained. It however never went into operation, nor issued regular bills. One of the fives received was shown us. It is dated May 2, 1840, letter B, signed S. D. Day, Cashier—N. Bishop, President.

The New York Sun states, that the boys who were arrested recently at Albany, for having persuaded one of their number to steal $180 from his father, which he divided among them for the purpose of going to Michigan, and there turning hunters, have all been convicted and committed to the House of Refuge. They had purchased almost every needful article for their intended hunting expedition, rifles, pistols, powder, lead, shot and bullet casters, hunting knives, hammers, nails, and a long catalogue of et ceteras.

DREADFUL NEWS FROM FLORIDA.—The worst apprehensions expressed in our article of Saturday, are confirmed if the account just received be true. The St. Augustine News of the 29th ult. says—There is a rumor in town, and generally credited, that the Indians made an attack on one of the Alachua settlements, on Sunday night last, killing thirteen families, and a garrison of six men. The attack was made at night, and is represented as a complete surprise. Is not this dreadful!

THE WHEAT CROP IN VIRGINIA.—The Richmond Compiler of Friday says,—"A gentleman who has travelled from some distance above Lynchburgh on the river, to Richmond, taking the south side route, represents the crop of wheat as very good. The lowland crops were extremely fine, while, in portions of those of the uplands, the bug and fly had done some damage, but he thinks partial; with that exception the high land wheat he represents as good."

TRADE THROUGH THE WELLAND CANAL. The Cleveland Herald says: The business through this route continues rapidly to increase, particularly with this port.—From the 11th to the 18th of May, forty-two vessels passed up through the Welland Canal, and thirty-six down through the same channel.—Seventy-eight transits through the Canal in a week! Of these vessels, twenty-five were bound to Cleveland, and twenty-three from Cleveland! Seventeen of the twenty-three from this port were bound to Canadian ports, all deeply freighten with the products of Ohio.

EMIGRATION FROM EUROPE.—The tide of emigration from Europe, which had two or three years back ebbed, has again commenced its flow. A letter from New York of May 27th, to the Intelligencer, states that every ship from Liverpool, London, and Harve, comes full of steerage passengers. About one thousand arrived at New York in two days. Accounts from Ireland and Germany represent the intended emigration as very great. Generally they are represented as a much better class than those who have heretofore arrived.—Cin. Chron.

From the South Western Christian Advocate.

ITINERANT ECONOMY.—Mr. Editor:—Some are of opinion, that our disciplinary allowance is two small; but my experience is to the contrary. I have been travelling upwards of four years and have received my allowance each year—which, with some small presents, and the profits arising from the few books I have sold, have enabled me to bestow on charitable objects something, and at the end of each year to lay by a small amount. But some may say, I have not been tastey in my dress, &c. I assure such, that I have been according to the words of our Discipline—forbidding "the putting on of gold and costly apparel." Let our ministry never be lucrative—let it ever be sacrificial, and our clergy will ever be as they should: humble, holy, indefatigable, cross-bearing.

But when men enter our ministry to make money, or even with the view of supporting themselves more easily than in other avocations, then will lovely flowers destined to produce rich and abundant fruit, wither and die. Let us endure hardness as good soldiers of Christ.

J. R. WALKER.

Pensacola Bank paper is now purchased by the brokers of Mobile at 50 cents on the dollar.

Our neighbor of Zion's Herald has treated the editor of the Trumpet with such sovereign contempt, that we will give an article from the latter, for the benefit of our extensive circulation—being glad to avail ourselves of the labors of every denomination, in exposing the unrighteous character of the Epis. Methodist government. Mr. Whittemoore understands the legal bearing of their institutions as well as any editor in this city, having given particular attention to such subjects. both in and out of our Legislature. Brother Brown only see how "oil and vinegar unite!" Here follows the article:—Boston Olive Branch.

METHODIST CONFERENCE.

"The Methodist General Conference has been in session for some weeks in the city of Baltimore. This is the supreme power of the Methodist Episcopal Church,—the power which controls all its operations,—appoints the Bishops, affirms or reverses the decisions of the sub-conferences, which appoints new Conferences. or additional bishops, which have the charge of the discipline, and may amend to any extent; &c. &c. It is the great law-making power of the Church. We regard it as a radical defect in the constitution of this body, that it is composed entirely of clergymen. Not a layman can have a seat. The whole lay power of that Church, the thousands of lay-members, are not entitled to a single representative. The Methodist CLERGY have the whole in THEIR hands. This is the most tyrannical and anti-democratical assumption of power, by the clergy, that ever was known in this country, not excepting that which is sanctioned by the Papal Church itself.

"It is proper however to observe, that there are not a few of the 'brightest and best' ornaments of that Church. who deeply lament this state of things; and the disaffection in this respect is fast increasing. It has already produced a separation of many churches and clergymen from the Episcopal Methodists. who have formed a new class of Christians, bearing the name of Protestant Methodists, because like Luther, Melancthon, and all the early Reformers. they protest against clerical usurpation and tyranny. This class have several publications devoted to their interests, of which the Olive Branch, at Boston, is one. They are stronger at the Southern States than at the North. But it should be remarked, that because not so many in New England have openly seceded from the Episcopal Methodists, as in other parts of the country, there are therefore, more in the body of the old Church, who are struggling and petitioning for reform, than in other parts of the country. Those who are disaffected with the form of government have not here permitted themselves to be driven out of the connection; but they retain their membership, and are exerting themselves in various ways to to bring about a reformation. We apprehend there are more real Protestant Methodists in New England than elsewhere.

"The Episcopal Methodist Church Government is a vast clerical association. The leaders in that body, the bishops and office-holders, bid defiance to reform.—But they cannot long resist it.—It is coming on like a mighty river. They may obstruct it for a short time; but no obstruction, however deep-laid, and powerful, can turn back the current. It will come swelling, rushing on; and the temporary obstruction, if it stay the mighty element of a reform for a short time, will but enable it to gather strength; and when it shall break through the barrier, as sooner or later it must, it will bear every thing before it, and the fragments of the opposing power will be carried away upon its bosom. It cannot otherwise be. Our political fathers, because they had no representation in the British Parliament among the lords and commons of that realm, esteemed it a sufficient cause of revolution; and although they contended against fearful odds, yet a righteous God looked down from heaven and smiled upon them; he raised them up friends among strangers; and he finally gave them success. In the formation of our Federal Constitution, and of the constitution of every State in the Union, care has been taken to provide for the representation of the people in the law-making departments. The PEOPLE are, and of right ought to be, the sovereign power in every State, as well as in the concentrated government of the Union. Where is there a State, a city, or a town in this great land that would tolerate for a single day, a government based on the model of the Methodist Episcopal Church? It cannot be found. We declare then, without the slightest fear of contradiction from any quarter, that the Methodist Episcopal Church government is opposed to the spirit of all our political institutions. It may be called a distributed monarchy, in which the people have the disadvantage of being ruled, in their ecclesiastical affairs, by several monarchs instead of one: it is not a democracy, the rulers are not the servants of the people;—and cannot for any stretch of power, however daring, be called to account by the people. Under such a government the people have no remedy for any ills, except such as the caprice of their masters shall give them, unless they find a remedy in trusting in God for a change, and in the onward spirit of the age.

Zion's Herald states that the Conference was employed on the 8th ult. in receiving petitions, which had been poured in, in great numbers, for several days. Among others, we perceive, that several prayed for a MODERATE EPISCOPACY; and others for the election of Presiding Elders (a sort of sub-bishops) by the Conferences, (they are now appointed by the Bishops:) and others for a lay delegation in the highest judicatory of the Church, THE GENERAL CONFERENCE. Thus we see the waters are moving.

"Dare W. C. Brown, editor of Zion's Herald, contradict a single fact, which we have here stated, as appertaining to the discipline of the Methodist Church?"

HISTORY OF ELDRIDGE THE FORGER.

A few passages from the life of a Forger.—The story of Dr. William M. Eldridge. who was recently arrested in Philadelphia on a charge of forgery, would, if related in detail be a most extraordinary one.

We have endeavored to collect from various sources a few facts in addition to those which have already been before the public, which we give below:

Eldridge was born in Woodbury, New Jersey, in the year 1809. While quite a youth he came to this city, where he was, for a time, employed as clerk to a dry goods dealer. For this fact, with most of those which follow, we are indebted to the politeness of Oliver M. Lowndes, Esq., late police magistrate, which gentleman has been chiefly instrumental in procuring Eldridge's arrest.

Leaving New York, he went to Philadelphia, and became a clerk in the store of Mr. William O'Kie, chemist. Here he remained a year or two, till he became enamored of a beautiful young lady, daughter of one of the most respectable citizens of the place. Just as he was on the point of sealing her ruin by marrying her, he was arrested on charge of robbing his employer. He was tried and convicted of the offence, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for one year.—Through the interposition of friends, however, his sentence was commuted to that of confinement in the house of refuge, whither he was sent. The young lady to whom he had been betrothed was so affected at Eldridge's misfortunes that she fell into a decline, and eventually died of a broken heart. He remained in the house of refuge but a brief period before he was pardoned on condition of his leaving the city. He was apprenticed to a tailor who resided in one of the Southern States, and with him left Philadelphia.

Eldridge, however, "had a soul above buttons," and cut from the tailor after a brief sojourn with him.

About a year and a half from his leaving Philadelphia, he was heard of in Baltimore, where he remained some time unrecognized by most of his former acquaintances, and married a young lady named Carleton, with whom he removed to Ohio; remained there four years, when he abandoned his wife and four children and came to New York. He was here introduced to the celebrated Dr. Mott, and then to many of the first families of the city, with whom, from his genteel appearance and polished manners, he became a general favorite, and an ever-welcome visiter.

He always seemed to have a ready supply of funds at his control. and without any apparent regular employment. He frequently by way of amusement, or the employment of his leisure, contributed to the various papers light, well-written articles, and ultimately became connected regularly with the New Yorker, a weekly paper. In August, 1834, a check for $540 was drawn upon the firm of Warner & Harrison. was presented at the Fulton Bank, and was there detected as a forgery. No trace was discovered, however, of the perpetrator of the forgery.

Mr. Lowndes, who was then police magistrate, had charge of the matter, and found, upon inquiry, that the signature to the check was similar to that on others drawn by Dr. Mott. The Doctor, however, could not be convinced of the reality of the case, and the inquiry was dropped for the time.

On the 13th of September, 1834, an account was opened in the Merchants' Bank in the name of Morgan & Drake. On the 29th of November following, the person who usually made the deposites deposited $2,832 41. The next day the whole balance was drawn out, and the following day it was discovered that the large deposite above stated consisted of three checks of other banks, all of which proved to be forgeries. The checks purported to have the signatures of John Lorimer Graham, Samuel Cassidy, and J. H. Mason & Co.

Mr. Lowndes was again applied to, and he, on inquiry, found that the forged signatures had been traced over those on geniune checks in the hands of Dr. Mott. An interview was held with Dr. Mott and the officers of the bank, but no satisfactory conclusion in the matter could be arrived at.

Shortly after this. a check for $910.25, drawn by a Mr. Cassidy, was paid at the North River Bank, which provod to be a forgery. On the same day, a check for $1,200 was offered at the Merchants' Bank in the name of J. H. Mason & Co. It was discovered to be a forgery by the teller, and payment stopped.

In the month of June, 1835, an account was opened at the Lafayette Bank, in the name of Isaac J. Aymar & Co. and also at the Commercial Bank, in the name of Wyeth & Cochrane. These accounts ran on to the 13th of February following, when the said firms became defunct, and it was found that the accounts had been overdrawn to the amount of $5,728.

Justice Lowndes' services were again put in requisition. He examined the checks of the "two firms," and found that they were signed in the same hand as the forgery previously committed in the name of Morgan & Drake. Nothing definite or tian Advocate, at Nashville, was not reof that paper. We understand it was behanks for his gentlemanly and christian highly commend in him, we have noticed

SSIONARY SECRETARIES.—Three such officers appointed by the late General Conference e Methodist Episcopal Church. In our last, emarked their "duties were not defined"
e accounts that we had seen of the Conference business. We have since seen it stated that they are to travel, visit missionary stations, &c. In this way, they could doubtless, be useful. But we see no propriety in calling such an officer a mere secretary. However, when we find Dr. Capers and Dr. Bangs are two of them, we need not calculate on much travelling.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church decided against dividing the funds with the deficient preachers, on the principle of general insolvency, or giving each in proportion to their claim. They are to be given to the most deficient, until they are raised equal. The practice of giving to each a percentage on his demand, is such an unrighteous mode of dividing funds, that we have been astonished at Stewards and Conferences, who have adopted it. By the operation of this principle, the minister who is deficient only ten dollars in his salary, gets a pittance off him who is deficient one hundred and ninety, or in other words, who has received but ten dollars.

☞CROPS.—The accounts of the wheat crops continue favorable. There is less complaint of injury by the fly, wet, &c., than usual.—New World, N. Y.

We have been somewhat surprised to see so many such accounts of the prospects of the crops. We have been a resident of this county since its first settlement, and we have never seen, in this vicinity, poorer prospects for wheat, than at the present. From our exchanges we learn that the wheat in the north of this State, promises well, but through every other part, accounts are very discouraging. And the papers speak of the fly having injured the wheat extensively in Pennsylvania, also, to some extent in Kentucky and Virginia. As it respects the north part of this State, they do not, usually raise enough to bread the inhabitants, but, in this respect, are depending on the southern. We should think it advisable for those who have old wheat, to hold on to it.

☞Since writing the above, we have conversed with the Rev. John Wilson, who travels through parts of Muskingum, Licking and Knox counties; he gives it as his opinion, that there will be through his route little more than the third of a crop of wheat; also with a farmer of this neighborhood, who returned on Saturday evening from a visit to the north part of Columbiana county, passing up through Guernsey, Harrison and Jefferson, and returning through Tuscarawas and Coshocton. He says, there will not be half a crop through these counties. However, the shortness of the coming crop will not be so much felt from the fact that there is considerable old wheat in the country.

GENERAL CONFERENCE.—The doings of this body were of a milder character than was anticipated by many. Considering the spirit of the times and the several perplexing questions which agitated the church, we should judge, from the various reports of their proceedings, they got thro' their business in quite a dignified manner. But this was mainly owing to the fact that the conservatives turned out to be, by far, the largest portion of the conference, and also to the fact, that there existed beside them a Methodist Church, whose government is based on liberal principles, who have already six presses employed in exposing priestly domination and promoting the interests of Liberal christianity. The episcopacy were afraid to use their power as they might, for fear of consequences. Because of the existence of the Methodist Protestant Church, the episcopal hierarchy is as completely checked, in many particulars, as if they had altered their government with a view to that object. We are well aware that such a statement will be treated with a great amount of derision and cool contempt, from a certain quarter. But we know how to understand all that.

In some of the conferences, the preachers combined to leave the ultras at home. We believe there was not more than one of the right old hard heads elected from the the Ohio Conference.

The most exciting questions which the Conference had to dispose of was that of Abolition, Temperance and Conference Rights. We have not seen all the resolutions and actions upon the first subject, but, from such abstracts as have came under our notice, we think nothing was done to greatly oppress abolitionists, or drive them from the church. But as some of the Annual Conferences have driven a portion of them from the church, we do not see how the balance can stay in, consistent with correct moral principles, unless those which have been driven away are restored.

The temperance question came up on a resolution to adopt the rule of Mr. Wesley on that subject. This was opposed by the south as imposing a new term of membership on the church. On the final vote, there was 75 for the adoption of the rule, and 38 against it. But bishop Andrews decided, that as the Discipline required two-thirds of a majority in such case, the rule was not adopted.

As it respects the rights of Annual Conferences, the bishops took from them all they could get without too much difficulty. One important item was a resolution which gives them, in substance, the power to determine what questions were suitable business for conference action.—So, any question that concerns their interest, or is offensive to them, they can now hang it up.

When about to elect the editors, J. Early moved the reconsideration of the vote, whereby it had been determined that none but travelling preachers should be editors and agents, which was so amended as that editors might be elected from among local preachers, and Dr. Thomas E. Bond, of Baltimore, was elected from the local ranks as editor of the principle Methodist journal, Christian Advocate, at New York. This re-consideration was done, probably, to accommodate that very case. At the time of the secession, which ultimated in the establishment of the Methodist Protestant Church, no man probably, in the old fellowship, did more dirty work for the episcopacy than Dr. Bond, and as he had never been rewarded for it, and having no doubt put in his claims, at this General Conference, a special procedure is had for his benefit, for this is the first time, to our recollection, that ever a local minister, as such, has been permitted to enter the sanctorum of Episcopal Methodism. But such was the strength of this claim, that the concern could not well get over answering its demands, when made, without cruel ingratitude. But the precedent is now set, and the subject of human rights is being investigated, and the march of liberal principles onward, there is no knowing where it may terminate.

The Virginia and Pittsburgh Annual Conference journals were both adopted into the royal family,—the former is called the "Pittsburgh Christian Advocate," and the latter the "Virginia Christian Advocate." This makes six "Christian Advocates," all adopted as General Conference papers.

Notwithstanding a committee reported in favor of strengthening the episcopacy, by electing two more bishops, yet none was elected. This was said to be caused by the conservatives, who were determined that no test question should be acted on. The South evinces strong sensibility on the subject of having a southern bishop, and threatened if they cannot be gratified in this matter, to separate, and a majority of the North and West, notwithstanding they are willing to gratify their southern brethren in most other matters, appear resolved not to yield this point. Fearing the consequences, the question was therefore dodged.

The following notice of Rev. O. Scott's speech on the subject of slavery, by the General Conference reporter, was published in the Christian Advocate and Journal. It is highly complimentary to his christian character. We believe this gentleman is raising in the estimation of even his opponents, thus verifying the maxim that "when a man's way please the Lord he makes even his enemies to be at peace with him."

After the reading of the journal had been finished, O. Scott rose in opposition to the first resolution reported by the committee on slavery.—He had commenced his speech on the previous afternoon by premising, that it would consist mainly of the substance of the minority report, which the conference had refused to hear, and that he would therefore read it. He adverted to the number of petitioners who had laid their prayers before the General Conference. They amounted to ten thousand persons, five hundred of whom are ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and the petition from Barnesville circuit, Pittsburgh conference, was signed by nearly the whole official body, except two. In answer to an objection that had been, and might be, urged, that many of the petitioners were females, he observed, that if there were some four or five thousand of the gentle sex, and that if the doctrine of Dr. Cake were correct, "that one woman was worth seven men and a half" in any enterprise of benevolence, then there were in effect thirty-seven thousand and a half names to be reckoned. He descanted largely on the inconsistency of slavery, or of the quietude of the church on so momentous a topic, with Methodism in all ages; and, to substantiate his position, quoted largely from Wesley and the Journals of Asbury. To exhibit the contrariety of views and action by the Wesleyan Methodist connection and the Methodist Episcopal Church in this country, he averted to the sentiments of Watson, as uttered at the period when West Indian emancipation engrossed the attention of the British brethren. (At this point conference had adjourned, and on his resumption this morning, after recapitulating,) he read various extracts from the address of the connection in Great Britain to the General Conference of 1836, and also from a paper published in the "Christian Guardian" in Upper Canada, in answer to an expression by the last General Conference, that the sentiments on slavery, as exhibited in the address of the Wesleyan Methodists, would not have been put forward in the form in which they were, had the system, as existing in the United States, been properly understood. He referred to the occasion on which Dr. Fisk had appeared before the British conference, and asserted that Dr. Bunting, in responding to Dr. Fisk's address, had used the strongest and most unqualified language expressive of the deepest and most invincible abhorrence of slavery. He proceeded to canvass the resolution of the Baltimore conference, declaring that the criminality of traffic in slaves was to be determined by the motive of the purchaser, whether through cupidity, or for benevolent and philanthropic purposes. He wished to know how we were to get an insight into men's motives, and who were to judge of their intentions or designs? He thought that such a rule of action was impracticable in application.—He also animadverted upon the votes of the Georgia and South Carolina conferences, declaring that slavery, as it exists in this country, is not a moral evil, and noticed the fact that two of the most central conferences in the Union, one of them embracing a portion of slave-holding territory, the Pittsburgh and Genessee, had repudiated the sentiment, and assumed directly opposite grounds, by large and decided majorities. He averred that it was necessary, to the church, that some definite action be had; all that the petitioners asked for was this: a simple re-affirmation of a rule which had been once established, and received the countenance of the church; asserting that his movements on the subject were confined entirely to the performance of his duty as a delegate, and to the conference room; he yet thought that the intense interest everywhere prevailing in civil and ecclesiastical bodies called loudly for some cognizable, some efficient interference on the part of the church. He did not wish to aggravate prejudices, or to inflame to a still greater extent the present agitation; he even would not have used as strong and violent expressions as those which he had quoted from Wesley, Asbury, Watson and the old Minutes, had used originally. What he had said was with the utmost kindness of feeling toward his brethren of the south, and he ardently desired that the whole discussion would be characterized by mildness and freedom from warmth or passion.

The speaker's manner throughout was dispassionate and conciliatory, and his whole address free from offensive or inflammatory epithets. He was heard with the greatest respect and attention by the body, and by a large audience, which had convened to listen to the debate on this theme. The gallery was filled with ladies.

The steamboat Great Western arrived at Buffalo a few days since from Chicago, with 3000 bushels of wheat and 500 barrels of flour—a part of the latter from Wisconsin.

We understand that Mr. Caldwell intends converting the Camp street Theatre into a magnificent Merchants' Exchange, to be ready and opened in the ensuing fall.—N. O. Bulletin.

The population of the United States in 1830 was 12,866,920. The population at the present time, 1840, is estimated at about seventeen millions and a quarter.

The amount of tolls received on all the New York State Canals in the 4th week in May, is $80,964 86, and in the whole month of May, $243,953 47.

COLLEGES.—The Christian Review states that there are ninety-five colleges in the United States, containing about 9,500 students, 27 medical schools, with about 2,650 students, and 8 law schools, with 350 students.

A person was arrested and held to bail in New York a day or two ago, for refusing to give the necessary information, to the officer engaged in taking the census.

There is every prospect of a very extensive emigration to the Canadas, in the course of the present season, from Great Britain and Ireland. Up to the 30th of last month, 7000 had arrived at Quebec.

The Charleston Patriot of the 3d instant, says, "A letter from St. Augustine, dated last Friday, states that great apprehensions were entertained that the Indians would attack that city."

The Cincinnati Gazette states that counterfeit twenty dollar notes on the Bank of Illinois, Shawneetown, letter D., date 24th of March, 1839, payable to W D. Bruce, engraving rough, and signatures badly imitated, are in circulation.

Mr. James B. Anderson, editor of the New Orleans Sun, expired suddenly on the 20th ult. He was formerly of the N. Y. Daily Advertiser His brother editors, in recording his demise, pay high tributes to his social worth, genius and abilities.

Mr. Rock, the proprietor of the St. Louis Museum, writes from the Osage country, whither he has gone on an exhuming expedition, that he has discovered an entire skeleton of a gigantic Mastodom, besides some other formations new to him.

It is now known that by the recent tornado at Natchez, 317 persons were killed and 109 wounded. The whole number killed has not probably been yet ascertained. We understand that workmen are already actively employed in rebuilding the city.

The ship Marchioness, from Londonderry, with passengers, has been libelled at Wilmington, Del., by the Collector of that District, for having on board 350 persons, the law allowing but two persons for every five tons, and the ship measures only 816 tons.

NEW COUNTERFEITS—Farmers' Bank Delaware, Wilmington.—20's altered from 5's. The genuine 5's have for a vignette a drove of cattle; the altered notes have the same. They can be easily detected by noticing this fact, as the genuine 20's have a different vignette—viz: two female figures.

SCARCELY CREDIBLE.—It is stated, that the storm in Natchez had scarcely subsided, when the land pirates, who infest the southern cities, were at work at their trade, robbing the ruins of the houses, and even stripping watches and jewelry from the dead and wounded.

Official notice is issued by the Mayor, that the price of fresh flour being $3 60 per barrel, the bakers must give, during the commencing season June the 1st, 40 ounces of bread for 10 cts. Of the second quality, or three loaves for ten cents, they must give 58 ounces.—N. O. Culletin.

The piracy off Cape Antonio is fully confirmed by Capt. Remington of the brig Elizabeth, arrived at Philadelphia on Saturday from Havana. The seven pirates had been brought to that city and would be tried forthwith. They would, no doubt, be executed immediately afterward.

Two hundred and fifty men are now employed upon the steam frigate now building at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. She is rated at two thousand tons, and will be the largest steam frigate afloat. Her engine, which is to be of 600 horse power, is now building by Messrs. Merrick and Towne.

Samuel D. McKay was shot in the Cherokee Nation, a short distance above Fort Smith, on the night of the 9th instant, by some person unknown. Several persons were together in a room, when the lights were extinguished, and one of them, stepping up to McKay, discharged a pistol in his breast.

By the packet Eugenia, from Vera Cruz, which port she left on the 14th May, we learn that there was no political news of importance. Campeachy continued blockaded on all sides, and there is every prospect it must soon surrender. In the north, Gen. Arista, commander of the government troops, has been completely successful against the Federal party in that quarter.

Capt. Ross, the arctic navigator, who is now engaged on an antarctic expedition, obtained soundings in the middle of the Atlantic with a line two thousand five hundred fathoms or about three miles in length. This is the greatest depth by far ever reached by a sounding line.

NEW COUNTERFEIT.—Well executed ten dollar bills on the bank of Hamilton, are in circulation at Cincinnati. The plate patterns after the genuine—vignette represents the bridge over the Miami at Hamilton—letter A., No. 1926, dated 17th Nov. 1835—dies very dim—paper rather flimsey, and the general appearance of the bill much paler than the genuine.

A gentleman who arrived in this city a few days ago from Charleston, S. C., kept a minute of the time taken up in performing the journey—that is, the actual travelling time, exclusive of the stoppages in the cities, and on footing up he found it amounted to sixty-three hours.—Think of that; going a journey of 800 miles in a little more than two days and a half! A century ago, the person who should have done such a deed, or claimed the power to do it, would have been hung for witchcraft.—N. Y. paper.

THE SILK TRADE IN FRANCE.—A London paper states that the number of silk looms in France is 86,640, producing annually goods to the value of 211,550,000 francs, of which 73,000f are consumed in France, and 138,500,000f are imported. They employ 169,280 weavers, and 139,623,330f worth of raw silk; and the labor amounts to 70,926,670f or about 300f each weaver. The interest and profit on the capital embarked is 21,000,000f. The manufactories of Lyons employ 40,800 looms, 80,000 workmen, and produce 100,000,000f worth of silk.

MORE COUNTERFEITERS ARRESTED.—On the 3d instant, 4 individuals, who gave their names as Solomon Rice, B. B. Leach, Daniel Clarke and R. S. Rader, were arrested at Cincinnati on suspicion of having counterfeit money in their possession. On search being made, something like seven or eight thousand dollars of spurious bills, on various banks, were found upon them. They had a hearing before the Mayor on the 4th, who required them to find bail in the sum of one thousand dollars each, in default of which they were committed to jail, to await their trial at the next term of the Court of Common Pleas. —Urbana Citizen.

ELDRIDGE—FINE ARTS AND IDIOCY.—Two or three days since, a letter addressed to William M. Eldridge, the forger, was taken from the post office, and found to contain a receipt for one box directed to him, for transportation from New York to this city. On application to the steamboat office, the box, a large flat one, was obtained, and on opening it before a magistrate, its contents proved to be a fine European copy of, we believe one of Ralph's paintings, in a splendid gilt frame. The Doctor appears to have been an admirer of the Fine Arts.

We learn that he conducts himself at the prison in rather a singular manner; from his entrance on Thursday up to Monday last, he spoke but little, and appeared continually dissolved in tears. On Monday last he left off the lachrymose style, and sent up for an idiot, in which line he is said to have been doing a pretty strong business up to the present writing.—Philadelphia North American.

A BROTHER'S STRUGGLE TO SAVE A BROTHER.—The Natchez Free Trader of the 25th ultimo has the following paragraph, descriptive of "a brother's struggle to save a brother," during the late fearful tornado at that place:

Mr. Wm. Hendry and his brother, owners of a flat boat at Natchez landing, from Park county, Indiana, were on board their boat at the time of the storm. William was struggling to save his brother, who was apparently dying from blows received by missiles sent by the wind, as both brothers were whirled from boat to boat. At length the boat on which they clung to each other, sunk beneath them, the wounded brother being engaged at the time in begging William to drop him and save himself. The latter, at this time several yards from the shore, was separated from one whom he shall never more see living, wafted down the stormy torrent, and, although not a swimmer, managed to get ashore far below Natchez, at the foot of the bluffs. He came back and found his friends on the levee lamenting over the supposed death of both. In his trunk on board his boat, Wm. Hendry had two thousand dollars in money, and about four thousand dollars more in value of pork and lard.

INDIAN DEPARTMENT.—After the developments as respects the Seneca Treaty, it is time the people had begun to investigate this department of the General Government, as the gross injustice practiced towards the Indians may be visited on the whole nation.

We could lay open some startling facts! Look at the following official document, by virtue of which the Cherokee people are at this time, and for an unlimited period, deprived of their annuities, although the faith of the nation is solemnly pledged that they be paid them at stated times! Mark the vagueness of the grounds on which they are withheld, and may be withheld forever:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
Office Indian Affairs, Nov'r. 9, 1839.

"Sir: I am instructed by the Secretary of War, to inform you that no farther payments will be made to the Cherokees, until the excitement existing in the nation is composed, and their difficulties settled; and this determination I have to request that you communicate to the Indians immediately on the receipt hereof.—Should any of the Agents have moneys in a course of disbursement, you will please to arrest it until otherwise directed.

"This instruction is not intended to interfere with the issuing of rations to them in completion of the year's subsistence.

"Very respectfully, your ob't. serv't.,
"T. HARTLEY CRAWFORD."

Is it not obvious that the very circumstance of withholding the annuities will effectually prevent the "excitement" in the nation from being "composed."—New World.

Business Department.

Geo. D. Wilson, of Elyria, Ohio, says: he has not received any papers since April 29th. We have sent them regularly to him from the 27th number.

Brother Hozey is informed that we understood the Post Master, he wanted his paper directed to Franklin Mills, Jefferson, Ohio, and have been sending his paper to that address since; we now send to Dupont, Jefferson, Indiana, as this is where we understood him to want it directed. We have not the numbers misdirected to forward, or we would be glad to do so.

NOTICE TO THE PRESIDENT.—There is a number of Methodist families settled in the state of Michigan, Eaton county, town of Oneida, who wish to unite with the Methodist Protestant Church. They have requested that a preacher and Disciplines be sent to them. They are good materials. Direct to Truman W. Nicholds.
GEO. REED.

Bucyrus, Ohio, May 30th, 1840.

Our subscribers, who are in arrears, will oblige us by IMMEDIATELY REMITTING the amount of their paper, as we much need money to "go ahead." Send to us any amount and we will pay the postage. No excuse.

As the Post Master General has decided that "a post master may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter, if written by himself," it is the same thing for a subscriber to address his letter, enclosing the pay for his paper to a Post Master who is publisher of a newspaper, in his official capacity by which it will come free.

We wish our subscribers to address their letters containing remittances for us, to "C. Springer, P. M. Meadow Farm, Muskingum O.;" also all letters on the official duties of our office as Post Master in the same way. All letters on other business, or business of a private nature should be addressed to us omitting the official signatures P. M. and we will pay for them.

Bro. Barns, of Cincinnati; we have information that a lady in Portsmouth, whose name we have not, expected you to order the Recorder to her. Who is it?

CORRECTION.

Mr. Editor: Several typographical errors which escaped the vigilence of the proof-reader, mar my printed communication. A few of these I will tax your types to correct. In the paragraph commencing, "What is the doctrine involved" &c., for "mingling various changes," read ringing various changes, &c.

In the fourth column, ninth line from the bottom, for "much vegetation" &c., read rich vegetation, &c.

In the fifth column of the paper, third line from the top, for "and throughout it" &c., read, and through it, &c.

In the same column, fourteen lines from the top, for "till I met the letter" &c., read, till I met the latter, &c.

The note at the bottom of my communication was intended for no eye but your own. It was probably printed through inadvertency.

Accept my thanks for your prompt compliance with my request, in publishing my thoughts in the Recorder. Be assured, if I could for a moment believe that the discussion, in a proper spirit, of the "exciting subject" or any other moral question connected with the present, future and complete happiness of our race, would in any way injure the church of Christ, or retard the universal spread of "scriptural holiness," I would not only consider it my duty, but a privilege, to remain as silent as the grave so long as I live. Such, however, can never be the effect of discussion, properly conducted, until the apostolic requisition, "prove all things, hold fast that which is good" shall have been expunged from the sacred record, and "prove nothing, hold fast the traditions of men," shall have been substituted in its stead. Let us agree to disagree, and never suffer a mere difference of opinion in the least degree to impair that confidence and harmony that should ever exist among christian brethren. Yours, respectfully,
THOMAS OLIVER.

AGRICULTURAL.

MELONS.

There is no one who cultivates a garden, farm, or "truck path," who could not, with little trouble or expense, raise abundant supplies of melons for himself, family and visitors; and where a market is convenient, nothing usually gives more profit for the labor bestowed. Nature has intended them to be the most refreshing and delicious fruit in a hot summer's day. At the same time, when fully ripe, they are not only grateful to the palate, but also as wholesome fruit as can be used.

The Muskmelon (Cucumis melo) is a very tender and delicate annual, which has been cultivated from time out of memory. It was taken from Jamaica to England in 1570, where it has been considered one of the richest delicacies ever since. It is probable it was known first along the coast of the Mediterranean; but this is not certain, as it has been cultivated in Egypt and in different parts of Asia a great while. The Jews said to Moses 1490 years before Christ, "We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely, the cucumbers and melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick." (Num. 11, 5.) It is evident that southern climates are best suited to their growth, as the fruit, to attain perfection, requires a minimum temperature of about 80 degrees. In England, and the Northern States, the plants are generally forwarded in a hot bed, before being placed in the open air; but in the south, they are much better and grow to great size in the open air.

The Watermelon (Cucuabita Citrulles) is pretty nearly the same in its habits as the Muskmelon, and perhaps both are indigenous in the same country. The varieties of each are numerous. Most of the Muskmelons, according to Loudon, cultivated in Britain, are termed Cantaloups, an appellation bestowed on them from a seat of the Pope near Rome, where this variety is supposed to have originally been produced. One of the best Cantaloup varieties is described by Lindley as being "round, something oval, about five inches in diameter;—skin greenish white, flesh 1½ inch thick, red, but not high colored, soft, juicy, sweet and delicate." A variety of the Cantaloups, is raised extensively in the western and southern States; but the melons are much larger than those described in northern countries. McMahon says, "the true Cantaloup, or Warted melon, is very scarce in the United States; its fruit is large, roundish and deeply ribbed, a little compressed at both ends, the surface full of warted protuberances, like some species of the squash; the flesh reddish, firm, and of a most delicious rich flavor." In Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi, so far as we have noticed, the best Muskmelon is a large kind, deeply ribbed, yellow skin when ripe, inclined to be rough, and not unfrequently have considerable protuberances; the flesh is red, sweet and very delicious. It is more than probable it is the true Cantaloup melon, greatly improved in our country. The variety of Watermelons are endless, as new ones are constantly produced, and those sorts at one time fashionable soon go out of use to give place to new kinds. These new varieties will constantly be formed so long as they are raised from seed, planted so near as to admit the pollen to be wafted from one bloom to another. The chief varieties enumerated by English writers, are the Early Sugar Watermelons; large, round; skin green when ripe; flesh yellow, flavor good. Sugar melon of Crimea, large and excellent. Persian and Casan melons, both large and sweet. In the United States, the long Carolina, Long Island and Apple-seeded Watermelons, are justly celebrated; but none of them, in our estimation, approach in size and flavor the mountain sprouts of the west and south. There are many other good kinds raised in this country, but none, perhaps, superior to the above named. They are mostly round, but sometimes inclined to oval shape; the rind is green when ripe, very thin and easily bruised; the flesh is mostly red, and the seeds generally white. They have often been raised to weigh from 20 to 50lbs. in this State; and what is best of all, they are always sweet and very good when taken from the vines and eaten at the right state.

The time of planting is from the beginning of April till June. Occasionally the seeds might be put in sooner: but then there is danger to be apprehended from frost.

Seeds, to bring the best melons, according to Abercrombie, should be at least two years old,* to prevent the vines from being two luxuriant of growth. To preserve any superior variety the vines should not grow close to other inferior kinds, cucumbers, squashes, and the like.

The soil most recommended is "any unexhausted loam, rich in vegetable rudiments, with a mixture of sand but not too light." A Mr. Fargo reported to Judge Buel that he raised them successfully upon the following plan: "I prepared a spot of about 40 feet square, by covering it with sand and a heavy coat of manure to the depth of six or eight inches. It was then spaded about 12 inches deep, and well mixed together. On this spot I made 8 hills, by digging 16 inches deep and 2½ feet in diameter; these I filled with stable manure (in which was considerable straw) even with the surface of the ground. I then brought from the woods a load of rich black mould, formed from decayed vegetable; with this was mixed an equal quantity of sand and the hills covered to the depth of six inches. The seeds were soaked between two wet sods of grass, laid near the fire about 12 hours and then planted. In about 36 hours they began to show themselves above the surface. The growth of the plants was rapid beyond any thing that I had ever witnessed, and the leaves looked like those of pumpkins or squashes. They continued to thrive, as the weather became warm, and I had (for the first time) as fine cucumbers and melons, as grow on Long Island or elsewhere." Mr. Poulton of Scull Shoals, Georgia, cultivates Watermelons to great perfection thus, "I have holes dug in the ground ten feet distant each way, eighteen inches wide at top and twelve inches deep. I then have the holes filled three inches above the surface, with rich, light earth, and plant and cover the seed about one and a half inches deep, leaving two stocks in a hill. The ground between the hills I keep well ploughed or harrowed till the vines begin to run. They must then be hoed often to keep the earth clean and light. A southern exposure on a hill side is best, and the poorer the ground the better, except where the hill is made."

As good Watermelons as we have ever seen, and as large as we have ever heard of, were grown in this State in fresh ground upon the following plan; let the land be sufficiently ploughed to destroy all the wild herbage, and to become completely pulverised. Lay off the rows with the plough so as to let the hills be fifteen feet apart in each direction, and cover the seed about an inch deep. The ground should be harrowed or ploughed every week till the vines begin to leave the hill, and afterwards the hoe will complete the cultivation. Where the land is much worn, holes should be dug twelve inches deep, and filled with a compost of stable dung, fresh mould from the woods, old ashes, or a small per cent of lime and sand. Let plenty of seed be put in and the vines well attended, and particularly watered when very dry, and the crop will be abundant and the fruit good.

Their uses might be various, but they are seldom used in any other way than as a grateful refreshment, and as a part of the dessert in the warm weather of summer.

"The Watermelon," says Loudon, "forms both the food and drink of the inhabitants of Egypt for several months in the year, and therefore it is generally considered as the melon of the Jews, mentioned in several places in the Bible."

One other use of the Watermelon we must mention before closing this article. In the first settling of this country, it was most difficult to obtain sugar or molasses only as made from the tree; but so many Watermelons were raised that they could not easily be consumed. They were so sweet and juicy, that in many instances the water was pressed from the pulp, and boiled down a short time, when an excellent quality of molasses, was the result. In this way large families were abundantly supplied with this superior article the most of the year; and we know not why molasses, and even sugar too, might not be manufactured from Watermelons, as well as from cains or beets. We do not recollect of having heard an attempt to make sugar from them; but perhaps it has been successfully done, and if so, we should be highly gratified to have a report from some of our old settlers on the subject. Or if the attempt has been made in other countries, we should be thankful to get the accounts.

*In this country seed should be procured from the east, say Philadelphia, and what is taken from the growth here should never be planted, as the article depreciates like the Weathersfield onion. Ed. Rec.

Connecticut Blue Laws.—We see stated in the Philadelphia North American, what we did not know before to be a fact, viz., that the famous blue law code of Connecticut is a fiction. In a historical discourse delivered by Professor Kingsley, of Yale College at the two hundred anniversary of New Haven, it is stated that this code was fabricated by Peters, author of the history of Connecticut, and that his object was to make the colonists appear odious abroad, he having taken the unpopular side in supporting the royal claims. He published his history, embracing this code, in England, but his design appears to have been understood, and to have failed entirely, though the people of that State have, in later days, suffered some reproaches on account of this fabulous code.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Morgantown, Ia., June 4, 1840.

Bro. Springer: The quarterly conference for White River circuit at its last session appointed Bro. Alexander and myself a committee to address a letter to the committee for arranging the time and place for holding the first session of the Indiana District Conference, and Bro. Alexander failing to attend according to appointment, I have determined to address them through the Recorder, being ignorant where to address a letter to them through the mail.

We confess we were not a little surprized to find that the committee, after so much delay necessarily required to obtain the legalizing of the Conference District, before they could perform the duties assigned them, that instead of the performance of that duty they called upon the brethren to go again through the tedious process of voting upon the question they had once legally disposed of, in conference, and which was now the law by which they were, as men of moral integrity, bound to be governed till it was repealed in due form.

The committee are men of intelligence, and as such they must be aware that such a vote was not legal or binding on the church, unless a provision of this kind was included in the resolution passed by the Ohio and Illinois Conferences, investing them with discretionary powers, which we presume was not the case.

The reasons assigned for this course, by the committee, are not such as we think satisfactory; if the brethren of the Indiana District could be convinced the measure an injudicious one, it was perfectly easy and the way clear, to arrange the matter in a legal way, without any embarrassment on the part of those by appointing the time for the Indiana Conference only a few weeks later than the Ohio Conference, and meeting and settling the matter in the Ohio Conference, and we are sure there was as much time to inquire into the matter, and it could be done more leisurely than by omitting so important a duty assigned them by a special act of the conference. We presume they had no instruction from conference to exercise this discretion. From these, and other facts, we fear that the committee is either opposed to the measure, or under the influence of those who are, and that the object is to defeat, at least for the present, the success of said conference, and thereby prevent its establishment.

We would not have ventured the above remark, if it were not for the fact, that, although the greater part by far of the votes thus take . (illegally) whether the Protestant Methodists of the State of Indiana will acquiesce in the consequences of being governed by her own disciplinary provision in this case or not, have responded with a hearty amen to the measure, not one word concerning the appointment of either time or place, has as yet made its appearance in the Recorder.

The law of our church with regard to creating new Conference Districts, may, or may not be a good one, let us not condemn it without a fair trial at least.—Here is a fair specimen of its operation before us. But if we are afraid to let its operation proceed any further, we say to the denominations around us, our system of government, in this respect, is defective. We need the controlling influence of some master spirit to check its rashness and keep us in due bounds.

We think the doctrine contained in a letter, officially addressed us by the same brethren that compose this committee, if we are not mistaken, to be the true doctrine, viz: that it is our duty to be governed by the church to which we have plighted our faith, although it may bear hard on peculiar individual cases. With this view of the subject we submitted without a murmur, most cheerfully, in view of the fact that a conference was expected in our own circuit, where we could personally attend and matters be set right. Let these brethren personally yield to the same doctrine they taught, and give us our conference appointment and all will be right.

Brother Burton's or Liberty Meeting House, being in nomination as the place, we respectfully solicit the committee to appoint the time and give us a conference session at that place. We think as late as October will be better than earlier.—Say early in October. We sincerely pray for the success and prosperity of the Indiana Conference of the Protestant Methodist Church, and for one, if the measure is defeated, I shall feel myself agrieved, and my confidence in the operation of our system seriously impaired.

Yours, in the bonds of a peaceful gospel, John Williams.

Morgantown, Ia., May 20, 1840.

Bro. Springer: The following sketch is taken, in substance, from notes which I took in a public debate, between the Rev. Mr. Mullis and myself, on the 4th Saturday of last month, in this place.—Rev. M. Huffakee, Rev. H. Craigg and Mr. Wm. Craigg being moderators; Rev. T. Matthews and Rev. J. L. Jones being present. I feel gratified in announcing that no unkind feelings were produced, that I know of, and in the opinion of the moderators, and I think the audience in general, the following scriptural proof in favor of pouring or sprinkling, as a mode of christian baptism, were left entirely unanswered by Mr. Mullis. I therefore, will, with your consent, submit them to the consideration of others, who are so reckless as to suspend all the blessings of the new and ever living covenant on the mere form of a ceremony, and to the utmost of their power, pronounce sentence on all the christian world who cannot conscientiously bow down with implicit reverence to their stupid dogma; even forbidding them to approach the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper on any other condition, but obeying this commandment of men.

Proposition. That pouring or sprinkling is scriptural baptism, so far as water is concerned:

1. Baptism is either religion in its essence or likeness, one or both, being a positive institution, established by the Author of our faith.

2. We admit only one essence, one living vital principle of action in the christian church, to the influence of whose power every other practice and principle must be subordinate.

3. Is water baptism this essence? We admit no such material essence to produce spiritual life. Such an idea contradicts both natural and moral philosophy. The Holy Spirit being the active agent, and its divine efficacy or influence, which, in the language of inspiration is baptism, constitutes the essence of true scriptural religion. For without this, religion would either cease to exist or loose all its power to save the immortal soul of man from death and hell.

4. In the days of the Apostle Paul, the infant church was built up of members baptised by this one spirit, under the exercise of one faith, which worked by love and purified the heart; there being in those days, only one Lord, one faith and one baptism embraced in the vital essence of their religion, and the Apostle solemnly pronounced it impossible to be a christian without this essence. See 1 Cor. 12, 3.

5. On this principle we proceed to inquire what is water baptism? and find it is only a figure of spiritual baptism, and ought, therefore, in the mode as well as the design, to represent the thing signified. See 1 Pet. 3, 21.

6. The baptism of the Holy Ghost is uniformly administered by pouring, (this my opponent admitted.) Therefore, water baptism is rightly administered by pouring out water on the subject, inasmuch as this is the pattern we have received from heaven, it is right to follow it in our practice until we get a better one.

7. The only baptism that Jesus Christ ever claimed as his own personal baptism, was by pouring out, beyond all doubt. He says, I have a baptism to be baptised with; and how am I straitened (or pained) till it be accomplished. See Luke, 12th chapter and 50th verse. .

8. This is the only baptism mentioned in the word of God, that unites together the two consecrated elements of purification,—water and blood.

9. It is the link that joins together the Old and the New Testament dispensations, by the blood of the Old and the water of the New.

10. It took place precisely at the point where the one ended and the other commenced; viz: between the death and the resurrection of Christ, in the blood and water that followed the point of the soldier's spear on the Cross, and literally baptised the body of Jesus.

11. In this case, immersion is both naturally and morally impossible, because the blood, the water, or if you please His sufferings, all were the constituents of His body, and it is impossible to immerse a thing in its own contents; the idea is absurd and ridiculous in the extreme.

12. Here is a clear case of water baptism by pouring out. Jesus Christ Himself, being judge.

13. This is the true pattern for christian baptism, instead of the Jewish ceremonial and legal washing He received in or at Jordan, at the hand of John, the Jewish priest, in order to His entering His priestly office.

I would here remark, that these reformers are so fearful that their system of religion should exhibit some signs of life, that nothing with them is represented by baptism, but the dead body of Christ laying in the grave. The moment He becomes a living Saviour, they will escape from Him, declaring solemnly there is no likeness in a living Redeemer and their watery regeneration; and here they speak the truth.

The Apostle Paul, in the 10th chapter and 2d verse of 1 Cor., says, the Israelites were all baptised in the cloud and in the sea; and Moses in the 14th chapter of Ex., in giving the history of this baptism, says, four times, that they passed over the sea and dry land. And in the 15th chapter, he celebrates the glorious deliverance of the Israelites from immersion in this baptism, in a song of religious triumph. It was for this alone, he gave God the glory, and published to ages yet unborn, and to the heathen world, the fact, that in their baptism they were not immersed. David, in the 77th psalm, tells us, "the clouds poured out water," in his celebration of this baptism. Here are 600,000 men with their families, who were all made partakers of Christ by faith, (see 1 Cor. 10th ch.) and were baptised by pouring water from the clouds on them, God, Himself, being the administrator.

In the very beginning of the debate Mr. Mullis began to quote Mr. Wesley, to prove immersion. I produced his treatise on baptism in the old discipline, where he observes "in all the translations I have ever seen, I have never seen the word (here he gives the original Greek for baptism) translated by a word signifying or implying immersion."

In answer to my argument, that water baptism was an outward sign of inward and spiritual baptism, he undertook to prove, that in all cases, a sign should be removed, or cease, when the thing signified was forthcoming to show instead of a mere sign. To this I applied for answer, the case of a sign at the door of an inn, which a hungry traveller seeing, alights, and the landlord politely tells him if he had any thing to eat, he would take down his sign immediately; but so long as he had no refreshments, any traveller was welcome to call. Water baptism without inward and spiritual baptism is no better. Yours, respectfully,

John Williams.

Resolutions of the Quarterly Conference for Bucyrus Circuit, held at Carson's School-house, May 16, 1840.

Whereas, by a decision of the last General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, the subject of slavery was left with the people, with a wish, on the part of said conference, that the people would express their views thereon, for the purpose of free and full inquiry preparatory to action at the next General Conference for said church. Therefore Resolved, 1st. That the great safeguard to truth and justice in the prosecution and firm maintenance of christian purity and holiness, and an unceasing opposition, resistance and warfare to and against all moral evil and sin; believing and well knowing as we do, that that religion which admits of any known and wilful evil, cannot be of God, but must be of the wicked one, who is himself unjust, a deceiver, and a liar from the beginning.

2d. Resolved, That in the opinion of this conference the practice of having and holding the image of God in bondage, buying and selling the same, as is done in many sections of this country, under the eye of the civil authority, and admitted by the laws of this land of boasting civil and religious liberty, is we think, a disregard to all concerned and to the nation at large.

3d. Resolved, That in the opinion of this conference, the North American slavery is altogether contrary to the morality of the blessed volume of Divine truth, and a moral evil and sin against God, and ought therefore to be repented of and abandoned immediately.

4th. Resolved, That in the opinion of this qr. conference that no living church should have or hold any christian fellowship with any person or persons, who may thus trafic in, or have, or hold his or her fellow-creature as property or slave, when emancipation is practicable.

5th. Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forwarded to the Western Recorder for publication, with a request that other papers friendly to our views would copy the same. George Reid, Chair'n.

Robert Coulter, Sec'y

Jamestown, April 20, 1840.

Whereas, The subject of Slavery or abolition of Slavery has become a very exciting question and seems about to rend asunder the bonds of our government, both religious and political; and has brought about a fearful state of things, both in Church and State, and this conference do believe, and conceive it to be their solemn duty, as professors of religion, to bear their testimony in a conference capacity, against the crying, and heinous sin of American slavery as practiced in these United States. Therefore

Resolved, That it is time and high time that all the different branches of the christian church should take a firm and decided stand against the heinous sin of slavery, but more especially our own.—The Methodist Protestant Church, as we feel assuredly convinced, that did the different churches take that bold and uncompromising stand which we believe it to be their duty to do, or to have done, it would long since have been banished the christian world and now shortly could be.

2dly. Resolved, That we deem it the indispensable duty of all our members, both preachers and people, to bear an unflinching testimony against the sin of slavery both in their private and public capacities, on all suitable occasions.

3dly. Resolved, That we think it would be beneficial, and we recommend that all future quarterly as well as Annual Conferences that may intervene previous to the next General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church should take the subject into serious consideration, and pass some action thereon, in order that the minds of all our people may be fully made up and settled by the time our General Conference meet, that thereby the General Conference may know the minds of the people and be prepared to banish at once and forever from our beloved church, this heinous, this soul destroying sin, that we may no longer hold communion with or fellowship those who refuse to loose the bonds of wickedness, to let the oppressed go free and break every yoke.

The foregoing preamble and resolutions were, after some discussion, read and adopted unanimously.

4th. Resolved, That the Secretary of this conference sign the foregoing proceedings and send a copy to the editor of the Western Recorder, with a request that they be published therein.

THE CONSOLATION.

ges who shed the fr endly tear,
y, is there not a kindlier sphere,
realm unknown to death and pain,
Where youth and hope are never vain?
Ve have read in the laws of the sky, here's a place that's prepar'd upon high,
Where men never sicken or die,
or languish or envy nor sigh;
Where the souls of the just shall be blest, nd forever and ever at rest.
e prophets who pierced through all time, ay, is there a happier clime repar'd for the soul of the just,
When the body shall crumble to dust, here the soul of the righteous shall live
n enjoyments that innocence give?
ye, yes, there's a city prepar'd or all of those sons who have dar'd o trample on honor and fame, or sake of procuring a name hat will live when time's honors shall die, nd earth shall blaze up to the sky;
Tis then that the righteous shall live,
n enjoyments that innocence give;
hen the soul re-united to dust hall ascend to the land of the just, nd dwell in perpetual youth,
With the endless enjoyment of truth,
o sorrow, no sickness is there,
o heart-rending scenes of despair;
There God is ineffably bright,
Deep veil'd in invisible light,
Preserving the righteous from strife,
nfusing existence and life,
Upholding the work of His hands,
With wisdom which darkness withstands,
Retaining the base of His throne,
Forever and ever His own;
Yet the manner in which it is done,
Can only be known by the One
n whom all things living have life,
And are but a part of His life;
There angels surround the bright throne,
And cast down bright honors to none,
But him that hath conquered alone,
And made sin's dread empire his own.
So mortal rejoice while on earth,
The dark sinful land of your birth,
That your body was formed for to die,
That the soul might ascend to the sky;
Regard not the toys of your youth,
But treasure up virtue and truth,
Nor doat upon honors or gold,
False treasure when life has grown old,
For to purchase a heavenly prize,
The main thing in view by the wise.

OBITUARY.

For the Western Recorder.

HN MADAN, the subject of the following obituary notice, was born in Drum Ban, Belfast, Ireland, July, 1767. Emigrated to country in the spring of 1799. Lived in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, six years. In he removed to Poland, Trumbull county, . On the 18th of May, 1812, he was be- ed of his companion in life. And in 1816 moved to Youngstown, where he spent the inder of his days in the loneliness of widow- . His dutiful daughters, however, prompt- y filial affection, strove not in vain to ren- is dwelling a home of domestic delight.— many years he was a member of the Presby- an People; but after his last remove, it ars that he did not unite again with the ch of his earliest choice. And it was not the protracted meeting held in Youngstown 834, under the superintendence of Bro. R. hardson, that Bro. Madan was deeply convin- of the necessity of a spiritual change of t, which he earnestly sought, but found not the camp-meeting held the following fall on farm of Bro. P. Kimmil, Crab creek. There btained the long sought blessing, an evidence sins forgiven and acceptance with God, ugh the Beloved, and joined the Methodist testant Church, and continued an esteemed mber till the day of his death.

he constitutional temperament of Bro. M. not so ardent as most people from the "Emer- Isle," nor indeed as many who boast of their ivity here. And this natural peculiarity, be- in accordance with his early religious educa- n, furnishes the principal reason why his reli- us experience and exercises were less lively energetic than many of our Methodist breth- . Still his profession was consistent, and his innocent and exemplary. And, as was rea- able to expect, his end was tranquil and se- e.

About 3 years since, Bro. M. received a stroke apoplexy, and on the 1st of May, 1840, he re- ved another stroke from the same insidious ; he lingered on to the 13th, when he quiet- fell asleep in the arms of the Saviour. The t day, by request, I labored to improve the emnities of the scene. A large concourse of ple were present, and the occasion was affect- .

n the death of Bro. Madan was exemplified importance of being prepared for the solemn ir. For not longer than one day after he was itten could he converse at all. I visited him eral times, but the disease, like an opiate, med to have benumbed both the organical ctions and mental energies, that an inter- nge of thought was impracticable, save at es an half intelligent yes or no. The few rs allotted to him to communicate his wishes man below, he diligently improved,—while he hibited an entire resignation to the will of heaven, he satisfactorily conversed with some christian friends, upon the probability of a speedy change of worlds, and for the better. He called his children toward him, and instructed them as one shortly to be separated from them, by the di tance of earth from heaven—admonished them to avoid whatever wrong they might have observed in his l fe, and exhorted them to follow him wherein he had followed the meek and lowly Lamb of God. The Lord grant that they may improve those paternal advices, and heed the voice of Providence, (which deserves double attention, seeing about six weeks previously, death,—the destroyer, took from them an afflicted sister, and now a kind father) and prepare to meet him among the saints of the first born in the kingdom of our Father, to go out no more forever.

SELECTIONS.

THE DESERTERS.

Found among the letters of Mr. Mason, Secretary to the Duke of Cumberland.

There were in the regiment——two young soldiers above the common level, both from the same place, a small town in Lancastershire, and each had made friendship for the other. They had enlisted together through different motives—they marched together, and were inhabitants of the same tent. One, whom I shall call the lover, had enrolled his name through an uneasiness from his being disappointed in what he thought all his happiness was centred, the marrying of a sweet girl of his own town, by whom he was much beloved. Her relations were inexhorable, and his hopes in vain. The other, a lad of spirit, believing the soldier's life as fine as the recruiting officer had described it, willing to see wars, accompany his friend and serve his country, likewise accepted the King's picture; and was called the volunteer. He was the only son of his mother, and she a widow—she was much grieved at this step, which he had taken without her privity or consent—but being in an easy situation and not wanting his assistance for her support, she lamented only through her affection for him. The widow sent forth her son with tears and blessings, the maid eyed her lover from a distant window (a nearer approach not being permitted) and beat time to his steps with her heart, till he was out of sight, and then sent her soul after him in a deep fetched sigh. They had not been long in camp, before the volunteer had woful proof of the wide difference between the ideal gentleman and soldier, which he had dressed up in his imagination, and the miserable half starved food for powder. As for the lover, he was insensible to the hardship of the body—the agitation of his mind absorbed his whole attention—in vain he had endeavored to fly from the object of his love: he had brought away his person only, leaving his thoughts and his heart behind him; and was as absent from himself in the noise and bustle of the day, as in a silent midnight watch, or when stretched upon his bed at night. They communicated their situation to each other, and took the fatal resolution to desert. Thus winged by love, and urged by fear, the hills of Scotland flew from their heels, and they had arrived at a village within a mile of their own town, when they were overtaken by a horse pursuit, and reconducted to their camp. A court martial was held and they condemned to die; but the general ordered, as is usual in such cases, that they should cast lots, and only one of them should suffer. At the appointed time the ring was formed, the drum placed in the centre, with box and dice upon its head, and the delinquents made to enter. The horrors which sat brooding on their souls the preceding night, and were now overwhelming them at the awful crisis, were strongly painted in their wan and pallid countenances. Their friendship was real and sincere, but not of that fabulous and heroic kind as to wish to die for each other; each wished to live, and each was disquieted at the thought that his own safety must be built on the destruction of his friend. They alternately requested each other to begin. The lover looked attentively at the little instruments of life or death, took them in his trembling hand, and quickly laid them down. The officer was obliged to interpose, and commanded the volunteer to throw; he lifted his box in his right hand, then shifted into the left; and gave it to his right again, and as if ashamed of weakness or superstition cast his eye upwards for a moment, and was in the act to throw, when the shrieks of female sorrow struck his ear, and in burst, from an opposite part of the circle, the widow and the maid; their hair dishevelled, and their garments by travelling soiled and torn.

What a sight was this! The mother and the son on one side of the drum, and the maid and the lover on the other. The first transports of their frantic joy at finding them alive were soon abated by the dreadful uncertainty of what must follow. The officer was a man who did not hurry the volunteer to throw. He put his hand to the box of his own accord. His mother fell prostrate upon the earth, as did also the maid, and both with equal constancy and fervor poured forth their different prayers. He drew—nine! A gleam of imperfect joy lighted upon the shore, she had seen her son shipwrecked, buffeting the waves, when presently he gains a raft, and is paddling to shore; and already she thinks to feel his fond embrace, but still anxious, lest even yet some envious billow should snatch him for ever from her eyes. Mean while the lovers, giving up all for lost, were locked in each other's arms, and entreated to be killed thus together on the spot. She was held from her lover by force. He advanced towards the drum with much the same air as he would have ascended the ladder for his execution. He threw—ten! The maid sprang from the ground as if she would leap to heaven; he caught her in his arms; they fainted on each other's neck, and recovered only to faint again. The volunteer was the least affected of the four, and all his attention was employed about his mother, whose head was on his lap, but she was insensible to his care. Soon after the women had rushed into the ring, an officer had ran to the Duke's tent to inform him of the uncommon tenderness of the scene. He accompanied the officer to the spot, and standing behind the first rank, had been an unobserved spectator of the whole transaction. He could hold no longer, he came into the circle, and raised the widow, echoing in her ear—"He is pardoned!" restored her to life and happiness together—then turning to the lovers, he commanded them to go immediately to the chaplain to be united by that tie which death only could dissolve. He often declared he felt more pleasure from this action than from the battle of Culloden. He shed tears: but they were not those of Alexander when he wept for more worlds to conquer.

TOMB OF WASHINGTON.

Fame spread her wings and with trumpet blow,
"Great Washington has come! what praise is due?
What title shall he have?" She paused and said,
"Not one! his name alone, strikes every title dead."

Aroused by the coachman's trump, we rushed from our lodgings amidst the gloom of night, an in an instant were dashing away through the miry roads that wind along the intervening hills on our way to Alexandria. We had started for Mount Vernon, the once beautiful seat, but now quiet resting place of the immortal WASHINGTON. From this place, the distance was fifteen miles we had to travel on foot, there being no stage on our route, and at a season when the roads were most intolerable; yet, so great was our anxiety to view the spot renowned in the annals of history and of fame, that our walk was rendered apparently short, and the fatigue trifling. We reached the Potomac near the close of the day, when the last mellow rays of the setting sun had crested the forest's top and its fading beams were receding from her sleeping waters: a time we thought very well adapted to the occasion of our visit.—Slowly and silently we measured our steps along the extended wall that encloses the pleasure grounds, musing on the resplendent blandishments of worldly greatness, the eventful changes of earthly scenes, and the oblivion into which they had successively passed, when we came in front of the mansion. The visible traces of the changing hand of time which were apparent throughout the whole establishment, and the frequent autumnal wail of the short lived insects from the walls, imperceptibly threw us into an unwonted state of sober reflection. We stood on consecrated grounds.

Here the quenchless fires of American freedom were fanned in the bosom of her defender. Here the sighs of his oppressed countrymen fell upon his ear!—here, in might he arose, and while yet the dews of the morning glistened upon the vale, buckled on the sword, mounted his charger and flew to the battle field of unequal strife. There, he proudly waved the star spangled banner where "war's thunders rattled," achieved our liberties and robed his country in a mantle of glory that shines over the whole world, and shall diffuse the splendor of its beams down to the latest generations of time. Then, in the majesty of conscious rectitude and manly pride, with not a parallel in the world's wide history, he humbly lays at her ransomed shrine the bright laurels which his valor had won, and in the possession of a brighter boon than earth could give, retires

"From the world, from its cares and its strifes,
And reposes entranced on the pillows of peace."

We had, as is natural, associated in our minds with the greatness of the man when living, all that was grand or magnificent in his death or about his tomb; we had expected to gaze with fond and pleasing admiration on the polished marble bearing high and in bold relief the immortal name, and a record of the chivalrous deeds of him who lay entombed beneath it; but in this our expectations were disappointed. The tomb of Washington has no decorations of wordly art or human vanity attached to it; it is a plain unadorned receptacle, situated at the margin of the hill on which the mansion stands, and is enclosed by a common brick wall about six or seven feet high with an iron gate, which is secured by a strong lock that admonishes the curious visitor to keep himself at a respectful distance. There is in fact nothing that marks this silent shade to attract the gaze of travellers any more than the grave of the humblest individuals that ever died. No drooping willow bends its weeping branches over the hallowed mound, or mantles with its dingy shade his slumbering dust; no, the green waving grass that in wild luxuriance covers it, is the only living thing that in pleasing contrast we could contemplate with the mournful decay around us. In front of the tomb stands a solitary tree, aged and scathed, that once sent out from its shadowy green the cheerful notes of the feathered choir, but now is heard only the sighing of the breeze and the dismal roar of autumnal winds moaning through its withered branches. A small portion of the rude forest that yet remains, intervenes between the grave and the Potomac, which hides the prospect of the tomb from the river; yet the traveller in passing has his attention directed to the place, by a vacancy beyond the low pines and shrubbery that extends a short distance from the shore.

NAPOLEON'S PRISON.—The Island of St. Helena lies in the Atlantic ocean detached from any group, 600 miles from Ascension island, the nearest land, and situated in longitude 5 degrees 49 m. west from Greenwich, and lat. 15 deg. 5 min. south. The island is 10½ miles long by 6½ broad. It presents to the sea throughout its whole circuit, nothing but an immense wall of perpendicular rock from 600 to 1200 feet high, like a castle in the midst of the ocean. Its aspect is still more bleak and dreary than that of Ascension; the whole exterior being forbidding, and were it not so well known, nobody would suppose it contained inhabitants; for rough and barren rocks, perpendicular precipices, shores literally iron bound, added to rocky and grassless hills, seem to indicate, as if, by its formation, man had been intentionally excluded.

St. Helena was discovered by Don Juan de Caleca, or de Nova, a Portuguese navigator, on St. Helen's day, 1502. The English first took possession in 1600; and it has ever since remained under their authority. James' Town, the only one in the Island, and called after James II., does not become visible till you arrive near the anchorage which lies directly opposite. It is situated in a valley, a deep narrow ravine, planked by steep stony ridges, towering above it to a considerable height. That to the left when viewed from the sea, is termed Rupert's hill; so called from the famous prince of that name, having a carriage road cut along its brow. The first view of the town is not unpleasing, it is formed by one principal street of some length extending directly up the valley. The houses are small and white-washed, they consist principally of shops and lodging houses; it also contains a church, a residence for the governor, a theatre built in 1807, a tavern, barracks, and (what would be better in any other situation) a burying ground. Several batteries and posts surround it on all sides. St. Helena attracts attention as having been the prison of Napoleon Bonaparte, from the year 1815, till his death, May 5th, 1821.

On that lone, barren isle, where the wide roaring billows
Assail the stern rocks, and the loud tempests rave,
The hero lies still, while the dew-drooping willows
Like fond weeping mourners bend over his grave.

The lightnings may flash, and the loud thunders
rattle,
He heeds not, he hears not, he's free from all pain,
He sleeps his last sleep—he has fought his last battle,
No sound can awake him to glory again.

Oh! shade of the mighty, where now are the legions
That rushed but to conquer when thou led'st them on?
Alas, they have perished, in far chilly regions,
And all, save the fame of their triumphs is gone.

The trumpet may sound, and the loud cannon rattle,
They heed not—they hear not—they're free from all pain;
They sleep their last sleep, they have fought their last battle,
No sound can awake them to glory again.

Yet spirit immortal! the tomb cannot bind thee!
For like thine own eagles that soared to the sun,
Thou springest from bondage and leavest behind thee
A name which before thee no mortal had won!

Tho' nations may combat when War's thunders
rattle,
No more on thy steed wilt thou sweep o'er the plain,
Thou sleep'st thy last sleep—thou hast fought thy last battle,
No sound can awake thee to glory again!

A GOOD ONE.—In the present day, when old bachelors have become so serious an evil as to need legislative interference, we think that the following expedient, adopted by a lady in Connecticut, of rather a desperate age, will afford an excellent hint to some of our statesmen, towards an effectual remedy. The circumstances are these:—A young lady became extravagantly fond of a young lawyer in the neighborhood, who treated her partiality with great levity. Finding her suit rather hopeless, and being fully determined to enter the state of matrimony at some rate or other, she adopted the following plan: All at once she was taken ill, and her malady seemed to threaten death;—at this crisis she sent for the young lawyer to draw her will, and to his utter astonishment she disposed of an enormous estate in legacies and endowing public institutions. She shortly after, however, recovered to enjoy her own health, and the young lawyer began to feel something like love for her; his addresses became constant, and his attentions marked; in fact, in a short time they were married—but, alas! he had to take the will for the deed.

SWIMMING.—The following has been placed on the walls on the west end of the capital: "For the want of knowledge of this noble art thousands are annually sacrificed, and every fresh victim calls more strongly upon the best feelings of those who have the power to draw the attention of such persons as may be likely to require this art, to the simple fact, that there is no difficulty in floating or swimming, provided persons keep their bodies in a horizontal position, which is done with the greatest ease, by endeavoring to force the chin down upon the surface of the water, instead of making the effort of forcing the head as high out of the water as possible, which brings the body perpendicular instead of horizontal, as required. Let every body, particularly editors, annually, if possible, help to diffuse this most useful and important knowledge."

SECRETS.—A secret is like silence, you cannot talk about it and keep it. It is like money; when once you know there is any concealed, it is half discovered.—"My dear Murphy," said an Irishman to his friend, "why did you betray the secret I told you?" "Is it betraying you call it? Sure, when I found I wasn't able to keep it myself, didn't I do well to tell it to somebody who could?"

HOW A RICH MAN MAY DRESS.—Nobody blames a rich man for going with his elbows out, because every one knows that he has got money enough to get him a new coat; but it is unpardonable in a poor man to go ragged, because every one knows that it is out of his power to do otherwise.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT

THE QUARRELSOME BROTHERS.

John and Frederick were brothers.—They lived in the same house, they ate at the same table, they slept in the same bed, and were almost constantly together. If they had been kind and affectionate brothers, they would have been very pleasant companions for each other.

But instead of this, they were always quarrelling. There was scarcely a half hour in the day when there was not some trouble between them. Their father and mother took a great deal of pains to make them both happy. But it did no good, for the boys could always find something to quarrel about, even when their kind parents had taken the greatest pains to please them both. If John had a plaything, Frederick would be sure to want the very same one, and if Frederick had any thing John wanted, John would insist upon taking it out of his hands.

There was very often scratching, and pulling, and struggling, and I am sorry to add, there was sometimes kicking and blows.

The other day when their father came home he took out of his pocket a humming-top, which he had bought for the boys.—He said the boys might have the top between them.—John, he said, could play with it part of the time, and Frederick a part. John stood all ready to snatch the top out of his father's hand; and, without so much as saying, 'thank you, father,' he started to run off with it before his father had quite done speaking, and Frederick ran after him. John had seen the boys play with tops, but he had never had one in his own hands before, and he did not know how to make it spin. He tried two or three times, but the top would only tumble over, instead of whirling round and round as he wished to have it.

While John was trying to spin the top, Frederick stood teasing his brother to let him have it. "There, I say, you have tried long enough," said he, "and now you might let me try."

"No, I won't," said John, as he wound up the top, "I mean to try myself until I make it spin."

Frederick looked on while his brother tried once more, and then he began to tease again. "There, now, you shall let me have it," as he sprang to snatch the top from the floor.

"Be still—let go!" cried John. "I tell you Fred, to give me the top," he said, as he struggled to get it out of his hands.

Frederick set out to run off with the top, but his brother ran after him, and they struggled together until Frederick received a scratch upon his hand that made him willing to drop the plaything, and he ran crying into the parlor.

"See, father," said he, "what John has done. He made that great scratch, just because I took the top in my hands."

"No, father, I didn't," said John, who came running in after his brother. "He snatched away the top while I was playing with it, and I only tried to get it away from him."

"Why did you say you did not scratch him?" asked his father. "It seems from your own account that you did scratch him. You have done wrong, John, and you ought not to try to excuse yourself. Frederick has done wong too. You ought to have taken turns playing with the top, and had no quarrelling about it. If John refused to let you have it when it was your turn, Frederick, you ought to have come away quietly, instead of snatching it up. You have both behaved very improperly, and I hardly know what I ought to do with two boys who cannot play together without quarreling or hurting each other. I will take the top, and keep it myself, for the present."

Their father put the top in his pocket, and directed the boys to sit down quietly, and remain in the room where they were.

They kept their seats until dinner time. Very soon after dinner it was time to go to school; and their father saw no more of them until he came home to tea in the evening. After tea he called the boys to come and sit beside him on the sofa, "I want to tell you a story," said he "that I read in the newspapers to-day. It is about two brothers, who, I should think, were something like my two sons. It is a true account, and the boys names are given in the paper. These two boys were playing in the snow. One threatened the other, that if he snow-balled him again he would stab him with a knife he had in his pocket. This he directly did, and killed him instantly. How do you think he felt when he had actually killed his brother? And how do you tkink his father and mother felt?

Frederick and John sat looking in their father's face, while he was speaking, but they did not say anything. They were thinking what a sad thing it was for a boy to kill his own brother.

"I was thinking when I read this account," said their father, "what if my boys should quarrel some day, and one of them should strike the other so as to cause his death! Sometimes a very slight blow will kill a person. A person who kills another is a murderer.—Do either of you know how a murderer is punished?"

"Yes, sir," answered John, very seriously, "murderers are hung."

"How do you think I should feel," continued their father, "if one of you should some day get into a passion with his brother, and strike, or push him down, so as to kill him, and then he should be hung as a murderer?"

"I don't think we should ever do so," said John.

"Nor I," said Frederick.

"But," said their father, "you cannot tell what you may do if you allow yourselves to indulge in unkind and angry feelings towards each other. Persons very often do things in a passion, which they would not for the world have done when they were calm. I have been thinking," continued their father, "that it has become necessary for me to take some very decided measures to put a stop to so much quarrelling and dispute; and I have concluded to forbid your playing together for a week to come. For a week, then, you must amuse yourselves, without any communication whatever with each other."

The boys owned their punishment deserved, but they felt, after listening to their father, that they should not be under temptation to quarrel with each other in future.

"I do not think I ever shall quarrel any more," said John.

"Nor I," said Frederick.

"I should need to be convinced that my boys were much changed at heart," said their father, "before I could feel any confidence that they would never again indulge in angry feelings towards each other. You do not feel any temptation to quarrel this evening, while we are sitting here, talking quietly and calmly, and perhaps you may not be tempted for many days to come. I hope you will not. But while you retain within that same disposition that led you to behave as you did about the top, you will be likely to quarrel again whenever the temptation comes up. Pray to God, sincerely, to give you new hearts, and right spirits, and power will be given you to resist temptation."

Before family prayer that evening their father read the fourth chapter of Ephesians. It was the custom of the family at their morning devotions to recite each a verse of Scripture of their own selection before reading. It happened the next morning that Frederick and John, without consulting each other, had both selected the same verse from this chapter. It was, "BE YE KIND ONE TO ANOTHER."

LATEST MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE FROM LIBERIA.

The "Colonization ship Saluda" arrived at New York on the 3d ult., in 38 days from Liberia. Among other "interesting news," she brings intelligence that on the 15th of March, (from what cause does not appear,) the Methodist missionary station at Heddington, (King Tom's town) was attacked by about 300 natives, under a chief named Goterah. The following account of the attack and defence, is from the pen of the Rev. Geo. S. Brown, one of the missionaries (!) at the station. The italics, &c. are our own.

"Last Saturday morning, about 4 o'clock, we were awakened in our town by the firing of a gun, about two miles from us. And while we were musing upon what it could mean, we were again alarmed by the voice of several of our people exclaiming—"War is come! war is come!" Brother Sion Harris got out of bed immediately, and went out in town. But he returned in about one minute, and told me to be out of bed and load the guns, for war was at hand. I immediately arose, and slipped on my clothes, and was on my knees to ask God to help us.

"By that time the enemy were within musket shot of the mission house. Brother Harris went down and gave them the first shot, and was answered by 10 or 12 muskets from the enemy, while I was loading muskets in the chamber. The natives came on the path leading from Millsburgh, crossing the creek near the house, and struck into my casava patch, at the corner of the woods. and in a straght direction towards the house.—They completely covered the casava patch. It now begun to be a little light. Tom's people sallied down toward the lower gate, and gave them a few shots, at which time one of his men received a slug through his bowels, and immediately came into my chamber with his intestines in his hand.

"And notwithstanding Tom and his men retreated under the lee of the mission house, yet they turned as it were, the left wing of the enemy, who soon fell into the main body, directly back of the mission house. And in less than one minute, they were running up and down the picket fence, about three rods from the house, as thick as bees around a hive.

"Brother Bennet Demory and Brother Harris were the only two stood in front, between the enemy and the house. They both stood their ground and cut them down like mowers cutting the grass.—Meanwhile brother Jarvis Z. Nicols came into the chamber where I was loading muskets, (for we had 18 muskets in the chamber, which we knew would go at every snap, and 100 ready made cartridges, and a keg of powder beside) pouring a stream of lead down upon them from the windows as fast as two boys could hand him loaded muskets. In the midst of all this, the enemy broke through the fence and poured into the yard like bees. Brother Harris and Demory now retreated to the door, in which both stood side by side, about two rods from them, with two muskets apiece, throwing buckshot into their bowels, heart and brains, like a tornado (!) Soon brother Nichols received a slug in his breast, at the window, which brought him to the floor. He cried out,—"Daddy, gun catch me."—The blood poured fourth freely. I then sent him into a bed-room in the lee part of the house. He had given the enemy, who were not more than 8 rods from the window where he stood, as thick as they could stand loading and firing, about twenty shots. Beside all this, the air was darkened with pisoned arrows, flying in every direction.

"At this time, i. e., the fall of Nichols, I stepped immediately into his tracks, having 11 muskets loaded, and renewed the fire from the window. At this time the sun was up; Goterah had got into the yard with a considerable number of his men, growling like a mammoth lion, and rolling about on the ground saying to his men—"Come on, come on." But he soon fell a lifeless corpse, within two and a half rods from the house; supposed to be shot by Br. Harris, who then stood with Demory. At this time I was directly over their heads, taking deliberate aim at fifties, who stood in thick groups about 5 or 6 rods from the window; at which time some of the enemy shot a nice tube out of my watch-key and spoiled it! The ball or slug went through the partition of Sister Harris' room, and after straightening her hair, went out the lee window.

"They laid hold of Goterah, their head man, and went off as if the wicked one was after them. And if all hell had been let loose at once, they would not have made more noise, hooting and screaming, than they did. There was terror in their war horns.

"The engagement continued one hour and twenty-two minutes. After they were gone, we went out on the battle ground; and although they had carried off their dead, except three big slab-sided fellows, yet I never saw such a scene before. There was blood and brains in every direction. We picked up their greegreeves in handfuls. But O, the path in which they went was one complete gore on both sides; yea, it stood in puddles.—We picked up their fingers by the way side!!!

"There could not have been less than 300 warriors, and Goterah, the great champion leopard, at their head. They had been gone about an hour before any body came to assist us. Zoda Quee came first. And soon they rallied in from every quarter to our relief. The Americans came from Millsburg about 12 o'clock. Capt. C. Barker, from Caldwell, with a company of 20, all volunteers, arrived here about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and all stood on guard for us the first night.

"On Sunday morning, about thirty men left this place, and took the path of the enemy, determined to follow it to St. Paul's River, to see what discoveries could be made in regard to the enemy.

"About sunset Zoda Quee's party returned with Goterah's head in their hands.

"My hand is so weak, I am obliged to close this letter without further interesting particulars.

"Affectionately yours, GEORGE S. BROWN."

Mr. Buchanan, Governor of the colony, was at the time of the battle at Bassa, on a visit; but Capt. Bell, of the U. S. brig of war Dolphin, went after him, when it was determined to carry the war into the heart of the enemy's country. Accordingly a force of 285 men was collected, including about 50 friendly natives, which, on the 27th, marched to attack king Gyteambah's town, who it appears had sent Goterah to the attack upon Heddington. The next day they had to pass through a narrow path, with a dense forest on either side. About 1 o'clock, P. M., as they had feared, the advance guard, under Capt. Snetter, received a volley of musketry, and Capt. S. fell. Not a native could be seen, and the force hurried through the defile, constantly receiving a fire from the thicket. Proceeding eight miles farther, they reached a hill overlooking the town, when a tremendous firing commenced, both from musketry and from two small swivels which the natives had mounted on the top of the barricade. The account proceeds:

"This said barricade, though rudely made, was yet impregnable to the musket balls. The balls from their swivels fell at the feet of the army at the bottom of the hill, and before they fired again the army was at the barricade, about to surround it, so that the second fire of the swivels went over their heads. At the moment, however, for surrounding the barricade, storming the main gate, which was in the rear, and entering forcibly, (which could it have been done before the enemy had opportunity to retreat, the whole African corps would have been cut off,) the fire of the enemy did the most execution. Capt. Chas. Johnson, received several wounds and fell. A native youth, Lewis Tulliver, who has been for years in the colony, and was raised by a colonist, was shot down."

Upon this, the whole native force fled for life, pouring out of the gates in multitudes, and in ten minutes the Liberians had sole possession of the barricade. The missionaries (!) remained over the Sabbath, and on Monday burned and destroyed the town, and returned to Monrovia by another path. Capt. Snetter, we are informed, died of his wounds on the succeeding Wednesday, in peace of mind! and was buried with military honors.—The last intelligence is, that tranquillity is restored, that a treaty is in consideration for the purchase of a large tract of country north of St. Paul's, and that the hope is entertained that the colonists will be enabled now to pursue their lawful callings without being so frequently obliged to leave them to take the field.

A BASE FRAUD.— "It will be recollected, says the New York Express that a short time since, a Mr. Watkins was arrested at New Orleans, for having in his possession a large amount of the post notes issuded by the Farmers' bank of Seneca county, and signed by J. J. Fenton, Cashier, and Wychoff, President. Subsequently this individual was set at liberty and when on a passage up the Mississippi, with his pockets laden with these notorious issues, he was arrested and lodged in jail at Paducah, Kentucky, on suspicion of these post notes being false. But this was a great mistake, they were bona fide post notes of the famous Farmers bank of Seneca county, N. Y., were regularly signed by the president and cashier, among some half million dollars more; and in conjunction with some eminent millers and merchants of Waterloo, N. Y., and the president, cashier, &c. of the bank, sent with this Watkins, Lee, Wychoff, &c. &c. South and West, to ease from our planters, farmers, &c., their surplus crops. Already have some 50,000 in these notorious issues arrived at Seneca county, and have been protested, and the honest hearted farmers have found, that they have been most wontonly robbed and swindled of their hard earnings.—A villany as profligate as this should be ferretted out and properly punished.—The laws are fully adequate, but they are not properly enforced. We think it would be well for the solvent banks of this country to hold a convention and decide upon two things, viz: the collection of a fund for the arrest and punishment of all counterfeiters,—and another for the prosecution of all swindling concerns that are started as banks, but with the object of defrauding the people, and thus in effect of discrediting sound and well regulated institutions. In Philadelphia for example the getters up of half a dozen swindling loan companies have escaped the just due of their iniquity, because nobody thought it worth while to arrest the knaves and have them prosecuted to conviction. In some parts of the Union societes exist for the purpose of arresting horse thieves. Why not carry out the same principle with regard to counterfeiters, and bank knaves? The conviction of a few would have an excellent effect. Nothing was more generally approved in this community than the just punishment that was meted out to Dr. Dyott, and yet we frequently hear it asked why should Dyott suffer, and ——— (naming some of the rouges who still are at large in our city,) be permitted to escape.—Bicknell.

THE OUTRAGE AT OSWEGO.—The two villains, Lett and Defoe, (as his name is now spelt,) who were arrested, charged with the attempt to burn the Great Britain Steamer at Oswego, are committed for trial, on the confession of one of them. We copy from the correspondence of the Syracuse Signal, June 9th.

The whole of this day has been taken up with the examination of Lett, and De Foe, his accomplice in the attempt to fire the steamboat Great Britain. After a number of witnesses were examined this morning, De Foe voluntarily confessed the crime, in the following manner: "I am a native of Upper Canada, am 34 years of age, have been a widower four years, have one child, a daughter, now in Toronto. I was concerned in the late disturbances in Canada, I arrived at Oswego on the 25th of May and put up at the Centre House. Lett's room was next to mine. Lett bought a trunk, and in it put the combustibles; in the bottom was placed 2 lbs. cotton wadding, then one quart jug containing 1 lb. gunpowder, across this was placed two jugs of 2 gallons, each filled with rosin, spirits of turpentine, and other combustible matters, then the whole padded tight with cotton saturated with inflamable liquids.

A hole was then made, and a slow match placed so as to extend from the outside to the powder. It was then locked and sent to me (De Foe) by a carman on board the Great Britain. Before firing the match I removed the trunk several times to escape observation. At length I fixed upon a place beside the ladie's cabin and under the upper deck steps.' (This was the best place for firing the boat, as the trunk was surrounded by light pannel work, which would burn like tinder.)—"The trunk was arranged by Lett, the plan of operation was his also. While I was preparing to fire the trunk, Lett remained on the pier about 100 yards from the boat. I applied the fire to the slow-match, and went on shore, and one minute after it exploded, and I made my escape." Lett was arrested at the Centre House after a desperate struggle. On his person was found four pistols and a large bowie knife. The citizens of Oswego assembled in the evening and offered a reward of $250 for the apprehension of De Foe, and he was taken that night prowling around the United States Hotel. De Foe says their object was to burn the Britain in American waters, so that the blame should be laid on the Americans. He says also, (but no one gives credit to it) that it was known and countenanced by some of the inhabitants of Oswego; but as yet no names are mentioned, and who would put confidence in any thing the villain would say, who would murder a fellow creature in cold blood, who would disturb the ashes of the mighty dead, (Lett boasts of destroying Brock's monument,) and to crown all, for the gratification of a fiendish passion, to destroy the lives of the helpless and innocent!

The only consolation in this matter is that they are both Canadian Refugees, and have not, as far as known, a single acquaintance in Oswego.

WASHINGTON, JUNE 19, 1840.

I have not written to you for some weeks, because there has been nothing done in Congress of general interest, since my last, and I know of but little now that deserves special notice.

A few weeks since, Mr. Howard, one of the candidates for Governor of Indiana, left his seat in the House, on leave of absence for two weeks. The understanding is that he will resign his seat on reaching home.

A bill to extend the charters of the banks of the District, has passed the Senate. Besides this, the Senate has not matured an important measure for several weeks. Much time has been spent discussing subjects of a purely party character. Secretary Poinsett's project for a standing army has been very roughly handled by the opposition members: and indeed, has received the go-by from the Secretary's political friends. The Senate's Militia committee made a long report a few days since, the principal object of which seemed to be to show that the administration was not censurable for this unpopular measure, it being merely a scheme recommended by a co-ordinate department of the government. The whig Senators insisted that it had become one of the leading measures of the administration by the President's approving and recommending it to the especial attention of Congress in his last annual message. A motion was made to have the Secretary's Report printed and sent out with the report of the committee, on which the committee comment at such length; but the motion failed: after which 20,000 copies of the report of the committee were ordered to be printed.

After much discussion on the details of the General Bankrupt Bill, a new bill was reported, containing such provisions as the Senate had approved as was indicated by the many votes that had been taken while that bill was under consideration.

In the House of Representatives, the Sub-Treasury bill has been taken up once a day for some weeks, that members might deliver their well studied speeches, which are intended to be read by their constituents. The bill will pass.

I recollect nothing farther in the doings of Congress worthy of notice. Politics appear to engross about the whole time of the leading men here, and the business of the nation has to yield to the more important matters of personal and political strife.

On Saturday evening last a fire broke out, and among other buildings injured were two frame houses belonging to Mr. James Moore. Jr., formerly of this place, but now near Zanesville, Ohio. The injury to these houses is said to amount to 400 or $500. A few days before the fire occurred, these buildings were insurred, through Mr. Moore's agent in this city.

We have had some great political gatherings in the District recently. One was addressed by the "Buckeye Blacksmith," of your State. He has created quite a sensation among politicians in these parts. After he had concluded a speech in front of the City Hall, the other evening, so great was the enthusiasm of the moment, that he was not allowed to walk through the gate in front of the City Hall, but was borne over the fence on the shoulders of the audience to his boarding house. He was met in this city, by the Mayor of Philladelphia, who invited him to visit Philadelphia.

Respectfully, yours,
MENTOR.

MORE NEWS FROM FLORIDA.—The St. Augustine News of the 12th, contains the following:

Indians killed—Capture and escape—Captain Mason killed.—We learn that Col. Riley's command, operating on the Withlacoochee, a few days since surprised an Indian camp, two warriors of which were killed, one man and woman and child made prisoners.—The Indian was placed under the charge of a sentinel, who, falling asleep allowed his escape.—Pursuit was immediately made by Capt. J. B. Mason of the Florida Volunteers, who, being in advance of his men, was accidentally killed by firing upon the escaping Indian.

The Indians who committed the outrages in the neighborhood a fortnight ago, and surrounded the dwellings at North River, proceeded to the settlement at Mandarin, and were reconnoitering about there when their signs were discovered. A party of gentlemen immediately started in pursuit, and came upon five of the rascals. They took to a high grass pond, and as the party were too small to surround it, the grass was fired, when the fellows escaped under the smoke.—Their tracks were numerous in and around the settlement.

A passenger arrived at Charleston from St. Augustine, informs the editor of the Southern Patriot that Col. Green, operating in middle Florida, had come in contact with a party of Indians and succeeded in killing three warriors and a white man who was with them—also capturing several prisoners.

DREADFUL OUTRAGE.—A shocking murder was recently perpetrated at Leipsic, Delaware. A colored man with his wife, who was a mulatto woman, but extremely light, arrived at that place, when a rumor was circulated that the woman was white with a black husband. A band af villains, headed by one named Henry Clark, visited the vessel, dragged the wretched woman from the cabin, outraged her person, then covered her body with an inflammable material, which they set on fire, and left her to die in horrible torments. One of the crew of the vessel named Fox, became States' evidence and revealed the names of the rest of the gang. Some colored men, it is stated, also participated in the diabolical outrage. Clark was arrested, but succeeded in making his escape. The details of this affair are appalling indeed, and the citizens of Delaware owe it to themselves and to the laws of the country to make an untiring effort to bring the offenders to justice. Fiends could not have consummated a more diabolical outrage. In a christian land, and among a civilized people, it is indeed disgraceful.

COUNTERFEITS AND COUNTERFEITERS.—A Cincinnati paper says:—A gang of Counterfeiters were arrested in the woods on Twin Creek, near Portsmouth, on Friday last. They were discovered by a man who was hunting oxen, and were at work making spurious coin at the time. Four of the number were secured, with their dies, and other implements of their trade, and taken to Portsmouth; three escaped.—Bicknell.

Counterfeit five dollar notes, purporting to be of the State Bank of Indiana, are noticed by the Cincinnati Gazette, as in circulation. The counterfeits purport to be engraved by W. Dane & Co., whereas the genuine bills were engraved by Rowden, Wright & Hatch, New York; and this may at once lead to detection.

Counterfeit two dollar notes on the Bank of Illinois dated June 3, 1839, letter B, were lately detected at St. Louis.

We understand that the break in the Ohio canal near Roscoe has been repaired, and boats are again running in a lively manner.—Gazette.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

TWENTY DAYS LATER.

The Western arrived yesterday morning at half-past three o'clock, bringing us copious files of papers, of Liverpool and London to the 3d of June, and Bristol to the 4th. We publish this day all that we can find room for, embracing the most important points in the intelligence.

The news is interesting, but contains no very encouraging reports from the English business world. The tenor of the commercial news is of the same placid cast that we have long been in the habit of receiving.

The digest of Parliamentory news will be found unusually interesting.

We find no later news from China.

The prospect of the crops was considered most favorable. Alternate sunshine and gentle rain had a most excellent effect upon vegetation, which was every where looking well, and promising an abundant harvest. The price of grain was falling, and in flour very little doing.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.—In the House of Lords, May 15, (left sitting by our last advices,) Viscount Melbourne said that instructions had been sent to the English consular, agent at Damascus, to interfere in behalf of the Jews.

In the House, May 15, the resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer relative to increase of taxes on assessed taxes, customs and excise, and spirits, were carried by a handsome majority of from 111 to 115. The increase of revenue, calculated to be raised by these additions is £2,337,000.

In the Commons on Wednesday, May 20, at a late hour, the House resolved to go into committe on Lord Stanley's Irish Registration Bill, by a vote of 301 to 298; majority against ministers, 3. Long and earnest debates had previously been had upon this subject. The time of going into committee upon it was fixed for the fourth of June. About the same time the Lords were to take up the Irish Municipal Bill.

Lord Powerscourt presented a petition signed by 200 persons in Bath, praying that the Attorney General should be instructed to commence a prosecution against Mr. O'Connell, and his chief co-agitators, for the treasonable language they habitually used in advocating the repeal of the union. If this were not done by her Majesty's Government, then the petitioners prayed, as an act of justice, for the immediate liberation of minor criminals, imprisoned for political offences.

Sir R. Peel asked why the papers relating to the difference between this country and the United States had not been presented? Lord J. Russell thought it better that all the papers should be presented together, and all had not yet been printed.

On Tuesday, May 26, in the Lords, a petition was presented by the Archbishop of Dublin, praying that the liturgy might be revised, in order to leave discretion among the clergy to accommodate the tenets of the church to the altered state of things. Many conscientious men could not subscribe to the articles. The principal point desired was a legislative assembly of the clergy. The petition elicited a warm debate, after which the Lords adjourned to Monday, June 1.

On Tuesday, May 26, Mr. Villiers again brought forward his motion that a committee be appointed to take the present corn laws into consideration. Lost, by a majority against it of 123.

Leave has been granted to bring in two more bills relative to Irish Registration—both whig or radical.

On Wednesday, May 27, some conversation took place in reference to Feargus O'Conner, from which it appeared that government intends to abate the rigor of his confinement.

Thursday, May 28, Lord John Russell gave notice of a bill relating to the Clergy Reserves in Canada, by which the Government should have the power of selling the whole of these lands.—After certain incumbrances of a temporary nature, he would give one quarter to the Church of England, one quarter to the Church of Scotland and the remaining moiety he would allow the Governor to allot to the different denominations of Christians requiring such assistance, in such proportion as to his discretion would seem meet.

Lord John Russell, on the same day, obtained leave to bring in a bill against bribery and treating at elections; by which, if bribery or treating were practised before an election, the adverse candidate might give notice that his opponent was committing those offences, and that either the bribery or the treating, if afterwards proved before the committee, should unseat the one candidate and substitute the other, in the same way as where notice is given that a candidate wants the requisite qualification.

YORK MINSTER BURNED.—It is painful to hear that this old and celebrated Cathedral, in the city of York, one of the architectural boasts of England, was injured by fire on the 21st ultimo. It is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

A great meeting was held at Exeter Hall on the 1st instant, for the extinction of the foreign Slave Trade and the civilization of Africa.—Prince Albert took the chair, and made a short and appropriate speech. Short, we guess. Nearly 5,000 men were present.

The Queen's birth day was celebrated on the 25th ultimo with great enthusiasm. The public buildings in London were illuminated with gas in the evening, and the effect is represented as being magnificent beyond description. The Queen held a drawing room at St. James' Palace.

The Queen and Prince Albert are very popular—they ride out nearly every day in the Parks, and attend the theatres and other places of amusement frequently.

Her Majesty, through Lord Belhauen, Chief Commissioner to the General Assembly of Scotland, has presented the munificent royal donation of £2000 for the propagation of the gospel in the Highlands.

There is an attempt to open the National Gallery and British Museum upon the Sabbath, for the accommodation of those persons who cannot visit these places during the week days.

Courvoirier, the valet, and supposed the murderer of Lord William Russell, has had his final examination, and is committed to Newgate to await his trial.

There appears to be considerable excitement about the treatment of Fergus O'Connor, the Chartist editor, who was imprisoned in York Castle for "a seditious libel." He has been placed with felons, and has not fared much better.

FRANCE.—A tremendous excitement had been got up, and cooled down again in Paris, relative to the removal of the remains of Napolean.—The opposition party in the Chamber of Deputies, fearing that the project of the removal would be too great an advantage to the Thiers Ministry, and notwithstanding all their enthusiasm when the subject was first proposed, have chosen to cut down the sum proposed by ministers for that object.

The committee on the bill recommended, in accordance with the wishes of the ministry, that 2,000,000 francs should be raised. The opposition feared that this was too liberally appropriating money for the eclat of Louis and family and the strengthening of Thiers. After an angry debate, an amendment to reduce the requisite sum to 1,000,000, and to reject the proposition for raising an equestrian statue to Napoleon was carried. The recoil on the opposition was tremendous; and the excitement in Paris occasioned by the refusal of the Chamber of Deputies to vote 2,000,000 instead of 1,000,000 for the removal of the ashes of Napoleon was immense.

Paris, as every body knows, is—France. A national committee was raised, and subscriptions were to be opened in all the cities and large towns of the kingdom. Of course, three times the sum refused to the ministry, would thus have been raised—a result which would have identified the ministry with the people, against the Deputies. It is exactly what M. Thiers wanted, and thus the enemies of the Minister disgraced themselves, only to accelerate his great triumph. The mortification of the Chamber was not greater than deserved.

The Chamber of Peers, to strengthen the Ministry still more against the Deputies, adopted without discussion the project of the law. In the peculiar position of the opposition, M. Odille Barrot, came in to the rescue, and allayed the ferment. He addressed a letter to the Courrier Francois, stating that the object of the majority in the Chamber of Deputies, who voted for reducing the proposed grant was merely to discountenance the erection of a paltry equestrian statue to Napoleon; but that they were still ready to grant the original sum, or any other which might be required, as it never was intended by the Chamber that recourse should be had to a national subscription. This explanation was accepted by the subscription committee and it was announced that the money will be returned to the subscribers.

The latest news from the French possessions in Africa is to the 24th May. Marshal Vallee on the 17th, with the main body of the army and accompanied by the Princes, reached Abd el Kader's position at Medeah, about two days march from Algiers. Abdel Kader retreated without firing a gun. On the 20th, the army commenced its return to Algiers, with what fortune is stated in the following despatch, dated Algiers, May 24:

It had scarcely proceeded a league, when the Arabs began to harrass the rear; but the most serious affair was at the camp of the Olives where our troops had bivouacked on the advance. There a strong column of the enemy was seen gradually to show itself on an eminence which commands the road. An attempt was made to avoid it, but it suddenly fell on the 17th regiment of Light Infantry, which formed the rear guard. This regiment behaved well, but it could not long keep in check about 5000 cavalry and infantry, and it asked for reinforcements.—Meantime it kept up a well supported fire against the enemy, who fought with incredible fury."

The Arab horsemen had dismounted and attacked one company with their sabres; happily the Zoaves came to their relief. Our cavalry and the regiment of Hussars also dismounted and acted as sharp shooters. The combat was long and obstinate, and the unfortunate 17th regiment, which stood firm till the last moment, experienced severe loss. On this memorable day our soldiers used each 100 cartridges. We had about 100 killed and 200 wounded. We were obliged to abondon some of the wounded. On the following day the army was at Bildah, and the next day at Algiers.

The disaffected members of the Parisian press give these accounts as disasters. They say that a serious quarrel has arisen between the Duke of Orleans and Marshal Vallee, and rumors of the Duke's speedy return to France were circulated in Paris. The ministerial newspapers deny the truth of the report.

PRUSSIA.—The London Times of June 1st announces the death of his Majesty Frederic William, king of Prussia.

SPAIN.—The Madrid papers received are of the 25th ultimo. On the 24th, Espartero commenced the siege of Morella, by cannonading the fort of San Pedro Martyr, one of four strong outworks thrown up by Cabrera a few months ago. The Queen's troops had carried the outward works and penetrated within the walls.—The Carlists were seized with panic and were in full retreat. The fort of Santedo had also been carried, and the Christino forces had obtained such a complete ascendency that the possession of Morella, which it was generally acknowledged would destroy the last hopes of the Carlists, may be considered as completed.

PORTUGAL.—On the 25th May, the Queen of Portugal, opened, in person, the New Sessions of the Cortes. The Queen was well received by the people, going to, and returning from the Hall of the Cortes; albeit the crowd was not so great as on former occasions. The various points touched upon in the speech, convey little news, the material facts being already known by the events resulting from them.

NAPLES.—The Paris Constitutionle will have it that the negotiations between England and Naples have not advanced a step—that England demands payment of a loan of a very old date, with which Naples is not inclined to comply—that diplomatic couriers were flying in all directions, &c., &c. The King of Naples had gone to Sicily, and notwithstanding these war rumors, it was stated that he had given assurance that he should abide implicitly by the decision of France. Other accounts say that the foolish and faithless king has directed his Ambassador at Paris to declare the mediation at an end. It is certain that he has refused a definite answer to the propositions made to him.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Dates are up to the 7th of May. The arrangement of the dispute with Mehemet Ali had not made a step in advance. Letters from Leyruth, on the other hand, stated, that, although the preparations for war had not relaxed, Ibrahim evinced no intention of marching forward.

REVIEW OF THE PAST.

hen I was neither thinking of Bro. Springer his paper, the number for April 22d, came to d, containing something like charges of in- istency between my anti-reform course in er years, and my abolition course at the ent time. I was requested to explain myself the columns of the Recorder were tendered his purpose. The very day I received this munication, I had just finished the article the Observer, entitled, "RADICALISM AND LITIONISM." Though I was principally moved rite this article from reading Dr. Bangs' on number in the Advocate of April 10th; on examining the queries of the Recorder, nsidered the article which I had previously tten, nearly as good an answer as though it been written as such. I therefore, forwarded the Recorder, a very brief reply to its queries requested the insertion of the other article, r it should appear in the Observer, as a more nded answer to the queries of the Recorder. have made these statements to show that I not intrude the article in question upon the order. It is due to the Recorder, however, ay that its course has been quite consistent honorable, in publishing all that I have fur- ed. And should the Observer publish Bro. inger's strictures, as requested, I shall be en- ly satisfied. For I do love fair play; as it is best way to make and keep good friends. lut should the Observer publish the strictures the Recorder of June 10th, I will also claim insertion of the following brief remarks in same number, or as soon after as convenient. st. The Recorder by some means has done great injustice, in trying to make my re- ks bear upon the Reformers of early days, or time previous to 1827. Any one as well uainted with reading and writing as the tor of the Recorder, can easily perceive that as very distinct and guarded as to time, itali- ing several words for this very purpose, and ng date, &c. In one place the Recorder pro- es to give a quotation, and yet leaves out the e entirely. Instead of saying "the crusade he Reformers of 1827, was against Episcopacy lf," I am made to say "the crusade of the formers was against Episcopacy itself." Then er taking the advantage of leaving out the e, I am referred to the "Wesleyan Reposi- y" and the "Mutual Rights." If the "His- y and Mystery" had been named, it would e been far more to the purpose than the Re- itory, that lived and died in a different state things, and several years before the time of ich I professed to treat. Every one acquainted h the history of the Reformers in question, ows that the state of things during the entire e of the Repository, as well as the Mutual ghts, prior to 1827, was very different from at they were at the time of the secession, and a few years subsequent to that occurrence. It is not my wish, nor have I time to overhaul ese old matters. Suffice it to say, that I still im to be correct in my statements and allu- ns at the TIME of which I profess to treat.— nd now, in my turn, I will refer the editor of e Recorder to the "History and Mystery" d its echo, the "Mutual Rights," subsequent 1827. And if the numerous lectures delivered out the same time, were in print, they might o be consulted. But, do pray, keep away from e Wesleyan Repository.

2d. As to my allusion to the "fate" of the Methodist Protestant Church, I would just say, that in using this expression, I principally followed Dr. Bangs, who had represented the M. P. Church, as not prospering according to their anticipations. So far as Dr. B.'s argument was concerned, it made little or no difference with me whether his allusions to disappointment were correct or not. My object was to show the dissimilarity of the two cases, which the Dr. was insinuating as parallel. My own impression, however, has been, that the M. P. Church had neither prospered in proportion to the old church, nor as she anticipated in their commencement. This opinion was grounded upon the state of things within the bounds of my own acquaintance, and a remark that came from Rev. Asa Shinn's pen, some two or three years ago. I think his language, in reference to his church was, that his "prospects were by no means so flattering as they once were." I only quote from memory, but believe I am substantially correct. If, however, the M. P. Church is generally prospering, beyond the M. E. Church, I shall rejoice to learn this fact, and be happy to change my opinion.

ROBERT BOYD.

Barnesville, Ohio, June 19, 1840.

1. Bro. B. accuses us of doing him "great injustice" by making his remarks refer to Reformers previous to 1827. We did notice his date, but considered it then, and do still consider it, a distinction without a difference, for the object and principles of Reformers, both before and subsequent to 1827, were substantially the same; and to indicate any thing else, would be doing them "great injustice." It is true, there were two classes of Reformers. The controversy first began with the itinerant preachers disputing about rights among themselves; and when the laity and locality saw this contest going on with much warmth among the parties, while they manifested no interest in the rights of others, they began to urge their own claims to a representation in the department which made laws to govern them, and were making such head way, that the itinerant clergy, taking the alarm, adjusted their own difficulties for the time being, and like Pilate and Herod made friends, and united against the common foe. The arrangement between the itinerant parties, was finally completed at the General Conference of 1828. Of course, after that, the contest was mainly between the whole itinerancy, and the laity, and locality. But this was less directly against the episcopacy than was the enterprise of the itinerant Reformers, who immediately assailed the power of the bishops, while the laity went against the power of the whole itinerant clergy. We repeat again, that so far from Reformers ever having a campaign against the episcopacy, either before or subsequent to 1827, they would always have been satisfied for it to remain, if its powers had been properly limited and defined. So, when Bro. B. claims to be correct in his allusions to Reformers in 1827, we claim that he is incorrect, and here we are fairly at issue. Now, if he will sustain himself by facts we will yield the contest.

2. Our brother seems determined to make us accountable for the sins of Alexander McCaine. Now, why should we be held responsible for the errors, either real or imaginary, of any one, unless we adopt them? The doctrines of the "History and Mystery" had nothing at all to do with our controversy, for the Reformers, both before and subsequent to 1827, were opposed to the power of the episcopacy, no difference whether they held it with, or without, Mr. Wesley's consent, because they believed it to be unscriptural power. But if the bishops would have surrendered their anti-scriptural authority, Reformers would always have been willing to compromise the difficulty without the extinction of the office.

3. As it respect things differing at, and after the secession from what they were in 1827 and previous, if this be meant that the seceders had changed their principles, it is all a mistake. In principle, they are now, and ever have been, substantially the same. By the exercise of the power they were opposed to, the Reformers were driven from the church, and this was the greatest change they experienced. These things did not alter their opinions, but confirmed them in the correctness of their views, with regard to the despotic character of the episcopal government.

AGRICULTURAL.

WESTERN FARMER.—This work has been transferred from G. G. Moore, its former proprietor, to E. J. Hooper. It will be issued as formerly, at Cincinnati, O., once a month in pamphlet form, containing twenty-four pages, at one dollar per annum in advance, neatly printed on new type, containing occasional engravings, illustrating the subjects to which they refer.

The farmers in this section of the country ought, most assuredly, to sustain an agricultural paper published among them, and containing the experiments upon their own soil. We believe, it is a fact, that the largest portion of agricultural papers, taken in this section of the country, is from the North, the experiments and reasonings of which are adopted to a different soil, which, when applied to our own is calculated to mislead. For illustration, we will give the root system. So far as that system is applied to this section, and south of this, there never was a greater humbug; yet, to the North, where it is difficult to raise corn, it is highly applicable. Even in the counties bordering on the north part of this State, say Ashtabula, Geauga, &c., from three to five acres is an average crop of corn; and it takes near as much work to raise five acres there as it does twenty here, and then they will have little more than half the amount. The great difficulty in those counties is to subdue the grass,—add to this, the seasons are too short for corn to ripen. From the necessity of the climate and soil, these northern farmers have to raise the beet, turnip, &c., to fatten and keep their stock, and their agricultural papers have detailed their experiments, in the root business, with much interest. These have stimulated our theoretical farmers in this section, who have filled the columns of our political papers with their garden experiments. But they have prevailed on but few of our practical farmers to repeat the trial.—All say it is fine business, but still they abandon the root system.

It would certainly contribute far more to the agricultural interest of this section, for the people generally to take hold of the "Western Farmer," write for its pages, and give their money for its support, than to go to Albany, or elsewhere, for their agricultural experiments. We would not then likely be bored with so many root speculations.

If any of our readers should want the "Farmer," and will hand us the money, we will forward it for them.

The crops in New Jersey are represented to be in a most flourishing condition. Wheat, rye, oats, and grass will be unusually abundant.

THE CROPS.—The Alexandria Gazette of Saturday says, "The wheat and corn fields in the neighboring counties look very fine. In Prince William the prospect is uncommonly good."

The British barque Wander, Hardy, arrived at Norfolk, from Newcastle, England, has on board sixty passengers—among them are a number of miners, who will proceed to Richmond, to be employed in the mines in that neighborhood.

A drunkard was recently killed in Upper Canada, by falling down in a fit of intoxication, and breaking a glass bottle, containing rum, in his pocket. The broken glass cut a large hole in the lower part of his stomach, which caused his death.

A Mr. Charles Scott, of Pittsfield, Illinois, says he was robbed of $4,000 while travelling through Pike county, in that State, on the 16th. A couple of scoundrels, with black faces, presented pistols, and lest they should deliver their fire, he delivered his money.

The pirates who lately captured the English brig Vernon, off Cape Antonio, Cuba, murdering the captain, Cunningham, and two men, are in prison at Havana. At their preliminary examination, a spectator says, the cold blooded recitals of these demons made his heart shrink within him. They resided at Regia, and were well known at Havana.

Rev. Mr. May, in a letter from Athens, Greece, says:—The king is building a very large palace, too large and expensive, one would think, for a kingdom so small and young as Greece. The cost cannot be less than one million and a half of dollars. While this marble palace is going up, the people are in poverty and ignorance.—Surely such a monarch is not a "shepherd of the people." Mr. M. says that Athens looks much like the newest of our western towns. It contains about 20,000 inhabitants, and being the seat of the court, is increasing.

W. B. GREEN'S TRIAL CONCLUDED.—We learn from Richmond papers that the trial of W. B. Green has been concluded before the Examination Court in that city. "The court came to the unanimous decision to send him on for further trial before the fall term of the Supreme Court, on both counts of the indictment: 1st, for aiding and abetting W. B. Dabney in smuggling money from the Bank for his (Dabney's) behoof: 2d, involving the general charge of larceny: fraudulently taking, carrying away, &c. to the amount of $100,000 and more. There was no application made to bail him."—Gazette.

The Court Martial, for the trial of Commodore Elliott, closed its hearing of evidence on Monday at noon. Mr. Dallas, of counsel for the defence, was allowed till Saturday to prepare his address.—Meanwhile the court must daily go thro' the form of meeting and adjournment, to answer to the requirements of the law.

ANOTHER STEAMBOAT COLLISION.—The Portland papers describe a collision which happened on Saturday evening, in Boston harbor, between the steamboats Portland and Huntress, both bound to Portland, from the latter running into the bow of the former. The accident caused serious alarm, and the Captain of the Huntress is much blamed by the passengers on board of the Portland, who were witnesses of the affair, and the Captain of the Portland on the other hand, is blamed by the passengers of the Huntress. Neither boat was much damaged. We cannot tell on which side the blame should lie.

A DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.—We learn from the Fall River Patriot, that on Sunday week, Mr. James Pierce, his wife, and son, (being his whole family) and three boys, started on a sailing excursion in the bay, in a small boat. Owing to carelessness or inexperience, the boat upset; the wife of Mr. Pierce, and his child, 7 years old, were drowned. The others were taken up by another boat that came to their assistance. Mr. Pierce died in the evening—his death caused by his exertion, fatigue, and a distressing sense of the awful calamity. He had resided in that place for eight or nine years, following the occupation of a hair dresser—was a native of East India, and his wife of Norway.

PIRACY AT HOME.—The New York Sun states that a daring outrage was committed on the Hudson river a few evenings since, on board the schr. Carroll, belonging to that city, and commanded by Capt. Michaels, of Newburg. The schr. was proceeding to the latter place, and when opposite Peekskill, the Captain was hailed by three men from the shore, who requested to be taken as passengers to Newburgh. The captain consented, but the men had no sooner boarded the vessel than they seized the captain and wrested from him the helm, and threatened that without instant submission he should be placed under the hatches. With no other force than a young man and a small boy, Capt. Michaels saw that the odds of strength was against him, and therefore attempted no further forcible resistance, but to retain $60 in money, which was then in his possession. This the unwelcome passengers attempted in vain to get.

COMMUNICATIONS.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

WESTMINSTER, O., JUNE 15, 1840.

Bro. Springer: Our third quarterly meeting closed the 18th of this inst. Several obtained the pearl of great price; three were added to the church. The seventh of this inst. we held a three day meeting at Bro. Claybaugh's; it was a refreshing season. This day we closed a protracted meeting in this place. Bro. Hunt from Union circuit, favored us with his labors. Six were added to the church, which makes upwards of fifty since conference.

JOHN GUEST, Sup. Lima Ct.

MORGAN, O., JUNE 22, 1840.

In reference to our church matters allow me so say that Bro. Brown was with us at our quarterly meeting in this place, referred to in my last on the 24th ultimo. Our meeting was a very good one, though nothing of a special character occurred. Two united with the church in this place at that time; and six have united at other places since. Making 26 that joined since conference, and the prospect is that more will unite soon. But politics seems to be the order of the day at present, and the excitement appears to not be very favorable to religious influence in some places, Yours, &c.

A. K. EARL.

BETHLEHEM, IA, JUNE 17, 1840.

Dear Brother: I request Bro. Flood to visit the town of Laporte on his tour to the north part of this State. Not knowing where a line would reach him, I take the liberty to address him thro' the Recorder. In the town of Laporte there is a small class, say ten or twelve members, who wish to be organized into a church. And there is a brother who wishes ordination, that he may be authorized to administer to the necessities of his brethren. It is presumable that a good circuit could be formed, at that place, if Bro. Flood would but pay them a visit. While he is in the Wabash country it would be but little out of his way to call and see those brethren. He can call on Bro. Oakes, in the town of Laporte, who will gladly receive him, and give the wanted information. I would be much gratified if those brethren could be attended to, as they have long desired it.

Before I close, I will remark, that our third quarterly meeting was held at this place the 4th Saturday and Sabbath in May. And though there was no special excitement, yet there was much good feeling and an addition of 2 respectable members. We feel encouraged to go on in the service of our Master, and in the cause of religious liberty. We have had a pleasant state of feeling in our town, for some months. Our Presbyterian brethren are very kind to us; we join in holding prayer and social meetings, and our confidence and good feeling appears to be mutual. Our old side brethren don't seem to be willing to encourage either of us. The result is, the increase of the confidence of the public in the first named, and the loss of confidence in the last.—I very much desire the increase of brotherly love and christian fellowship. My experience has taught me that as much depends on the exertion of the laity as the ministry. I am well satisfied that the reason of the decline of our church, in many places, is the want of piety on the part of the membership, and in some cases in the ministry. Would to God my brethren would see to this matter; they must not expect that all which is wanting is a talented preacher for success.—They must expect to work too. They must get in the spirit and act out religion; then God will bless and prosper them.

I have been much gratified in reading the communications of J. Smith and Joel Dalbey in your paper. They seem to breath the christian spirit. They differ but honestly. It is very pleasant to see brethren discussing differences of opinion in a proper spirit. May brotherly love continue.

I close by reiterating my best wishes for your prosperity in the cause of mutual rights, and subscribe myself,

Your unworthy brother,

THO. P. ARMSTRONG.

For the Wesetrn Recorder.

Bro. Springer: I am pleased to find so pacific and friendly a spirit manifested in the last communication of Bro. J. J. Amos, in your 38th number. I trust we shall close our little controversy in a very friendly manner. I felt mortified with the length of my former article, when it appeared in print. I wrote then in vindication, as I felt in duty bound, because I considered that our conference was unreasonably censured and abused. Had our brother in his reply, been so candid as to take back his groundless censures, which have been published by the Methodist Episcopal press to the four winds, to the injury of our cause, or had he acknowledged that he had acted hastily herein, I should have admired the magnanimity of the act, and I doubt not but you, sir, and your readers would have tho't more highly of him for it. But his mind was so engrossed with the importance of amending our system, we are led to conclude that he could not see (though so obvious to every body else) that there was need of "amendment" at home. I trust therefore that the Ohio Conference whom he has thus assailed will endeavor to bear with his rudeness,—and when he gets through with "amending our system," I trust he will find time to be more considerate.

Our brother still finds fault with the plan recommended by conference for raising the preachers' allowance, and gives his "applause" to those circuits which, like himself, treat it with inattention or contempt. Some would call this nullification,—but it is only a way he has of "amending our system." But, you must know, our brother has reasons for his opposition to this enactment of conference. 1st. He believes it anti-scriptural. This he stated before. But why not tell us with what scripture it comes in conflict? St. James' scripture, I suppose, with which he so generously rebuked the conference. 2d. "It is contrary to the ways of Methodism." True, O King. My good brother is right here. For the "ways of Methodism," particularly in our part of the Methodistic world, have generally been too lacking in energy for bringing to pass what the word of God as well as the Discipline requires. This movement betokens a waking up to bring something to pass. "3d. And not the least, because in 9th article of the constitution, it is made the prerogative of the General Conference to devise ways and means for raising funds," i. e. for the compensation of the Book Agent, Editor, &c. Therefore, you see, the Ohio Annual Conference transcended her prerogative in entering into measures of this kind.—What a pity she lost sight of the constitution Let us look at this document a moment with Bro. A. It is true that article 9 makes it the prerogative of the General Conference to fix the compensation of ministers, &c. But by article 7, Annual Conferences are vested with power, not only to "devise ways and means," if they choose, but to "make rules and regulations —to defray the expenses of the itinerant ministers, preachers and their families; to raise the amount of their salaries," &c.

Bro. A advises me to "quote scripture rightly or not attempt it." This is right. Thank you, brother. I trust I am always thankful to be corrected when wrong. And I have always thought that to misquote the word of God, is worse than to mangle the King's English. Well, I am as ready now as on the former occasion to go to the scripture with Bro. A. He charges me with quoting wrong, a specified passage. I plead, not guilty, and invite him "to the law and to the testimony." He refers you to Deuteronomy and to 1st Corinthians, from which we should conclude that he has read some considerable portion of the scriptures, but has not yet got through. When he gets as far along as 1st Timothy, 5th chapter 18th verse, he will find verbatim et literatim the passage which I quoted, thus: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." I feel sorry that our brother has thus committed himself, especially, seeing he has set about helping Mr. Campbell to abolish our creeds, for the purpose of taking the word of God for our all-sufficient standard and rule, &c. But I do not think hard of my brother for thus accusing me wrongfully. It is of a piece with his treatment to the Ohio Conference. You know it is said that when a man has the jaundice, the face of every body else looks green, but he cannot discover that his own is amiss.

Finally. I disavow a disposition in the above to utter any thing impertinent or uncalled for.—I write in a spirit of unabated friendship for my brother and old friend in Rush county. And I shall thank you, Mr. Editor, to alter my phraseology in any case where you see me departing from the words or the spirit of good nature or of grace. With the utmost good will to all, but especially to Bro. J. J. A., I remain,

G. D. Wilson, A. S. Palmer, J. Wilson, 1 sub.; R. Boyd, D. Crall, J. Guest, G. Clancy, J. Clarke, T. Oliver, J. Dalbey, I. Edwards, W. Reeves, S. Bious, W. Burke, G. J. Aull, A. H. Bassett, O. F., A. K. Earl, E. Newton, W. W. Paul, T. Addis, Joseph Parke, J. M. Fulton and E. Sturman.

Samuel Bious, formerly of Wellsville, Ohio, informs us that he has removed to Paris, Pa., and that he had ordered his paper changed to the latter place, but that it came irregularly, &c. If he sent us such information, we never received it; we sent his paper regularly to Wellsville, and if any numbers came to him at Paris, they must have been forwarded by the Post Master of that place. It was the duty of the Post Master to have given us information of this removal. We now change the paper, as directed, to Paris; but as you have not given the county in which this office is situated, it is doubtful if it reaches you regularly.

A correspondent says, there was a letter addressed to us from Finley circuit, containing revival intelligence, that we did not notice. We have no recollection of any such letter. If we received it, and it were not published, it must have been mislaid by accident. We have so much to attend to that our memory does not serve us on all occasions.

Bro. Paul writes, "I am requested to say to you, that Mr. Nathan Timmons, formerly of Ross county, Ohio, enclosed two dollars to you for the Western Recorder, directed to Zanesville, some six or eight weeks ago; the paper not coming, he wrote a second, and directed as above," &c. We have received neither of the letters above alluded to.

We are satisfied from the explanation of Bro. A. H. Bassett, that there was nothing intentionally wrong in Joseph White, of Gratis, Ohio, to whom we lately referred, and regret that we mistook his case. He has remitted the pay for his paper from Indiana, whither he had gone.

The Post Master, at Amelia, Ohio, says:—Strange Hunt has removed, and does not take his paper. He owes us two dollars. If any of our agents should see him, we would be glad they would mention it to him. Will Bro. Crall, in his next, be so good as to tell us where he has gone.

The name of the superintendent of Miami circuit, Ohio Conference, was wrongly spelled in our 41st number, owing to our own inadvertence and probably to his practice of writing it in capitals. It should be Joseph Parke.

The Post Master at Cincinnati informs us that Francis Preston does not take his paper from the office. Will Bro. Barnes please let us know about the matter?

The $2 note, on the "Exchange Bank of Cincinnati," that we received of Wm. Reeves, for W. B. Miller, of New Caple, Pa., is spurious. We shall return it to him, either before or at conference.

The quarterly conference of Madison circuit concurs in the arrangement to establish a separate conference in Indiana; Bro. T. Hicklin disapproves. A. H. BASSETT, Sec'y.

A Camp-Meeting will be held at the Diamond, ten miles from Indiana town and county, Pennsylvania, to commence on the thirteenth day of August. Indiana Conference-Notice.

THE first session of the Indiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, is appointed to be held at LIBERTY MEETING HOUSE, (John Burton's) near Mt. Tabor, Monroe county, Indiana, commencing Thursday, October 1st, 1840. Bro. JOSEPH SIMPSON is requested to preach the introductory sermon, at 10 o'clock, A. M. of said day, and Bro. ELIJAH COLLINS to serve as alternate.

As this is to be our first session, let us with the help of the Lord, endeavor to begin right. In view of this, the committee respectfully make these few suggestions. 1. Let our brethren assemble in the spirit of devout prayer, that the Divine blessing and approbation may attend our enterprize. 2. Let them be in attendance promptly at the commencement of the session. 3. Let each superintendent prepare accurate returns of the numbers in society, with the names of unstationed ministers and preachers, in the various circuits and missions. 4. Should any ministerial member be prevented from attending, let him not fail to address the conference by letter, as required by rule of discipline, and communicate all needful information.

N. B.—It will be recollected that each mission, having three or more societies, embracing not less than thirty members, is entitled to elect and send a delegate to the Annual Conference, provided the missionary is entitled to a seat in said conference.

UPON entering the second volume of this pioneer in the introduction of papers of its class, the publishers may be excused for congratulating themselves upon the continued prosperity and advancement of their periodical, from the issue of its first number, to the present time. Aware that competition is the life of business, they expected, and have met with rivals; but those rivals have, so far, been essential aids to the publicity and circulation of the Jonathan. New readers have been made, where, comparatively, few existed before, and the taste created for the elegant literature of the two hemispheres, carried into all parts of the country, and made accessible to all, has produced a demand for the Brother Jonathan, which it is gratifying to state is continually on the increase.

With such addition to their resources and emoluments, the publishers have aimed to give a commensurate increase to the value and interest of their sheet. In addition to the labors of the gentlemen whose names are announced as editors, the publishers avail themselves constantly of the aid of such occasional contributors as they can find space for.

For the foreign correspondence of the Jonathan the services of Isaac C. Pray, Jr., have been engaged; and his fine literary taste will also be exercised in the selection of things rare, new and worthy in the European literary mart. Selections from the cream of the foreign magazines will of course be continued.

MUSIC.—In the progress of improvement, a new feature has been added to the Brother Jonathan—the publication of new and popular music. Every paper will contain something in this way, new and pleasant—reference being had in the selection, rather to such pieces as all can sing and play, than to recherche compositions, suited only to the scientific. A new font of music type has been purchased, and a gentleman engaged to superintend this department, of excellent experience and knowledge of music.—This will enable us to give music a publicity which it never enjoyed before: to carry the same themes for carol to the sylvan maid in the farthest back woods, which delight the party in the city drawing-room. A simultaneous popularity will thus be enjoyed all over the country by such compositions as are adapted to the public taste, and worthy of the public favor.

Whatever other improvements may suggest themselves, will be adopted; and no pains spared to make the Jonathan a welcome visiter to all sorts of people, whose tastes are worthy of gratification. Other periodicals may be addressed to particular opinions—or to particular classes—Jonathan will wander free, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," and strive, with all the aid he has enlisted, to compass the whole circle: to give, in a word, a Cyclopedia of whatever may be desirable in a literary magazine, and weekly newspaper. He appeal to the past for vouchers of what he can do—and what he can, he will.

TERMS—Three dollars a year, in advance.—For Five Dollars two copes of the paper will be sent one year, or one copy two years. In no case will the paper be sent out of the city unless paid for in advance.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Western Recorder.

Let an Elder that rules well be counted worthy of double honor, especially those who labor in word and doctrine.

1 Tim v. 17.

This passage of sacred writ is a part of the special instructions given by St. Paul to his son in the gospel, relative to his duty and manner of performing that duty, as a young minister, toward the aged and the young, both male and female, and is certainly as binding on young ministers now, as it was on Timothy. It has struck my mind frequently, with great force, and caused painful sensations on seeing it violated by improper deportment, by young preachers toward age and office. I would, therefore, drop a few remarks on this important subject, praying that God may bless them to the reformation of those who appear to have overlooked the instructions of the inspired Apostle.

There appears to be two grades of elders referred to in the text. First, Elders. 2d. Elders who labor in word and doctrine. Both are to be counted worthy of double honor; the latter more especially. In verse 1st: rebuke not an elder, but entreat him as a FATHER, and the younger men as brethren, &c. Now, is it not plain, that if any youth treats an elder disrespectfully in word or action, that he is guilty of violating the command of the Holy Ghost? Honor thy father, &c., entreat him as a father.

Notwithstanding we have these plain precepts, how often have we seen young ministers treat old, gray headed elders with disrespect; yes, with shame we speak it. Puffed up with conceit of his own talents, we have heard one on the same day, and in the same pulpit, call in question, doctrines advanced by one of the ablest divines in the nation, and oldest ministers now living. We have also seen very improper deportment in our general councils as well as in private circles. Now, all this proves, that they have been very poorly brought up and are destitute of the common politeness of the idolatrous and superstitious Egyptians, near 3 thousand years ago. We are informed by Rollin, that "a very great respect was paid to old age. The young on the approach of the aged, rose in respect for them, and on every occasion resigned to them the most honorable seat. The Spartans borrowed this law from the Egyptians." 1st Vol. R's. An. History.

Now, shall we, who live in an enlightened land, with the plain precepts contained in the Bible, be excelled by the Pagan world? We must be plain on this subject, and say, without fear of refutation, that any minister of minor age, who treats the old with disrespect in any way, in public or private, must be destitute of one of the most essential qualifications for a minister of the meek and lowly Jesus, that is, HUMILITY. O! how odious is the sight, both to God, Angels and men—a proud, self-conceited preacher in the holy desk. O! that they would consider that one precept or command from the Lord, is as binding as another, and that when we teach that men should not steal, that we ourselves should not commit sacrilege.

We would not be understood to mean that young men ought to be gagged, either in private or public; but that when giving their opinion on any subject, they should do it with due deference and respect to the aged, as though they were addressing their affectionate father after the flesh, and had on their mind the precepts, rebuke not an elder, count them worthy of double honor; and also, the first commandment with promise, honor thy father, &c., and speak as though they wished to gain knowledge, rather than communicate it.

We will just add, that any who are destitute of this spirit, give evidence that if they have ever been taught due reverence toward their natural parents, that they have not practised the lesson, and ought to pray to God daily, to give them that most essential grace, HUMILITY.

JOHN SCOTT AND THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE QUARTERLY CONFERENCE OF PLEASANT HILL CIRCUIT.

Bro. Springer: Circumstances, not necessary to mention, prevented my receiving the 38th number of the Recorder until after the issue of the 40th. In looking over them I find a communication over the signature of "John Scott, of Winding Ridge, Ohio," which requires a few words in reply. It cannot be expected, however, that I shall follow all the windings of this production; but will content myself by noticing a few particulars.

But, before we enter on Bro. Scott's epistle, we will inform the brother how we come to sign our name in the manner we have done to those resolutions.—When they had passed the conference our recording steward concluded, being delegate, to carry them to conference and hand them to the editor; but as they had not appeared in the Recorder, it was thought by some they had been mislaid by some means, and at the suggestion of some of the friends of the resolutions, we sent a copy, as they passed the conference, signing our name in full.

But to the communication. The Bro. says, whatever can be done in opposition to slavery, short of breaking down the governments of the church and the country, he is willing to do. Thus far, we are one in sentiment. But says he, when measures are resorted to by brethren so ultra in their character and tendency as to leave us no government at all, he feels himself brought all up standing in the opposition. Well, we will try and lay the brother again. 1st. He begs the question in dispute; he takes for granted the very thing he ought to have proven. Why not show us wherein our resolutions would destroy all government? Come brother Scott, recollect we want more than mere assertion to sustain so grave a charge. I might say the crow was white but that would not make it so. Again.

The brother thinks we blundered egregiously by passing resolutions in a quarterly conference, on the subject of slavery, when the General Conference only left that subject with the people in their primary assemblies and Annual Conferences, and then argues that a quarterly conference is not a primary assembly, therefore we have transcended the bounds prescribed by the General Conference. Now, if we understand the brother's plan of doing business, he would have us right into popery or something like it, that is, the General Conference must tell the people and the quarterly conference what they shall and what they shall not pass resolutions on. Now, sir, we have yet to learn that the General Conference has the power to set itself up as a dictator in any such matter. If we know any thing about the government of the Methodist Protestant Church (and we think we do, although brother S. thinks we are scarce of brains,) it is this, a missionary commences his labors, organises a society, that society elects its own leader, another society is organized and they elect their leader, and so on, till a circuit is organized, and should these societies erect meeting houses, they elect their trustees, the quarterly conference is then composed of leaders and trustees with the ministers, preachers and exhorters; the quarterly conference thus composed then elects circuit stewards. Now, if this is not one of the primary assemblies of the people, we must confess it is hard to get one in our church. Does the brother contend that all the members in a circuit or Annual Conference must assemble in one place as a primary assembly, before they have a right to give their opinion on the moral character of slavery? Such a meeting is altogether impracticable and out of the ordinary way of doing business. One of the beauties of our economy consists in the people electing their own leaders, trustees, stewards, &c., and when elected, the people can tell them what they wish them to do, and when they want to speak out against slavery or any other evil, all they have to do, is to inform their leader, stewards, trustees, &c., either by petition or otherwise, and if their leaders, stewards, &c., will not do as they are requested, the membership can change them and thus have their wishes complied with. The quarterly conference, in turn, instructs her representative to the Annual Conference, and the Annual Conference her delegates to the General Conference, and we contend every delegate is bound to obey; Provided, the instructions are in accordance with the morality of the holy scriptures.

So, we think, brother Scott has placed the cart before the horse with a witness, and we think, moreover, that Bro. Scott puts rather low an estimate on the intelligence of a quarterly conference, when he says they are so apt to be controlled by ministerial influence, or that of a hard skull official member. The fact is, the report of the committee on slavery, making the system of American slavery a moral evil, was laid on the table, principally on the ground, that the people of the free States did not believe slave-holding to be a moral evil, and all that we wish is, that the members of the Methodist Protestant Church in the free States or elsewhere, would tell their next Gen'l. Conference, that they do believe it is a moral evil. And then, when the General Conference makes it a moral evil, our Discipline forbids it. The brother approves of the 1st. resolution, and also of the 2d, provided it was a little tighter worded. Now, admit the second, and we cannot see how the brother can find fault with the others; either slavery is a moral evil, or it is not. If it is not, why did not the brother show wherein it is consistent with the morality of the holy scriptures? If it is a moral evil, why keep it in the church? But, if we understand the brother, he admits slave-holding to be a moral evil, and yet, he is brought all up standing in the opposition against the 4th resolution, and as the brother has given a false quotation, we will give the resolution entire:

4th. Resolved, That in the opinion of this conference, the holding church fellowship and communion with those who barter the image of God and the souls for whom Christ died for money, is a great evil, and one which it is our duty, both as a church and as individuals to abandon.

Now, the conduct disclosed in the foregoing resolution, is a moral evil, or it is not; if any one says it is not, we defy them to prove that moral evil exists in our world. What, has it come to this, that brother John Scott believes that a brother in the M. P. Church, or any other, may enter the dwelling of a poor man, take his wife and drag her away from the embraces of her husband and sell her to another man, and if she refuses, uncover her body and apply the lash until the ground is sometimes reddened with her blood? Does brother Scott really believe that such a man ought to be in fellowship in the M. P. Church, or any other? Is he to be called an honest man in the sight of God and the church, who compels others to labor all their lives long, and yet, give them naught for their work? Can that man be tho't worthy of church fellowship who sells parents from children and children from parents, who sells husbands and wives apart (contrary to God's command) for money? If we understand brother Scott, this is his theory, for he says, we call on a division of the M. P. Church when we say, they ought to repent and abandon this evil, and if they will not repent and put away this abomination, we cannot fellowship them. This is the sum and substance of the whole matter.

But, oh, alas! alas! this brother would have us believe, that unless we fellowship those who make merchandise of God's image, the church will go to sticks and the fragments be scattered to the four winds of heaven, that other churches will follow in the wake of our waters and then the union will be desolved, J. Cary and his quarterly conference shouting on, on brethren, to the very last. Yes, and the only wonder is, that brother S. did not add, in conclusion, that then the sky would fall, which he might have done with about as much propriety, and all this because we do what God and our own discipline commands. God says, have no fellowship with the unfruitful workers of darkness, but rather reprove them; and our Discipline says, it is the duty of the ministers and members in the church, to maintain godliness and oppose all moral evil: A. 15th. Now, we are no little surprised that any bother in possession of as much brains as Bro. Scott would have us believe he is, should beg the question in such a manner. I might say that brother Scott was a wiser man than Solomon, and much better skilled in moral science than all the men that had ever lived on our globe, but all this would not make it true. So, neither will the assertion of brother Scott establish his doctrine without either argument or testimony. We do not believe that the M. P. Church would be driven to fragments and scattered as the brother supposes, because we wish to put slavery out of her pale. What, can it be possible, that the men who contended so manfully for the liberty of speech and the press in 1828, and who, rather than surrender either in the least degree, suffered themselves to be expelled from the M. E. Church while others withdrew, in order to form the M. P. Church, where liberty might reign! Can it be possible, that these are the very men that would blow up this Equal Rights, this republican principled Methodist Protestant Church, rather than cease making slaves of their brethren? Strange inconsistency, to organize a church on equal rights and then take away, not only the liberty of speech and the press, but all others, even the right of a man, either to himself, or his wife, or his children, and because we wish those rights which God has given, and of which, they have been robbed, restored. Why, forsooth, then we will rend the church in fragments and scatter it to the winds. No, sir, it cannot be possible the M.P.Church is not quite so inconsistent as brother S. would have us believe. Come, come, brother Scott, no more of your scare crows. Why, only think what a spectacle we would present to the world, after talking so loud and long about equal rights, &c., and then destroy the church because we cannot get liberty for the church to barter the image of God and the souls for whom Christ died for money. Away with such nonsense.

The 7th resolution Bro. S. thinks arrays the Church against the State, and very significantly asks, what if the State should array itself against the Church, would not the weakest go to the wall? and concludes the paragraph by saying in matters like these it is an utter scandal to act without brains; men must pay attention to the consequences of action unless they mean to renounce all claim to intelligence. Well, the same bible commands me to remember those in bonds as bound with them, also says, render not evil for evil, neither railing for railing. If Bro. Scott has got so much more brains and intelligence than his neighbors, we hope he will make better use of them in future then to justify the continuance of men and women slaves in the charge. I would just inform the brother, however, that it is our duty to do as God commands, and it is His perogative to take care of consequences. I must say my heart and soul is pained to hear men professing christianity, much less one occupying the station I understand Bro. Scott does, should advance the doctrine contained in the quotation. The doctrine is this, because we request all our brethren to unite with us in bearing their solemn and decided testimony against American slavery, and to adopt efficient measures for the entire banishment of it from the church, we have arrayed the Church against the State.—Now, Bro. Scott, has it come to this, that because wicked men hold slaves, and barter them for gold and silver, and sometimes for horses, hogs and cattle, and the State upholds them in so doing, that we must do so in the Church? or must we wait for the State to take the lead of the Church in morality, in order to avoid the charge of arraying the Church against the State? When did we ever read of the State being more holy than the Church? Does not Bro. Scott know that the church is the salt of the earth? Does he not know that the church ought to take the lead in all moral reforms? Does he not know that the church was instituted to do away moral evil? and this is not all, the brother's doctrine denies the over-ruling providence of God, because he says we must look at consequences, as much as to say to the Supreme Ruler of the universe, Oh! Lord, it will not do to act as you command, because the consequences will be thus and so. When did the brother ever read of God permitting Church or Nation to be punished for doing justly and loving mercy? but on the contrary, have not all Churches and Nations that have suffered been punished in this way for their cruelty and oppression? According to the brother's doctrine, Daniel did very wrong because did not obey the State, so with the three Hebrews, so with Paul and Silas, with all the apostles and martyrs and Martin Luther, with almost all reformers. The Lord pity us, if Bro. S.'s doctrine be true, we have almost all been doing wrong. But, thank the good Lord, the doctrine is not true. Strange that Bro. Scott should forget that the Lord reigns, and if we do His commandments He can over-rule every thing right. We wish to be fairly understood, we must obey God rather than man. God says, as ye would that man should do unto you do you even so unto them. Now, if I and my wife and children were in slavery I should wish all men to do all they could do to secure our freedom; I should wish the ministers and members of the church to take the matter up, and tell our masters if they do not break every yoke and let the oppressed go free, they could not be in church fellowship. I should then be glad if the State Legislatures would take up the matter and repeal the law by which we were held slaves. Now, as a member of the church of Christ, it is my duty to do all in my power to have this abomination put out of the church, and as God in His providence has placed in us a church where our voice can be heard through her councils, a tremendous responsibility is ours, and who can think under such circumstances of taking sides with the oppressor?

But the brother says we cannot reach the conscience of the slaveholder either by verbal or written arguments, all this is hopeless. If this be the case, how does the brother expect to work good to all classes and colors in our country?—Indeed, I cannot see how the conscience of any wicked man can be reached so long as you tell him he is good enough to be admitted to communion at the Lord's table. Who would ever think of repenting under such preaching as this? But this is not so,—we can reach their conscience, as hundreds of them can testify. Read Dr. Bresbine's letter, late of South Carolina, now Cincinnati, with scores of others I might name. Bad as we think the slaveholders are, we will not believe them as bad as Bro. Scott says they are. But the brother says it is a political hobby, and therefore calls on the church to surrender the whole matter to the civil citizens. Now, does the brother really expect the civil citizens to purify the church of Christ? It would seem so from his epistle. Well, we have not so learned Christ. It does seem strange that men of intelligence should blunder so egregiously. What, sir, not put slavery out of the church till after the State has compelled us by law! strange, indeed.—Now, bro. Scott, here is the whole matter, as members of the church it is our duty to use our influence to put slavery out of the church. But you say, if we do we only multiply voters and petitioners.—Well, suppose we admit it, must we therefore cease our exertion in the church least the civil citizen should finely put slavery out of the State? Must we not discuss the subject of slavery in ecclesiastical councils least some one might be lead to believe that slavery was wrong in the State as well as the Church.

For my part, I have been no little surprised to hear men advocate the doctrine that whenever any subject on which the church had formerly acted became in any manner connected with politics, then the church must surrender the whole matter to the politician, or if she does not, the mad dog cry of political hobby must be raised against her, just as though a man must serve the Lord in the church, and then the devil in politics. What inconsistency would an individual manifest, that would strive to put down a moral evil in the church, and pray God to hasten the time when vice and immorality may be banished from our world, and then rise from his knees and go and vote for a Congressman or a representative in the State Legislature, when they know at the same time that that individual will frame mischief by law. Therefore, as a christian, it is my duty to espouse no principle but what is in accordance with the bible, and then it is my duty to carry that principle with me wherever I go.—Who ever thought that because he voted to put slavery out of the State, that he was disqualified to vote that slavery should go out of the Church also?

As for the brother's dislikes, I dislike them as much as he does, and one more to the back of them. I don't like to see the church of Christ slumbering in the adulterous bed of slaveholding.

One item more and we are done: the brother says the Union will be dissolved, and pray, who will dissolve it, certainly not the abolitionists? they do not wish it dissolved. If it should be attempted, it must be by the slaveholders and their emisaries. Well, what will they dissolve it for? why to keep the people from talking about slavery. Now, will this accomplish the object? We shall see. One great object of the slaveholders has been to keep down discussion, and prevent pamphlets going south, least the middling class should be converted, and then they would be for having their laws repealed. Now, a proposition to dissolve the Union would set the people all talking. Why, McDuffy, J. C. Calhoun, and all you big folks at Washington city, what are going to dissolve the Union for? Why, to keep the abolitionists from talking about slavery. Why, what are they saying?—They are saying slavery is wrong, that it is wicked to buy and sell as we do.—This would lead to an universal discussion throughout the South, and therefore do the very thing the abolitionist wish—Investigation, honest and candid, is all that is wanting to upset slavery. Again, according to our constitution, should a slave escape from his master to a free State, all the master has to do is to prove property, pay charges and take him away, but the moment the Union is dissolved every slave who crosses the line to a free State is as free as though he had stepped on British soil. Again, according to the United States constitution should the slaves rise in insurrection, we of the free States are bound to bid our families farewell, shoulder our muskets & march south to fight the insurgent slaves, but the very moment the South sets up for themselves, no man is bound to move one step in this matter. Again, should the South secede from the Union, all a foreign enemy would have to do would be to land a small fleet on the southern coast, with plenty of arms and ammunition and proclaim liberty to every slave that would join the standard, and the South could not stand. Yes, Bro S., we have no doubt but the small island of Hati could take the South in six months if she was cut off from all protection from the North. Now, does Bro. Scott or any sane man believe that the people of the South are so foolish as to throw away all these bulwarks and safeguards, which the present constitution throws round them? No, sir, they are not such fools, and all this talk about dissolving the Union, &c. is only to carry their point by threats when they fail in argument; we do not believe they have any more notion of dissolving the Union then I have of cutting off my head, because the former would be as sure death to them as the latter would to me. The whole matter is too much like a spoiled child, who says, mammy, give me such and such a thing, or if you do not I will kill myself, or like we farmers sometimes do, when the crows get to pulling up the corn, we get an old pair of pantaloons, with an old coat and hat, stuff them with straw, set them up in the field and make the poor crows believe if they come near they are a gone case, whereas if they knew there is not the least danger, and it is not a little amusing to see some men as fraid of the slaveholders' scare crow as the crows are of ours.

Upon a review of the whole matter, we think Bro. Scott has not examined the matter fully, or he would not have written in the manner he has done, and we would be very happy to have an interview with him, either in a private conversation or oral discussion, and in order that he may know where to find me, either personally or by letter, I subscribe myself,

Very respectfully,

JOHN CAREY, JR.

But is it such a stretch of charity? I wish the nere, to remember, that I have in no e, avowed nor attempted the defence of d political party of which he speaks. I tended that slavery is a moral and a poli- il,—that it ought to be abolished, and is the duty of all, to use all just and means for its final extermination; but no instance dictated measures, farther ree and thorough discussion of it in all ings and tendencies. And yet, he thinks , "laughable" and a "great stretch of " &c., that I did not, from the first, un- d him as having charged me with trying up a third political party, &c.; in a word, did not, from the first, understand him to te to me, principles which I had not avow- assumed to defend.

y last, I assured the gentleman that I ined nothing new on this subject, and myself to prove it; but at this, he became dignant, and flies to his newly invented uge, "political action in churches," &c. y this kind of quibbling, he has driven me conclusion, that from the first, he has ntentionally misrepresented me, or is so ith prejudice against abolition, that it is cessary for him to hear a word said in op- a to slavery, to enable him to jump at the ion, that a third political party is meant. s it come to this, Mr. Editor, that in our testimony against slavery, we must manifest our abhorrence of abolition, or se be charged with striving to get up a olitical party, of contending for political in churches, and of using the pulpit and ligious press to promote the election of fficers? Verily, this is a strange state of ! Indeed, sir, it appears to me, the way rn conservatives try to sustain themselves r opposition to slavery and abolition, "is ry complimentary to their heads or their one or the other." I have thought, al we might all unite in our opposition to sla- pon general principles, each operating in a way, according to his best convictions t, for its final overthrow. Smith, himself; and I will say farther, vast majority of the most influential abo- sts are decidedly opposed to the third al party. It is right to detect and expose thers wrongs; yet it does appear to me, ll this contention and flouncing about on measures and abolition movements, too much like leaving a drowning man to le and perish in the waters, while those on are very gravely and benevolently engaged ussing the easiest method of getting him Let all who believe that slavery is wrong, work, in the fear of God, to remove it, and by their works, whose measures are most nd efficient.

discussing his main question, I had no ref- to the opinions of any party, whatever entiments there maintained, are my own, believe them. Nor do I consider his remarks tation. He wishes to make it appear, y second argument would lead to a union of Church and State; as well might he arrive at the same conclusion, from the fact, that both Church and State oppose swearing, gambling, duelling, &c. Come, my friend, quiet your fears. Your conflict is with "phantoms" of your own imagination. I do assure you, that I am as much opposed to a union of Church and State as your worthy self.

His apology, with regard to the expression, "Turn him out to beat the bush," &c., is so disingenuous, as to be almost unworthy of serious notice. Such twisting is but an effort to make the impression, that I am not willing to take common fare with my brethren. I feel confident, however, that an examination of the past, and I trust, the conduct of my future life, will prove all such insinuations utterly unworthy of confidence and meriting the unqualified censure of all upright and honorable minds. I am afraid, my dear sir, that instead of your being actuated by a benevolent regard for my usefulness, the truth is—just the contrary.

As for the epithet "Agitator," it is but "real political trickery," when one's craft is in danger, to fix some offensive epithet upon an opponent, and raise the shout, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" &c. And just so, we are met by northern conservatives. They raise the shout, agitate! agitate!! He is an "AGITATOR!!"—He wants to get up a third political party! He is even contending for political action in church, and will be likely to unite Church and State, &c., &c!!! This pitiful conduct may do for the present to excite prejudice against a good cause and thereby prevent an impartial hearing for a time, but in the view of all thinking and judicious men will re-act with more than redoubled force against the cause requiring it.

In conclusion, I repeat that all for which I have contended, both as to the evil of slavery and the right to discuss it, has been admitted on the part of J. Smith. The only matter at issue now, is the propriety of discussing the slavery question in the Recorder. Hence, the reader will perceive, whether my mind, or that of my friend, has been beclouded with a dense "fog." He has attributed principles to me which I had not avowed, and then very gravely employed himself in demonstrating their absurdity.—Sure, this is quite an exhibition of the philanthrophy and greatness of our Sugar Grove friend! As for the charge of pressing this discussion into the columns of the Recorder, it is, to say the least of it—unjust. If he wishes to show that the Recorder should not permit the discussion of slavery in its columns, let him call the Annual Conference to account, for having the temerity to pledge itself to sustain a periodical, one object of which was to be the discussion of the slavery question.

Did not the friends of a western periodical, urge its establishment on the ground, that the Church Paper was pledged to silence on this subject? And are we to be considered intruders simply for carrying out the original objects of the paper? If I am an agitator, I am in company with all who voted to sustain the Recorder.

Yours, truly, &c.,
JOEL DALBEY, JR.

THE CHURCH—ABOLITION—POLITICS.

Mr. Editor:—Suppose a band of robbers had secured to themselves a fortress and by means of its protection, were enabled to carry on their depredations upon society, in greater security and with greater success, and suppose some well disposed citizens were in a legal manner, and in the discharge of duty, to beseige the fort in view of its demolition, would not those who attacked the beseiging party, whether from within, or without the fortress, be justly regarded as doing so, for the purpose of defending it? Those also, who discountenanced and embarrassed in every possible way the efforts of the attacking party, though they make no forcible or violent opposition, should they not too also be regarded as the friends of the robbers? their conduct bearing witness, even though they should reiterate the proclamation, "I am as much opposed to the practice as any body, but * * * *!!"—Why do men attack abolition, and by every possible device, obstruct its progress, if they are not really the friends of slavery? Why, but to preserve slavery, or secure the favor or patronage of slaveholders?

Suppose the question, whether the advocates of slavery, or the advocates of abolition are right, to be undecided; there can be no question as to the egregious inconsistency of the man who attempts to oppose both. With just as much show of consistency may a man contend, that any two moral opposites are both right, or both wrong, as that slavery and its abolition are both wrong. But those who place themselves in this ridiculous attitude, generally manifest their opposition to slavery by 'soft words,' and their opposition to abolition by heaping approbious epithets upon its advocates and urging false charges against them, and very frequently by violent brute force. Now, when men, who profess to see, and to abhor the wickedness of slavery, and at the same time manifest great zeal against its discussion, and great solicitude that ministers and the press should be silent in relation to it, and upon every introduction of the subject, raise a blustering ado about 'imprudence,' 'intermedling,' &c., charity is compelled to conclude that they are wofully blinded by prejudice, or else give up that they are so corrupt in principle as to volunteer their hypocritical advocacy of human oppression! It is not my object to enter upon the inquiry in this communication, what is slavery? or to describe the exceeding turpitude there is in the crime of reducing 'Gods image' into a 'chattel personal,' so much as to maintain, what I understand to be the duty of ministers and of churches in relation to the subject.

1. I believe that no sensible man has, and no honest man can, urge as an objection to the investigation of this subject, its small importance. Some of your correspondents have raised objections to its discussion in the Recorder, and to ministers having any participation in the anti-slavery enterprize, and between you, Mr. Editor, and those correspondents, there seems to be an agreement of sentiment, and whatever effect they may succeed in producing by the sophistical and ridiculous objection of "meddling with politics," "indiscretion," &c. they will never succeed with the objection, that it is a subject of minor importance. True, "the neglect of paramount duties," has been indicated in the Recorder as a charge against those who have publicly taken part with the oppressed, but it was a slanderous insinuation, without either specification or evidence.

There is perhaps no evil more frequently denounced in the word of God or threatened with sorer or more certain punishment than the oppressions of slavery. Against it God has revealed his wrath from heaven, in flaming colors; and the history of every slaveholding nation, is but an illustration of the Divine forbearance and the unfailing truth of Divine revelation. The abolition of slavery, or in other words, the immediate repentance and reformation from this crying evil, is as fully and plainly taught in the Bible, and with as powerful sanctions as any other christian doctrine. Slavery being an admitted evil, its immediate abandonment, is as plain and important a doctrine as regeneration, sanctification or future rewards and punishments. A doctrine which operates to disenthral millions—to raise them from the deepest degradation and impart to all the 'key of knowledge' and the 'word of life;'—to bring three million of the most destitute and benighted heathen, in our midst, to the enjoyment of the blessings of civilization, christianity and eternal life, is certainly one of solemn magnitude, which it becomes the church and all her ministers, by every appropriate means, to urge upon the understanding and consciences of the community. I have heard preachers speak contemptuously of abolition and declare their want of interest in the subject, but it has only demonstrated to my mind, their own want of sympathy for human wo and their deficiency in moral sense.

2. Is the church to be indifferent, the religious press muzzled and ministers silent on this subject? Are they to declaim against all other species of wickedness and urge instant reformation, but barter for popular favor an indulgence in this heinous crime.

"Scorn my tongue such guilty silence."

Had the church kept herself unstained from this crime, and had the proper christian means, been always faithfully used for its prevention in this country, the evil would not have obtained its present hideous growth and alarming maturity. And so long as ministers and the religious press connive at the practice, and christians engage in it, and christian churches sanction it and sanctify it at their alters, the iniquity will abound, bringing ruin on the country,—a ruin which even now slumbereth not. It is worthy of our remark, that the Prophets and Apostles, were sent to bear their testimony against legalized, popular and national sins, and their example in this respect, when taken in connection with the binding force of the many plain precepts, furnished in the word of God on this subject, makes it most certainly and clearly, the special duty of the church, her ministers and her periodicals, to proclaim an unequivocal testimony against this evil,—to wash them from all its polutions. and urge upon all concerned in it, immediate reformation, and most fervently deprecate the threatened judgments of Almighty God. But alas! few are willing to imitate their example, or obey the Divine precepts in declaring the whole council of God. It is very seldom, indeed, that any popular vice is now declared against by the church, or her ministers; and when an instance occurs of a man risking the bold discharge of plain duty, in relation to slavery, the cry of 'imprudence,' 'indiscretion,' &c. is echoed back from Sugar Grove to Meadow Farm; the Recorder carries it out through the land with reiterated effort to fix the impression that the man is "an agitator" or has some "political design."

If the organ of the Western Conferences, is compelled into criminal silence on this subject, or, the weight of its influence is made to bear against the righteous principles of the gospel, when it is attempted to apply them to slavery, it will afford evidence of the lamentable fact that the Methodist Protestant Church notwithstanding all her boasting of 'mutual rights,' and all her thunders against priestly proscription and ecclesiastical tyranny, is herself the willing and abject slave of a corrupt public sentiment.

3. As to the political bearings and connections of the abolition question; it is manifestly true, that it is a political as well as a religious enterprize. Slavery like all other crimes, must be abolished by political as well as by religious action: and I hold it to be indisputably right, and a plain duty for every christian and citizen to exercise political as well as moral action, to suppress wickedness and establish justice and righteousness in the land. Besides every kind of moral or religious agency in the world, must necessarily have some kind of political influence, or bearing: must therefore every kind of benevolent enterprize be abandoned, because of this necessary tendency: must slavery, with all its horrid host of attendant evils, be suffered to exist unheeded and unchecked, because opposition to it may assume a political aspect? must christian duty be neglected and sin be unrebuked, and the commandments of God violated, because obedience may effect a political party by influencing the polls? are men really in their senses, when they insist on such ridiculous absurdities?

Every kind of political means are resorted to, for the support of slavery and to prevent its abolition; and yet the friends of the latter, cannot use the same means to counteract this corruption, without bringing on themselves, the charge, of "mingling politics and religion."—The right of suffrage, is an important trust committed unto us, by Providence for good and not for evil, and no better motive can influence any man, to the conscientious exercise of this right, for good, at the polls, than the overthrow of slavery. It is urged that "when the anti-slavery society was organized, it proposed to procure the abolition of slavery, by moral reasoning, AND ASKED THE CHURCH TO CO-OPERATE WITH IT FOR THIS OBJECT!" but now "having passed a resolution to question candidates at elections, and vote for none but abolitionists," and "a distinct political organization being on the way;" therefore "the church should not act in her official organs upon the subject." (See Recorder, June 3d, 1840.) Strange logic! The enemies of abolition, viz. the friends of slavery, have driven the anti-slavery society ('not from its original ground,' but,) into the necessity of extending its operations to the polls, as the only redress against the flagrant outrage of their constitutional rights. Therefore, the church ought not to act in her official organs against a moral evil; or, in other words, because the men composing "an organization distinct from both church and state," have resolved not to vote against their own principles, therefore the church should not publicly oppose what her founder (Rev. J. Wesley) most justly terms, "a complication of all villainies." What power and demonstration! O ye official organs, 'Protestant,' 'Luminary,' 'Olive Branch,' 'Banner' and 'Recorder,' now be silent! and thou 'Review' say nothing, for verily these abolitionists, have became so perverted and wild, that while they labor "to procure the abolition of slavery by moral reasoning," they have resolved that they will not support it by their votes!

But the sober and plain truth is, that the treatment which the subject, and its advocates have received from the national and several of the state legislatures; the contemptuous, and unconstitutional rejection of their petitions, and the repetition of legislative insult and abuse, have produced the necessity for a stern resort to the polls. The State of Ohio, is disgraced before all the civilized world, with statutes in her code, enacted, not two years since, imposing fine and imprisonment on men for doing that which the law of God and humanity enjoins, and for the neglect of which they will be condemned in the final judgment. See Matt. xxv. 45, 46. And yet, shall not 'the church in her official organs,' and by her ministers, speak out against such legislative corruptions? Nay, we must not declare openly against such wickedness at the peril of "destroying our usefulness;" verily, we are fallen upon degenerate times.

Let it not be inferred, that I identify myself with "a third" or any other political party, further than it identifies itself with the plain principle of the glorious gospel, "as you would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." But while I consider the organization of a distinct political party by a comparatively few abolitionist in the east as beneath the dignity of their holy enterprise, and highly inexpedient, I feel bound, in the absence of all evidence, to regard the charge of political design, for mere party purposes, even when applied to that organization, or any portion of it, as contemptibly false, I am persuaded, that it embraces some of the best of men, who have been actuated in this measure by the purest of motives.

Yours, in the cause of universal, rational liberty,
JNO. CLARK.

OBITUARY.

For the Western Recorder.

Brother JAMES ROSE departed this life, May 25th, 1840, aged 44 years and two months. He has left a wife and family of eight children to lament their great loss.

Brother Rose was a preacher sixteen years; the nine first in the old connexion, then duty prompted him to unite with the M. P. Church to promote, as he frequently said, the common cause of the Redeemer, even when much against his worldly interest. He joined our itinerant ranks, seven years ago, in good standing and beloved by all, and has ever since been an indefatigable laborer in the vineyard of the Lord,—has made sacrifices every year, more or less, to keep up his family, until little worldly goods, if any, is now left to their support. When he was requested to locate for his family's welfare, although he had a very tender regard for them, his heart was fixed in the duties of the ministry and he resolved to be about his Master's business.

Bro. Rose was beloved by every good person who knew him. His uniformly mild and unassuming deportment, his great charity and kindness to all his neighbors, his moral life, with his great care for his charge and anxiety for the prosperity of Zion generally, like an elevated light, was manifest all around.

Last fall, Bro. Rose was much afflicted by the whooping cough, which the whole winter and spring, so oppressed his lungs as to make it very difficult for him to preach and much endangered his health. He was often persuaded to take rest and recruit his health; but, as he had a strong constitution, he was still supported under a weight of disease and enabled to labor, though with difficulty, until his last round; when forty or more miles from his family, he sunk in the pulpit, was taken to the house of a friend and in some six days reached home.

I was then called to see him, found him almost past speaking, his head and face very much swollen, with a heavy weight of action to the brain and inflamation of the left lobe of the lungs. I was with him all night, used bleeding, emetics and cathartics freely, with Diaphoretics, next morning the swelling was much reduced, head easy and speech more natural; when he remarked in substance, as follows: My dear brother Newton, I have preached my last round; I have had a weight of difficulty since I last saw you; my enemy has oppresed me sorely; that grand enemy, B. G——— has deceived me more than any other of the acquaintances of my life. He has strove hard to hedge up my way, which has caused me to travel and preach when I ought to have been in bed taking medicine. Strange creature in the form of man! But I'll forgive him. Let God reward him. I have strove hard to, and thank God, in most places, have overcome his stratagems. God has blessed me with liberty, and in general, with good congregations, and some souls converted and many precious seasons, notwithstanding the opposition which has brought me to this. But I must give up my charge now; I have been driven beyond my strength. But, glory to God, I am happy; my trust is in the Redeemer; I have felt more than ever engaged the past few months, but if I must depart, I yield to the will of God. But my family ——! And for a while, said no more. In a few moments, he said: were it not for my family and charge, I am ready to depart. Religion never seemed so good before. Poor Bro. Joseph, he is my oldest brother, he once knew what religion was, but now he is in the gall of bitterness. If I do not see him, tell him to prepare to meet me in heaven.

On my next visit, he seemed something better, or rather easier. We had a little encouragement, but he still thought he should not raise, gave a more minute history of the conduct of his enemy, which I forbare to relate now, and still said this was the cause of his extreme illness. He lingered some ten days when the abscess opened and he was not able to expectorate the puss, and soon died, leaving abundant testimony of his preparation for the haven of rest. The loss to his family, the loss to the church and to community, is great.

Higginsport, June 18, 1840.

N. B.—Brother Springer: I am requested to say, that our last, or third quarterly conference, in view of the death of Bro. Rose, invited Bro. David Hannah to attend to the circuit until conference. He has been one round, and finding Bro. Rose deceased, wishes this mode taken to ask the President's sanction to the proceedings of conference. Bro. H. says, in many places, the prospects are good, attentive congregations and some increase.

TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN IRELAND.

Ballston Centre, May 18, 1840.

To the Editor of the Argus—

DEAR SIR,—The Temperance movement is still onward in Ireland, and the interest in it, instead of diminishing is rapidly increasing, and spreading over the whole country.—From a Dublin paper just received, we learn that Father Matthew continued to go from place to place, administering the pledge, and that the people appear ready en masse to promise everlasting abstinence from all that can intoxicate.

In the city of Dublin, 60,000 took the pledge in one week. In Loughrea and neighborhood, 51,460. In Portuma, 30,000 took the pledge the first day of Mr. Matthew's visit, and 50,000 in the second, making in all 80,000: many of the higher classes. Protestant as well as Catholic, united. As Mr. Matthew was to leave this place at half past six, A. M., he was engaged from day-light of the third day till the time of his departure, in administering the pledge to thousands who had not taken it on the two previous days. The paper states "that between Galway and Loughrea, and the road to Portuma, from 180,000 to 200,000 persons took the pledge."

In these vast assemblages not a single accident of any kind occurred, nor was a drunken man seen. The plan for administering the pledge, and ascertaining the number of those who received it, was, to assemble them in regular ranks. Says an eye witness at one of these places, "As Father Matthew recited the words of the pledge, I was at a loss, whether to admire more the morality of the sight or its solemnity, for the pledge was at the same time repeated by the lips of 7,650 on their knees."

Of the 800,000 persons to whom Father Matthew has administered the pledge, within a few months, not one has yet been known to have broken it, or to have been brought before a tribunal of justice for any criminal offence. Whenever this extraordinary man administers the pledge, he admonishes the people of the nature of the promise they are about to make, and the inviolability with which it should be observed. He exhorts them while casting off the yoke of intemperance, to abandon also every other vice, such as rioting, faction, fighting, private combinations, illegal oaths, taking of fire arms, serving threatening notices &c. &c. He exhorts them also to forget religious animosities, to live in peace with all, to observe the laws of God and man, to respect the powers that be, not from fear, but for conscience sake.

The following petition has been presented to the House of Commons, by Daniel O'Connell. The people of Great Britain begin to tremble in view of their responsibilities in raising a revenue, by commissioning about 100,000 individuals throughout the kingdom to bring crime, pauperism and untold burthens upon the whole community. It has been estimated that the three kingdoms of Great Britain suffer a yearly loss directly or indirectly of at least £200,000,000, or about 1,000,000,000 of dollars from the traffic in, and use of intoxicating drinks.

To the hon. and right honorable, the Commons of Great Britain, in Parliament assembled:

Respectfully prayeth—

That your honorable house will be pleased to take into immediate and serious consideration the propriety of a complete relinqishment of all duties arising from intoxicating drinks. The use of these articles is confessedly productive of an immense amount of crime, misery, disease and destitution. In fact it is only necessary to refer to your police, magistrates, governors of prisons, &c., in order to be satisfied that a very large proportion of the crime committed in the United Kingdom is owing to the use of these drinks.—The deep misery and the deplorable destitution which they cause, can never be known except by the SOVEREIGN LORD OF ALL. Your petitioners, therefore, implore your honorable house no longer to raise any revenue for the support of the British empire from this polluted source. By refusing to touch such unholy proceeds you would brand the traffic in intoxicating drinks, as too disgraceful to receive profit from it. It would in consequence soon be given up by honorable men, and the noble efforts now making by the people to get free from their drinking customs, would receive such encouragement from your honorable house as would strengthen them in their virtuous resolves. Your petitioners respectfully pray that no consideration of loss of revenue may induce you to refuse granting this prayer. Your honorable house can readily devise other sources from which any loss can be supplied, and which will not be stained by the blood and the tears of thousands, who are annually destroyed by drinking customs."

It is the social drinking usage of Ireland, that has done so much to injure the people. Solitary drunkenness is hardly known in the country. But not to treat, and be treated, has heretofore been considered as showing a want of kind and liberal feelings. It is from this great mistake that the Irish people have been all but destroyed. But thanks to the light recently shed upon this pernicious custom, by Father Matthew, the habits of the mass are being changed, and it is no longer such a fearful thing in Ireland to refuse to treat or be treated. Once an Irishman would sooner face the cannon's mouth, than refuse to drink with a friend; and I would ask many of my own countrymen whether it is not from a like feeling, rather than from a love of intoxicating drinks, that they still keep the wine bottle on their tables, and that too, often to ruin their children?

Respectfully, yours,
E. C. DELEVAN.

POLITICAL CLERGYMEN.—When ministers so far meddle and interfere in political strifes as to become imprudent, prejudiced partizans, it is evident that the pastor will be lost in the politician, and his moral influence will be utterly consumed in the fierce fires of party passions. In the parlor, in the sick chamber, in the pulpit, at the table of the Lord, he will be regarded only as the head of his party. In the reflections of his people there will be strange recollections of the politician mingling with and blasting the reputation of the pastor. However loud may be the plaudits with which the public may greet his ear, alas! his eye will perceive, when he enters the sanctuary, sorrow on the countenances of his people and tears stealing down the cheeks of the faithful. Sighs will fall upon his ear, issuing from bosoms agonized by his conduct. Coming from scenes of political strife, and agitated by earthly passions, he shrinks from the solemnity, stillness, and spirituality of God's presence and worship in his temple. The fire on the altar of devotion burns dimly: no incense arises; no cloud descends; he performs his duties officially, but not effectively, and hurries from the place which condemns him, because the life, the spirit, the unction of devotion were wanting. Whatever he has gained in the world, he has lost in the church. Whatever he has acquired in political popularity, has been at the sacrifice of his spirituality. Character, piety, influence, have been offered up on the political altar to the idol which his party have set up, while he himself has fallen down and worshipped the god of this world; and verily he has his reward!—Lond. Cong. Mag.

ATTACK ON HEDDINGTON, LIBERIA.—On 15th of March an attack was made by about 100 natives, under a chief named Gotherah, upon the Methodist missionary station at Heddington, [King Tom's town.] After an hour's fighting the assailants were repulsed, with the loss of their leader and 30 or 40 men, which achievement was effected chiefly by two Methodist missionaries and two natives, converts. The village contains fifty-two houses.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

WESTERN RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

WEDNESDAY, ... JULY 8, 1840.

PIRACY AND MURDER.—The following information, furnished by a resident of Havana, contains full particulars of the loss of the British brig Vernon, and her capture by pirates, on the 1st of May, 1840, together with a list of the crew saved and those murdered.—Charleston Patriot.

The British brig Vernon left Jamaica the 26th of April, for Halifax, with a cargo of 85 puncheons of rum, and a crew consisting of James Cunningham master, and John M'Cloud mate, residents of Halifax; George M'Coy, Benjamin Peach, Edward Norton and James Tyler, (colored man) cook. On the 1st of May, at 10 A. M. Cape Antonio, bearing south of west, three leagues distant, a boat was seen coming from the shore and making for the brig. At first sight, the Captain supposing it to be filled with some shipwrecked seamen, he bore down for it, but the wind being light, there was but little progress made. On the proximity of the brig to the boat, the latter was discovered to contain seven men, armed with muskets and knives. When within reach of their shots, they poured volley after volley at the brig's crew, who were obliged to retreat below, with the exception of the mate and one seaman, who took refuge behind the masts. Here they remained without any hopes of life, except by quiet submission, (for there were no arms on board,) until the pirates came alongside; when, by a motion to go below, made by the waving of the hand of one of the pirates, they too reluctantly went below, and thus left the decks clear for the pirates, who immediately boarded and ordered the Captain to come on deck.

On the Captain obeying their command, one of them stated that a Spanish man-of-war was lying in the river, and had sent for their papers. They next ordered the flag to be hoisted and the vessel steered for the land, which was done, and at night the brig was anchored in shore, close to a fisherman's hut. The sails were clued up and the crew ordered aloft to furl them. After this was done, they conducted each one as he came from aloft and confined them all together in the forecastle, and closed it tight. In about one hour and a half they opened the scuttle and ordered them on deck. On reaching the deck they found an addition to the pirate's gang of four fishermen, who, with the first, were eating and drinking. The crew were then allowed something to eat. During the whole night a strict watch was kept by the pirates, and no one was allowed to approach them.

The next morning they ordered the crew to get the brig under way; and, after the sails were set, they steered the vessel about ten miles along the coast to where a river discharged itself into the sea. Up this river they conducted the brig about six miles inland. The name of the river is Panio del Rio. Here they ran the brig ashore and ordered the crew to discharge the cargo. They compelled Capt. Cunningham to assist in discharging, although he was feeble from age.—When the cargo was out, they ordered the Captain and three of the crew into their boat, which already had five pirates in it. The pirates told them all that they were not going to kill them, but, were going to get ballast for the brig. They made the sailors row the boat, and when about four gun shots from the brig, the work of death began, by one of the pirates in the bow of the boat stabbing the cook in the heart. This was about four o'clock, and the signal they had to commence the massacre was the order to cease rowing. After killing the cook, they threw his body overboard, and then stabbed him again while in the water. At this moment young Peach sprang overboard and made for the shore, among the mangrove bushes, in which he secreted himself. Once he looked back, and saw the Captain's head over the gunwale of the boat, and saw the pirates cutting his throat. The body of another sailor (Edward Norton, of Eastport, Me.) was hanging lifeless athwart the boat.

Young Peach, after thus escaping from their hands, had travelled ten miles through mangrove bushes part of the time, and swimming the remainder. He was stripped as they all were by the pirates, of every thing but their pantaloons. Hence, his feet were continually bleeding from the cuts he received on the coral rocks. During this long period he had nothing to subsist on but a wild pidgeon he killed with a stick on the second morning, in the mangrove bushes. Still he wandered on sucking the blood and eating the flesh of this bird. At last he saw a small schooner sailing along the coast, but it growing dark he soon lost sight of her. Here he slept all night; and on the morrow saw with mistrust the schooner had reached in shore, and fearing he was about to fall into the hands of some of the same gang, he hesitated a moment, but such was his miserable condition from starvation and thirst, and the heat of the sun on his bare body, that he had rather die than continue such a miserable existence—he therefore swam off to the schooner and threw himself upon his knees and begged for life and water.—The Captain not understanding him, but supposing he was a cast-away sailor, took care of him, and by signs made him understand he was safe.

After seeing the unfortunate man attended to, captain Antonio Peloso, the worthy commander of the schooner, coasted along shore in search of the vessel supposed to be wrecked. When within six miles of Cape Antonio, he landed at the spot which the English sailor pointed out, thinking that the vessel was there, and having no suspicion of pirates. On captain Peloso's landing he was met by seven pirates and four fishermen, who threatened his life, but by artifice he deceived them and gained their confidence. From him he gained the intelligence of an English brig having been taken, and part of their crew murdered, that two were still alive, but would soon be put to death. It was now that the brave Spanish Don Antonio Peloso determined to save these unfortunates or die in the attempt. He gave the pirates three muskets and invited them to breakfast with him on the morrow, but before leaving them he sought an opportunity of seeing the two sailors who were in their power and still alive. The pirate captain said, that after murdering the captain and part of the crew, he reserved the rest to paint their boat and mend their sails—that now the work was done, and to-morrow they must die. In order to gain greater confidence with the pirates, captain Antonio Peloso informed them that he had picked up on the coast an English sailor, who probably had escaped from this vessel, and to-morrow when they came off to breakfast they should have him. Thus they parted for the night. On the morrow, the pirates, faithful to their engagements, came on board captain Peloso's schooner to breakfast, and a signal given he and his crew rushed upon them and secured the whole that came off in the boat. After confining them, captain P. manned his boat and went ashore and took the two pirates who were guarding the two sailors, prisoners. There then was a scene beyond the power of pen to describe. The liberator and liberated rushing into each others arms. The pirates and four fishermen are now safe in the Punta prison, and next week will suffer death.

SINGULAR FRAUD.—A most singular case came before the Circuit Court in Ontario county recently, as reported in the Repository. The plaintiff was the young widow of Oscar F. Crittenden, the defendants the brothers of deceased. The suit was brought by the widow to obtain possession of a farm the property of her late husband, which she claimed as the heir at law of a child born after the death of her husband, which died before the commencement of the suit. The defendants denied her right as heir, but were willing to admit her right to dower. The husband of the plaintiff, who was a ward in Chancery, as a common drunkard, died in October, 1837, of delirium tremens, having been married about two years.

The child, it was alleged, was born in July, 1838, and lived eight days only.—The most plain and conclusive evidence of the birth was sworn to by Dr. Kimer, a physician of Geneva, and the mother and sister of the deceased, who testified that they were present at the birth, and a respectable neighbor of the party testified that she was there a moment after. Evidence was also introduced to show the condition of the widow Crittenden, previous to the 17th, the birth day of the little innocent who came into the world but to prove her mother's property, fulfilled her mission, and departed.

Thus far all seemed incontrovertible, but the counsel for defendants insisted that the whole story was false. A middle aged man, captain of a canal boat was introduced as evidence for the defence, who testified that in the spring of 1838, he discovered that a female, a servant on board his boat was in a delicate situation—that he applied to Dr. Kimer for assistance, and for secresy, on his own account, being a married man, and on account of the girl. It was shown by this testimony that Dr. K. took charge of this delicate business. It was proved by the girl that she was concealed in the house of the widow Crittenden—and that, on the identical 17th of July, she there gave birth to a child. Cross examination of the witnesses showed also pretty conclusively that the indications of Mrs. Crittenden's assumed situation became first strikingly apparent about the time that the negociations were pending between the Doctor and the canal captain.

This evidence was entirely unexpected by the plaintiff and her party, who came into court in the full belief that their great secret was unknown. It was accidentally discovered by the defendants but a few days before the trial, by the exercise of great tact. The girl who played the half treacherous, half safety-seeking part to herself, is since married, and her husband heard of this circumstance for the first time. He offered no obstacle to the exposure of the Crittenden fraud, attended his wife to court, and went away with her. A ridiculous attempt was made by the counsel for plaintiff to rebut this testimony. Dr. Kimer insisted that both children were born, that the girl was only put in the house that he might attend to both cases at once, that the alleged Crittenden infant was born on the 17th and the other on the 19th, that one lived eight days and the other only two; and the women also repeated their perjury.

The examination of witnesses occupied Thursday afternoon, and the whole of Friday. On Saturday, Asgill Gibbs, associated with Jared Willson, as counsel for the plaintiff, and Hon. Mark H. Sibley, for the defence, argued the case. His Honor Daniel Mosely, Circuit Judge, charged the jury briefly and impartially, and after a few minutes a verdict was returned for the defendants in this most extraordinary case. The widow and her abettors, will hardly escape criminal prosecution, as their conduct involves, 1st, A criminal conspiracy to effect an unlawful object. 2. A legal crime in the false personation of an heir. 3. Perjury of the deepest and blackest dye; and possibly the murder of the child of the girl, by depriving it of its natural nourishment, and committing it to an unnatural mother. —Brother Jonathan.

TO THE FRIENDS OF SCIENCE IN THE UNITED STATES.—Until the present moment I continued to hope that I might be able to print and publish a work on the "Philosophy of Storms," which is now very nearly ready for the press, before I sailed for Europe, but as I now find it impossible to do so in time to meet the British Association in Glasgow on the 17th of September, I have determined to leave with the Editors of the National Gazette for publication after my departure, a very brief summary of my theory of storms, &c. My work will obtain abundant facts to prove all the principles contained in this summary.

The numbers used in this paper are not intended to be any thing but near approximations to the truth; they will serve, however, to show that Meteorology will soon take its rank among the exact sciences. As to the possibility of producing rains artificially in time of drought, I learned that Major Tenney and Mr. Ogden, of Louisiana, that they had both separately tried the experiment last summer in time of a most distressing drought with entire success. Major Tenney saw the cloud form over the fire and the rain come down through the clear blue sky below, and Mr. Ogden informed me that it rained on all his neighbors east of him but not in the west. One of these gentlemen saved a large mass of timber which had been cut down to clear his land, and the other had a salt marsh on the west of his farm, which burns freely in time of drought.

I request gentlemen who may have the means of trying this experiment during my absence, to send an account of their success or failure to Wm. Hamilton, Esq. Actuary of the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia. They must set fire to their materials only when all the following circumstances concur. A drought—a calm air—or a very gentle breeze from the eastward—a clear day, and a high dew-point. This latter may be ascertained by putting a thermometer (Fahrenheit) into a tumbler of water and finding how many degrees it will have to be below the temperature of the air from 12 to 2 o'clock in the days that the vapor in the air will condense on its outside. The highest temperature at which it will condense is called the dew-point, and if it should not be more than ten degrees below the temperature of the air at noon it may be considered favorable; and if it should be less than ten degrees it would be better. I hope this experiment will be repeatedly tried this summer, and the news of success reach me in a foreign land.

If it should succeed, it is probable the rain will widen out from the place of beginning, moving eastwardly or south eastwardly until it reaches the Atlantic, not raining much, if any, west of the place of commencement. Nothing however but experiments can decide these points, and others which might be named, such as whether the steam power in the air may so be kept down by regular artificial rains as to prevent the possibility of tornadoes and destructive hail storms, which can only occur when the dew-point is high.

When I return from Europe I shall immediately examine all the records of storms, whether natural or artificial, which may be sent as requested above. In the mean time, I remain your very humble servant,

JAMES P. ESPY.

REV. ROBERT NEWTON.—This distinguished divine and excellent man took his departure yesterday for his native country, after having passed forty-three days in the United States, during which he has delivered forty-six public discourses to crowded audiences. He went on board the steamer Hercules at White Hall dock, accompanied by a large number of his friends, including delegates from Philadelphia and Baltimore. Soon after 12 o'clock, the boat left the wharf, and proceeded to the packet ship George Washington, then under way, in the North River. After the transfer of the passengers and their friends to the ship, she proceeded down the bay, in tow of the steamer, and the wind being very light, continued in tow until they reached the outer buoy, at the edge of the bar, some miles from the Hook, when the boat left her and the ship proceeded with a fine breeze toward her destined port.

The parting scene between Mr. Newton and his friends was very touching. Indeed we do not recollect to have been present at one more so. So soon as the vessels were about to separate, the friends of Mr. N., who were on board the steamboat, sang the beautiful hymn commencing:

"And let our bodies part,
"To distant climes repair."

which was followed by the doxology—

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

There has been no foreign clergyman among us, since the days of Whitefield, who, without effort or design on his own part, has succeeded in so short a sojourn, in winning the hearts of so many people, as Mr. Newton has done. His name will long live in sweet and grateful remembrance among us—and the associations connected with his ministry will remain in the minds of the thousands who have heard him, fresh and unfading as the ever-green emblem of life everlasting.

AN IMPORTANT CIRCULAR.—We annex a copy of an important circular issued by the United States Bank under date of the 22d ult:

I am instructed to inform you, that by a resolution of the Board of Directors to this Bank, adopted at a stated meeting held on the 16th inst., it was ordered that hereafter no loans now running to maturity, shall be renewed, (unless originally made with an agreement or understanding to that effect;) and that upon all loans, whether in accommodation paper, upon stock or upon other security, a payment of at least ten per cent. will be required when due, and the balance to be settled by notes, (not renewable,) at from one to seven months. And that all offers or application for such renewals must be presented to the Board on discount days.

By order of the Board,

A. LARDNER, Acting Cashier.

HORRORS OF THE SLAVE TRADE.—Late intelligence from Mazambique, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, contains an account of the death of six hundred negroes by suffocation, on board a single slave ship. The vessel, which was commanded by a Spaniard, had on board 900 slaves. During a hurricane the hatches were battened down, and on opening them after the hurricane had subsided, it was discovered that 300 of the slaves had died from suffocation and want of food. The gale recommencing, the hatches were battened down a second time, the consequence of which was an additional 300 slaves perished from the same causes; and 100 of the remaining 300 slaves died on the passage to Mazambique harbor, whither she repaired for the purpose of getting a further supply. Thus perished seven hundred Africans.

The New York Star, Evening Signal and Sunday Morning News, are out in excoriating articles against Bennett of the New York Herald. We have never seen such awful castigation inflicted on any culprit, as that which the Herald man receives. If one half of what is alleged against him be true, he must be as consummate a catiff as ever disgraced humanity.

Thus says the New Orleans Bee. Severe as the language may appear, which has been applied to Bennett, we believe there is not an intelligent gentleman in New York who will deny its perfect justice. It is useless to be dainty in one's language when condemning a public nuisance. Filth is filth, and garbage garbage, and they should be called by their proper names.—New World.

IMPORTANT SEIZURE.—The New Orleans Bulletin of the 15th ult. says: The British steam-ship Argyle, which arrived on the 12th with 418,000 dollars in specie from Vera Cruz, was seized on Saturday, at the instance of the Collector of the port, for a violation of the treaty stipulation between Great Britain and the United States, in regard to the carrying trade. The specie, which is all owned in New Orleans, we understand, is placed in a safe deposit, to await the decision in the case of the proper authorities.

ENGLISH CROPS.—An English paper says, with regard to the growing crops, the most satisfactory accounts continue to reach us; indeed, up to the present period the season has been singularly auspicious and the splendid weather experienced during the spring months has gone far to repair the damage done to the autumnal sown wheat by the heavy and long continued rains, which fell in the latter part of the past and the commencement of the present year. Should we be equally fortunate as the summer advances, a good yield of all kinds of grain may be calculated on.

Mr. Rush, of the American Legation in London, and Mr. Schenley, of England, arrived in Washington on Saturday—the former with despatches from our Minister in England, and the latter with despatches for the British Minister here. We are glad to find that an impression prevails, which we incline to think a well-founded one, that the general tone and aspect of the communications from our Minister in England are decidedly pacific touching the north-eastern boundary.—National Intelligencer.

Despatches received by the War Department from Brig. Gen. Atkinson, announce the peaceable removal of the whole body of the Winnebago Indians, numbering about seventeen hundred, of the bands of the Portage, from whom resistance was at one time apprehended. The presence of one thousand regulars contributed to this desirable result.

Gen. Atkinson proceeds in person to attend to the final settlement of these Indians on the land allotted to them west of the Mississippi river.—Globe.

The trial of the granite cutters indicted at Washington for a conspiracy, has occupied the attention of a court and jury since last Tuesday, and was brought to a close on Thursday. The jury returned a verdict of guilty against all the defendants.

THE FALLEN TREE.—BY JAMES M. FULTON.

Jared, the son of Jesse, was reflecting on the vicissitudes of human life and the versatility of human actions. He was ruminating on the changes in the tastes of men, and the transitory nature of all earthly enjoyments. He had collected the different periods of human life together, and again distributed them into those natural divisions which take place in the seasons of the year. As he walked forth from his tent he beheld an oak that had braved the tempests of an hundred winters, standing erect in the majesty and grandeur of his strength, spreading his mighty arms as if to grasp the heavens, and would have deemed it immortal, had he not stood upon a little knoll of earth that had been thrown up by the falling of a tree. He began to soliloquize: "This oak is not immortal, for behold here is where its fellow once stood. Its mighty trunk was many years ago, precipitated from the summit of this little eminence with the resounding crash of the earthquake. It lay here for half a century together, gradually decomposing from the alternations of wind and rain, of sunshine and of shade, until it has finally disappeared, saving this brown and lengthened mark which it has left upon the surface of the ground. It is true, it once was erect as its mighty neighbor. Its shade was as refreshing, and its leaves as green. The birds chirped as merrily and sung as melodiously in its branches, and the squirrel leaped as often and as actively upon it, from limb to limb, and from spray to spray. But it has now left nothing but this sad relict of itself behind it,—its strength and its umbrage, its verdure and its beauty are fled, never to return. But what shall be said of man—possessing almost the talents of an angel? Shall he decay like the oak and wither like the tender bark? Shall he moulder like the massive trunk, and disappear as its mighty branches? Shall all the troubles of his breast pass unregarded by his Maker, and shall all his hopes shrivel as the leaf and disappear as the shade? Shall the early joys of life pass away as the sweet spring music of the birds, and shall nought be heard in the evening of his days, but the sighing of the winds and the cooing of the dove?" "Yes," said he, "this is the fate of man. Poor man is worse off than the insensate tree, for he has a love of life and a hope of a futurity, and yet he has not the firmness of the oak to resist the hurricane of life, but is agitated by every gale and bends with every breeze. In youth he has a nature that prompts him to expect more from human life than it is calculated to afford, till stung by disappointment and discouraged from defeat, he at length overlooks the few little delights that belong to life and sinks into the vale of sorrow and the gloom of desperation." He turned himself from this scene of decay, and again walked sad and solitary to his gloomy abode. Again, he engaged in the cares of life. He ploughed his fields and scattered seed upon the ground. As he threw his scythe into the grass, he could scarce keep lamenting the destruction of the verdant beauties occasioned by the sweep of his hand. The meadow, with all its array of virent grass and multifarious flowers was in a few days so seered with the sun and winnowed with the breeze, that he was again inspired with the deepest despair, and the most profound melancholy. Again, he returned to his home. In a few weeks he returned to the meadow where he had lately been so despondent. Fresh verdure had covered its surface. A new tribe of flowers had sprung from the roots of the stalks that he had extirpated. The stream that wound through the meadow, covered, when he left it, with green slime and almost exhausted from long continued drought, was now replenished and purified, and glided peacefully along, glittering in the sun, and the lark was twittering around it in the meadow. Day succeeded day, night followed night, and year rolled on after year in their usual succession. One beautiful mid-summer day, Jared strolled into the woods, where full twenty years before, he had taken his solitary walk. He came to the place where he had seen the marks of the fallen tree. To his surprize, a beautiful young tree stood in all the vigor of maturity, where the old one had decayed.—The birds sung sweetly in its boughs, and it spread a wide and refreshing shade over his head. The breezes at the point where the sunshine and the shade united were exhilerating to his spirits, and his long and dreary spell of melancholy was dispersed as the clouds pass away after a long continued rain. He called to mind the thoughts that had engrossed his attention when many years before he had stood upon that spot. He now ruminated upon the prospect of the resurrection of the body and the immortality of the soul, as illustrated by the returning bloom of the meadow and the re-appearance of the tree.

A while we flourish, said he, like the cedars of Lebanon. We spring up to maturity as the tall pine of the mountain. Our course is upward, like that of the bird of heaven, and we seem to dwell among the stars. But the tempest comes. Limb after limb is dashed from the tree as the "curls of beauty" fall from the head of man, until at last, beset on every side, he falls and is gathered to the tombs of his ancesters, to sleep till the morning of the resurrection. But from his dust he shall arise as the tree from its ruins, or the Phœnix from its ashes, and bloom in youth, and health, and in unfading beauty beyond the precincts of mortality. It may be that his body may slumber in the dust and mingle with its mother earth year after year and age after age. But a period shall come when it shall resume more than its former erectness and beauty and triumph forever over the ruins of time.

AGRICULTURAL.

From the Western Farmer.

EARLY KINDS OF CORN.—Mr. Editor Hooper: Sir, in compliance with your request, I now communicate to you the result of my observations on the various kinds of Indian corn, with which I have some little acquaintance. As my experiments are confined to one summer only they must, of course, in some respects, be defective, as a difference of season might produce different results in the cultivation of the same kind of grain.

Last year I cultivated some eight or ten different kinds of corn, among which were the Baden, the Dutton, the Cluster, the China Tree, and the early English Table corn.

Last year was considered by all farmers a bad year for the Baden—so proved it. But I am of opinion that it will not yield so large a crop as the large white corn usually cultivated by the farmers in this part of the country, as it is from two to four weeks later.

The Dutton corn proved with me the earliest, and the best for the table.

The Cluster corn comes to the roasting ear state, about the time the Dutton leaves it. These two kinds I consider preferable to any others for the table, in reference both to quality and quantity.

The China Tree corn, is a dwarf flint, and I think it will but poorly repay the cultivator.

The early English Table corn, is a kind of a flint, and the most dwarfish of all the corn family, allowing some of the ears to lie on the ground. These last mentioned two kinds, give from two to six ears on the stalk, but all of them small. Neither the origin nor the history of the China Tree corn, give it any preference in point of estimation.

I am aware that the little sugar corn, as it is commonly called, has a high reputation, and possesses some advantages, but I am satisfied that gardeners who would tend the market, would find it to their advantage to give more attention to the Dutton corn than is generally given.

Very respectfully, yours, WM. B. R.

Newport, Ky., June 1, 1840.

THE FLY IN WHEAT.—As the Hessian Fly is making great ravages in the wheat crops both in Ohio and Kentucky this season, we may as well communicate our own experience, as well as that of many old farmers who have cultivated wheat many years, that the Hessian Fly, as it is called, almost invariably attacks early sown wheat in the latter part of autumn, and after experience has also proved that wheat sown very late is equally liable to destruction in the following spring, as is now the case, according to the information we have recently received from the neighboring country. It appears then advisable to adopt a middle course in sowing our wheat, if possible, between about the 8th and last of October. The oldest farmers inform us that, having adopted this course, viz. sowing after the first autumnal frost, that the wheat must not be above ground until the autumn has perished, with a good soil and good culture to insure vigorous growth, (the present wet season of course forms an exception to the general rule of growth in this respect,) they have never suffered any loss from this insect. Some experiments recorded by agricultural societies, of sowing caustic lime upon the grain, particularly while there is dew upon the ground, in the spring of the year, seem to encourage the idea, that it saves the crop, at least partially, from the fly. It is at any rate worthy of further trial, and we shall be glad if any of our farmers will inform us of any results that may strengthen the probability of the application being successful. Warm and unseasonable weather late in the autumn, as was the case last year, will favor the work of destruction of this insect at the time. The spring insect is more likely to do mischief when wheat is sowed late as to be much stinted by the severity of winter frosts, and therefore in the beginning of spring its growth is not sufficiently strong to outlive the attacks it may receive from this pest. We may state shortly, until more new lights shall be thrown upon this subject, which we trust may be done by some of our practical farmers, that the best precaution to be taken against this interloper on our prosperity in raising the "staff of life" is, on very poor land, manuring well, making use of a heavy roller after the chrysalis or grub is formed in the autumn or in the spring before it is hatched, ploughing up the stubble deep, and thus burying it, and afterwards harrowing in and again in the spring, burning the stubble, an operation which, if thoroughly done, must destroy the grub most effectually; pasturing in the spring on strong lands, and when rank in growth; and last, but not least, as before stated, sowing the wheat, as far as a knoweldge of the season will permit, at a medium distance between the first and last frosts of autumn. This insect first made its appearance in New England, according to Dr. Dwight, in his Travels in New England, in 1837, and advanced at the rate of twenty miles a year, destroying the crops in entire districts and rendering it impossible to cultivate a particular variety of wheat. The bearded varieties of wheat seem to be more free from its incursions, the stem being stiffer and stronger than the smooth eared varieties.—W. Farmer.

THE RECORDER.

ZANESVILLE:

EDNESDAY, ... JULY 8, 1840.

The weather has been clear and cool for a num- of days; fine for harvesting.

There was wheat cut in this vicinity on the day of July; this week will probably take the st of the grain. The two past harvests did commence till near the middle of this month.

There was supposed to be seven or eight thou- nd people at the Whig celebration in Zanes- le, on the 4th instant. Messrs. Murphy, from illicothe, and Corwin, the candidate for Gov- nor, delivered addresses on the occasion.

The bustles of harvest (for we are a farmer as ll as an editor) may for a week or two, inter- e a little with our editorial duties, and pro- bly abate somewhat from the interests of our per. But we will do the best we can.

The Charleston (S. C.) Courier of the 24th of me, says: "We received yesterday, from the den of Mr. Francis Mitchell, a present of de- ious peaches." We would like to have been his mess.

In the plan of episcopal visits, as published for 0, bishop Hedding will attend the Erie Con- ence of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Au- t 5th; Michigan, August 19th; North Ohio, tember 9th; Ohio, (at Zanesville) Septem- 30th.

t is proposed, by the editors, to continue the Wesleyan Observer," at Lowell, Mass., after six months, for which it was proposed to is- it, has transpired, if there be sufficient pat- age to justify its continuance. We will give prospectus in our next.

FINE RYE AND WHEAT.—Mr. David Chess, ner, Ohio township, left in our office five stalks rye 8 feet, two of wheat 6 feet 1 inch high. is is farming to some purpose.—Pitt. Int.

What will our friend Harris think of this? . William Hibbs, within one mile of this of- , selected a stalk of wheat from his field which asured EIGHT FEET FIVE INCHES.

The following was passed unanimously by the e Anti-Slavery Convention at Massillon, Ohio: Resolved, That the ability, good temper, zeal l faithfulness with which the Philanthropist conducted, render it worthy of the cordial pport of abolitionists, and of all good citizens.

Against this, we enter our protest. So far as ood temper" and candor are concerned, we e found the Philanthropist greatly deficient.

The Nashville Whig says, the Governor of that te has offered a reward of five hundred dol- s for the apprehension of ZEBEDIAH PAYNE, murderer of young Coltart, near Shelbyville. describes him as "about 20 or 21 years of age, eet 8 to 11 inches high, weighing 150 to 160 nds, rather stoop shouldered, light or sandy r, florid complexion, fair skin, blue eyes, heavy ebrows, wears his locks, generally, long and ving, and has rather a fat appearance."

We give in this paper the communications of essrs. Clarke and Dalbey against Smith. We ll have hereafter to limit this kind of discussion two columns at each issue. Mr. Smith will w be permitted to occupy three papers, if he cause so to do, in answer to M. Scott and two brethren above, before they will be at erty to say any thing more, and John Scott answer to Bros. Carey and Oliver, two papers, fore they can be permitted to reply, the com- nications taking presidence according to the te of their reception.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.—Moses N. Warren, perintendent of Coshocton circuit, under date th ultimo, says: "We have received 141 into urch fellowship since conference, and two or ee new societies will soon be formed."

Thomas J. Addis, superintendent of Clearfield cuit, under date June 23d, says: "We closed r third quarterly meeting on the first of June Mt. Zion. Several obtained the pardon of n. Two weeks after, we held a protracted meet- g at Bro. Gilford's,—seven experienced religion d five united with the church, making 152 at we have received this year."

The following is from the "Wesleyan Obser- r" of the 25th ultimo, and is appended to r reply to the communication of the Rev. Ro- rt Boyd, which the Observer copied into its lumns at our request:

"REPLY TO REV. ROBERT BOYD.—Some of our aders will recollect, that in our 16th No. we blished a letter from our highly esteemed Bro. oyd, headed 'Radicalism and Abolitionism.' his letter, it seems, he requested the Western ecorder to copy. The Recorder has done so, d appended some remarks to it which it re- ests us to copy, because we published brother oyd's letter. Though we cannot see that we e under any particular obligation to copy a ply from another paper, because the offensive tter was published in ours, yet we will do so, in is instance; premising, however, that brother oyd will be at liberty to reply, if he chooses to o so. We much prefer admitting a discussion our columns respecting the principles for hich the Reformers contended, than on the anner in which they conducted their contro- rsy. A protracted discussion on the merits of n old controversy we think would not be profita- e to our readers.

It strikes us that the "plain remarks" of the ecorder are a little plainer than the occasion alled for, though our readers will judge for emselves."

Upon this editorial we remark—

1. The "Observer" informs us it "cannot e that it is under any particular obligation to opy a reply from another paper," &c. We ere really a little surprised to hear such a sen- iment from so discriminating a casuist. What! pen your columns to attack the reputation of our neighbor, and then under "no particular bligation" to admit his defence. Really, if his be the moral code of the Observer, we have een much mistaken in it. Our moral system rovides that when a man is attacked he shall be at liberty to defend himself in any way,—so the rules of decorum are not violated,—he may think proper, either orally, by writing, printing or by proxy. And if we shall lend our columns to any man to assail his neighbor's reputation, we shall hold ourself bound, in all conscience, to admit his defence, if respectfully made, through the same medium which assailed him, no difference whether forwarded to us in a manuscript or printed document, but if in the latter we shall consider our obligation greater because of the facility which it affords.

2. The editor is not in favor of "a protracted discussion on the merits of an old controversy." He invites his friend B., if he should think proper, to "reply" to us through his columns. Perhaps this is a hint that he does not wish us to reply to the "reply." Has not the accused in all prosecutions, the right to close with his defence? Does the "Observer" so bold for "human rights," as he "understands them," wish to deprive us of this "right?" We hope not. However, as it respects "discussion on the merits of an old controversy," we did not introduce the subject into his columns, and only appeared there in the attitude of self-defence.

3. The editor gives it as his opinion, that our "plain remarks are a little plainer than the occasion called for;" i. e., if we understand him, he gives it as his opinion, that there is something wrong in the "plain remarks," either as it respects their matter or manner. We should have been extremely glad if he had pointed out wherein our error consisted, so that we might have retracted or reformed, as the case might be. But as it now stands, we are left in the dark respecting the nature of our wrong.

However, we feel thankful to the "Observer" for publishing our reply, and particularly as it has done it without being considered as under obligation to do so. But objecting to some little matters in its editorial connected therewith, we have called its attention to them, though if nothing greater occurs, this shall make no impression upon our mind. We have never alluded to the "Observer" but with kind expressions, because such has been our feelings towards it, and when we object to it, we will give specifications. As it respects our Bro. Boyd, who was the principal subject of our "plain remarks," we have towards him the most hearty good will, and the manner in which he has received these "remarks" has tended to increase our regard for him; and we think it highly probable, that he thinks none the less of us for having made them.
